I am commanding an army. The business of an army is to fight. This is war. I am determined to whip out the rebellion. There is no other way. I am pursuing the same policy which I began at Belmont. It is my intention to fight.

Again, after he had been twice unanimously nominated for the Presidency by his party, and after he had been twice elected by overwhelming majorities, during his second inaugural address he referred with dignity to the abuse which had been heaped upon him in these words:

I did not ask for place or position, and was entirely without influence or the acquaintance of persons of influence. But I was resolved to perform my part in a struggle threatening the very existence of the Union. I performed a conscientious duty without asking promotion or command. Notwithstanding this, throughout the war and from my candidacy for my present position in 1868, I have been the subject of abuse and slander scarcely ever equaled in political history, which yet to-day I feel I can afford to disregard in view of your verdict, which I gratefully accept as my vindication.

No man among our dead, save Washington and Lincoln, has been more greatly vilified than Grant, but like Washington and Lincoln, Grant will live long after his traducers shall have faded from the memory of man.

Grant, like many people of the North, did not believe the war would last long. Neither did the people of the South. Before the actual fighting began Grant thought with Seward the rebellion would be suppressed in 90 days. This must have been the thought of Lincoln himself, because his first call for troops was for 90 days.

The people in the North did not think the South would fight. The people of the South were certain the North would not fight. Orators in the South spoke of the northerners as cowards—claimed that one southern man was equal to five northern men in battle, and if the South would stand up for its rights the North would back down.

Jefferson Davis said in a speech, "He would agree to drink all of the blood spilled south of the Mason and Dixon line if there should be a war." Too bad they did not know one another better. Neither side appreciated the valor, the spirit, the worth of the other.

What a tribute the history of the Civil War is to the fine courage of the people of both North and South! The people of both sections were sprung from the same loins. They were all all-American.

WAS GRANT AN ACCIDENT?

Many who knew Grant in his youth and early manhood before and even during the Civil War had little confidence in his ability or fitness for high command. Some who knew him intimately referred to him as a mere "accident." Such criticisms hurt, but they did not unmake the man.

The God of battles does not choose great commanders of great armies by accident. Accidents are not placed in the niches of the temple of fame. Maybe that occasionally, by some fortuitous combination of circumstances, an inferior man may win where a superior man may lose. Accident may win a battle. It never won a magnificent series of battles. It never won a war. Ulysses Simpson Grant did both.

Accident did not win commendation from his superior officers for bravery on the battle fields of Mexico or for ability as quartermaster.

Accident was not in the saddle at Belmont, or Fort Thomas, or Fort Donelson, or Shiloh, or Vicksburg, or Chattanooga in the west.

Accident did not make Grant commander in chief of the armies in the field. It did not win in the Wilderness or at Spotsylvania or at Petersburg or at Appomattox.

Had he been an accident he could not have had the sustained confidence and the continued loyal devotion of the Shermans, the Sheridans, the McPhersons, and the Meades. Accident did not tie his faithful soldiery to him by hooks of steel.

Accident did not win for him two nominations and two elections to the Presidency of the Republic.

No; Grant was not an accident. He was the one man born from the womb of time to lead our armies to victory and to restore the Union, never again to be dissolved. Like Minerva, he sprung full fledged from the head of Jove. He was born to command. Lincoln discovered him. He won where others failed.

Great as Grant was on the battle field, he was greater at the peace table. Determined and tenacious in conflict, he was magnanimous in victory. Nothing finer appears in all history than his treatment of Lee and his armies at Appomattox. He required all arms, artillery, and public property to be parked and stacked and turned over to the officer appointed by him to receive them. This did not embrace either the side arms of the officers or their private horses or baggage. This done, each officer and man was allowed to return to his home, "not to be disturbed by the United States authorities so long as they observe their parole and the laws in force where they reside."

Lee was surprised at the generosity of Grant's proposal, and added, "this will have a most happy effect upon my army."

What a temptation it would have been to many a general to have demanded terms both exacting and humiliating! Not so with Grant. Now that the war had been won, his one thought was to win the peace.

Later on came Lincoln's assassination and Andrew Johnson's succession to the Presidency. He proposed "to make treason odious." He sought to have Lee and other leading southerners indicted for treason. General Lee appealed to Grant, saying he had learned that he was to be indicted for treason by the grand jury at Norfolk. He adds:

I had supposed that the officers and men of the Army of Northern Virginia were by the terms of the surrender protected by the United States Government from molestation so long as they conformed to its conditions. * * *

Grant wrote to the Secretary of War with firmness and magnanimity:

In my opinion the officers and men paroled at Appomattox Courthouse, and since upon the same terms given to Lee, can not be tried for treason so long as they observe the terms of their parole. This is my understanding. Good faith as well as true policy dictates that we should observe the conditions of that convention. Bad faith on the part of the Government or a construction of that convention subjecting the officers to trial for treason would produce a feeling of insecurity in the minds of all paroled officers and men. * * *

He wrote to Lee:

I have forwarded your application for amnesty and pardon to the President with the following indorsement: "Respectfully forwarded, through the Secretary of War, to the President, with the earnest recommendation that this application of Gen. R. E. Lee for amnesty and pardon be granted him."

General Grant was not content with a mere protest. He said to the President, "The people of the North do not wish to inflict torture upon the people of the South."

President Johnson answered, "I will make treason odious. When can these men be tried?"

Grant replied, "Never, never; unless they violate their parole."

Grant was determined that the Government should keep the faith, and he finally won. From this time on his every thought and every act looked to the healing of the wounds of war. He wanted the sections reunited in fact and in spirit as well as in name.

When, after his first nomination as a candidate for the Presidency he wrote his letter of acceptance, this same thought was uppermost in his mind, and after his letter had been completed he added these four words:

Let us have peace.

It was not in his heart after victory to trample the people of the South under the iron heel of war. Rather he looked upon them as wayward brothers, whom he wanted to bring back to the protecting folds of our glorious flag.

How well he succeeded the reestablished Union proclaims to the world for all time. Peace to the ashes of Ohio's greatest son. May we honor ourselves by writing his name large upon the tablets of our memories.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10101) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes; that the House receded from its disagreement to certain amendments of the Senate, and concurred therein, each with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate; and that the House insist upon its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 186.

The message also announced that the House insisted upon its amendments to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 132) to provide for the continuance of certain Government publications, disagreed to by the Senate; agreed to the conference requested by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. KIESS, Mr. JOHNSON of Washington, and Mr. STEVENSON were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed enrolled bills of the following titles, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

S. 2186. An act granting certain lands in Hot Springs, Ark., to the Leo N. Levi Memorial Hospital Association; and

H. R. 10007. An act for the relief of certain persons to whom, or their predecessors, patents were issued to public lands in the State of Minnesota under an erroneous survey made in 1876.

GREGORIE SEMENOFF AND BORIS BAKHMETEFF.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator in charge of the tariff bill [Mr. MCCUMBER] that I shall be as brief as possible, because I do not want to be unnecessarily in the way of the consideration of that bill.

One Gregorie Semenoff has been permitted to enter this country. It has been a little difficult to analyze the influences which enabled him to come into the United States. It is quite apparent to me that the Department of Labor was not anxious to have him come. I think the hearings and the report now printed will disclose that fact. Nevertheless, he was permitted to enter. At this time I do not propose to discuss the question of how he came to be permitted to come into the United States.

Semenoff has been characterized by the officers of the American Army and the American soldiers in Siberia as a bandit, a murderer, one who attacked American soldiers without any cause, and at a time when we were supposed to be on friendly relations, resulting in the death of two and the wounding of a number. All these facts, Mr. President, were well known to the department here and were presented to the officers on the coast who admitted him into this country.

I am going to call attention briefly to some of this testimony which has been taken, as it states the case against Semenoff much more effectively than I could do in my own language.

General Graves, who had charge of the Siberian expedition, so far as the American forces were concerned, in his testimony said:

The next real incident that I had, so far as American troops were concerned, one of Semenoff's generals, on an armored car, on the nights of January 9 and 10 went to Posolskaya, arriving there about 1 o'clock in the morning, and opened fire on a box car loaded with American soldiers, this car being used as quarters for the American soldiers in the performance of their duty guarding the railroad under the railroad agreement. Two American soldiers were killed and one wounded, as I remember the case. The American soldiers got out of the car and punctured the locomotive with rifle bullets, and after the train got about 5 or 6 versts from there it could not go any further, and they succeeded in capturing the general, 5 officers, and 48 men that were on that train.

Further he said:

When we returned from Omsk in the latter part of August, 1919, as we passed through the town of Adrianovka, which is some 100 or 200 miles from the Manchurian line, one of the American railroad service corps men, named McDonald, related to me an incident of Semenoff's murdering. That incident was taken down at the time as given by Lieutenant McDonald. This was taken down by my aid, Captain Hoffman, and I have here that statement as made by Lieutenant McDonald. If there is no objection, I would prefer to read the statement as taken down at the time or I can give it as I remember it.

Then he read the statement, which was afterwards incorporated in the record. A part of that statement is as follows:

I had long heard of these big killings that Semenoff was having at different points along the line of the railroad, but I really couldn't believe it. It didn't seem possible that such things could be true, even here in Siberia, so I said to myself that it was just some more Russian lies. One day I went down to Adrianovka. I arrived there the evening of the 18th of August. Lieutenants McNutt and Griggs, of the Russian corps, were there, and they told me of the killing of Bolshevik prisoners. They said that that day they had tramped over a large part of the country a verst or two east of Adrianovka trying to locate the place of the killing, but hadn't found anything. They said that there was a train in the yards with about 400 prisoners in cars and that indications were that there would be a killing in the next day or two.

I knew the stories about Macavievo, and I knew they handled the prisoners rough. One morning I had seen a prison train with two cars filled with women—one box car and regular prison car. As I was going by an old woman looked out between the bars and hailed me. Then she called a young girl up to the window, a sick-looking, red-haired girl, who spoke to me in very good English. I asked her where she was going and she answered, "I only wish I knew." The train pulled out almost immediately, and I could not find out more.

Just the same I found it hard to believe they were as bad as the stories made out. Early next morning, however—that was the 19th—we saw a bunch of Semenoff's soldiers walking in from the east, carrying long-handled shovels. The boys—I mean Lieutenants McNutt and Griggs—said they had seen the same kind of a gang come in previous to other killings.

Shortly afterwards we saw them loading soldiers on the prisoners' train, and taking a machine gun from an armored car that was standing there and putting it on the train. They took 10 carloads—about half—of the prisoners and started east from the yards. They left at 9.50.

It was then I decided to find out what I could about the killing, so I footed it east after them. About 2 versts out, I finally came in sight of the train (I call it the murder train) standing near a curve of the railway. I kept on, hoping to reach the place, but was stopped by a guard. I was then about a hundred yards from the train, but because of the topography of the country I couldn't see anything of the soldiers or the prisoners. I pretended not to understand Russian when the guard stopped me, but he put a shell into his rifle to assist my understanding. I understood. I knew I was near where the killing had been, but I wasn't quite sure when I walked away whether I'd get one from the guard or not.

I had only been back from the station a few minutes when that train came back empty. It had gone out full. It had been gone just 1 hour and 55 minutes. I noticed they had not brought the machine gun back. By the way, Stepanoff, Semenoff's colonel in charge, just as the first batch was leaving, went out and got a rifle for himself. There were Kolchak guards on the train, for they had on British uniforms. The second train was gone 1 hour and 50 minutes and brought the machine gun back with it.

I didn't go out again that day, but the next morning McNutt and Griggs and I, three of us, went out. On the way we met a peasant woman carrying boots and socks and clothing. At the place where the train had been standing the day before, we saw that the roadbed had marks of a large number of people getting off and moving about. The ground was littered with torn clothing, worn-out puttees, and papers of all kinds, including a bolsheviki ruble note. Just a short distance from the track—about 15 feet—we found one body shot through the lower jaw, left, and through the cheek. Thirty feet farther on we found another body. The weeds and ground near the bodies seemed to indicate struggles. The poor devils had evidently tried to escape. We walked on toward some mounds of fresh earth we saw, and found three large holes, two filled up and covered over, and one only about half filled with just a little covering of earth over the bodies. I picked up several shells at the edge of the third grave, of two different calibers, partly a large caliber, but mostly of a smaller one. There was nothing to indicate what they were or where they were made. A short distance eastward, possibly a hundred yards from the three holes, we found another that had evidently been there much longer. It was filled, but there was such a thin layer of earth on top that dogs or other animals had dragged some of the bodies out. Some had the feet cut off, one had no head, one had the genitals cut off. Of course, dogs might have done it, but didn't look like the work of dogs. At another hole we found just the trunk of a body lying on some fresh earth. It was all black and ugly.

It had been raining for some time, so we turned and went back to Adrianovka. It rained all the next day, but the day after that it cleared up in the afternoon. So at about 5 o'clock I went out with my camera to see if I could not get some pictures for evidence. The other boys didn't come with me; they had had enough. When I got there I found that the bodies had been buried. There were some little boys there digging around after loot, and they told me that the section hands of the railroad had done the burying. The boys showed me where six other bodies had been found on the other side of the tracks—shot evidently when they were trying to escape. It seemed to me that the big killing had been done by lining the prisoners up along the edge of the bank and firing at them catacornered across it. An old peasant woman that lived near by told me that they had to give up getting in their grain because of the stench. I told her they'd better get gas masks and go to it; they might need the grain. But I didn't get any pictures.

That same night Semenoff went through on his way east. There were a number of Japanese on the train and some women. They stopped at Adrianovka and had a celebration—a big banquet. Stepanoff was there. They had music and plenty of booze. Then Semenoff went east to Vladivostok.

This is the statement—

of John J. McDonald, lieutenant in the railway service corps at Chita on Monday, September 1, 1919.

Mr. Clark, interrogating General Graves on behalf of Semenoff, asked:

Did you take up with General Semenoff that incident which you mentioned of the slaughter ground, which you have read from that account there, when General Semenoff went through the next day?

General GRAVES. I did not. I would have no dealings with that man that day or any day.

Mr. CLARK. Then, you had no personal knowledge as to the claim that Semenoff was in no way responsible for it?

Colonel GRAVES. I know nothing about it except that it was in his territory.

Mr. CLARK. Who was in supreme command of the eastern republic at that time? Was that under the Kolchak régime?

General GRAVES. Kolchak was at Omsk at that time and it was prior to his being killed.

Mr. CLARK. Who was in supreme command?

General GRAVES. The conditions over there are such that I think rather than answer that definitely, some explanation is necessary. While Kolchak was supposed to be in supreme command, it was generally thought that he was not in a position to control Semenoff, Kalmykoff, or Rozanoff.

Mr. CLARK. In the structure of the governmental system there, de facto or de jure at that time, Kolchak was at the head of the organization, was he not?

General GRAVES. I could not say that Kolchak was at the head of Semenoff. Semenoff at that time had, I think, recognized Kolchak. Part of the time he recognized Kolchak and part of the time he did not.

Again:

Mr. CLARK. As to the incident to which you have referred, of the shooting upon a box car with American soldiers upon it, there was subsequently an investigation made of that, was there not?

General GRAVES. There was.

Mr. CLARK. By whom?

General GRAVES. By Colonel Morrow.

Mr. CLARK. By whom on behalf of the Russians?

General GRAVES. I do not know.

Mr. CLARK. Do you not know that there was an investigation?

General GRAVES. Yes.

Mr. CLARK. Do you know the result of that investigation?

General GRAVES. I do.

Mr. CLARK. What was it?

General GRAVES. So far as we are concerned, nothing.

Mr. CLARK. Do you know what discipline was meted out?

General GRAVES. I do not. My judgment is that nothing was, because Semenoff made no expression of regret to me as the commander of the American forces, and took no action prior to departure of American troops which led me to believe that he was in the least regretful of the incident. As these were men under him, and as I was commander of the American Expeditionary Forces, if he did not approve of it I should have thought he certainly would have expressed regret to the American commander.

I call attention now briefly to the statement of Colonel Morrow, who had command of the American troops. He said:

On the night of January 10 four armored trains had passed through. This was on the night of the 10th of January, 1920. The fifth armored train, the "Destroyer," came through and stopped at Verkhne Udinsk, which was the town which I was in command of. They arrested the station master, robbing him of all of his property, including all the clothing of his wife, broke up the furniture in his house, and took him aboard the "Destroyer." I was informed of this by my provost marshal in the city.

I at once went aboard the "Destroyer" with an interpreter and my adjutant, and interviewed the general in command of the train, General Bogomoletz. He informed me that he had arrested the station master at Verkhne Udinsk, and proposed to kill him. I told General Bogomoletz that his train was passing through the American sector on sufferance, and that he could not arrest men in the American sector and execute them. General Bogomoletz replied that he was not responsible to me and would do as he pleased, and that the conversation was at a close. I informed General Bogomoletz that the conversation was just beginning, and if he did not release the station master I would forcibly take him away from him with American troops.

After a rather heated argument General Bogomoletz released the station master, making the station master sign a statement that he had received back all of his property. He had not received back any of his property. This was about 7 o'clock.

The armored train, "Destroyer," then moved out of Verkhne Udinsk and went to the station Posolskaya, about 60 miles from there.

A lieutenant named Paul Kendall was posted at Posolskaya with a detachment of 38 men. They were sleeping in box cars. The armored train, "Destroyer," moved into Posolskaya and took aboard the Russian Captain Krisko there, moved back from the American box cars, and opened fire. This was between 12 and 1 o'clock at night. It was about 40 or 50 degrees below zero and there was about 8 inches of snow on the ground.

Kendall and his men turned out with hand grenades and rifles and began the battle against the armored train. They threw a hand grenade into the engine, very seriously damaging it, so that it could only move down the track about 5 versts. Here Captain Ramsay closed in on it from the east, and the armored train was captured in the morning.

Mr. STERLING. From whose testimony is the Senator reading?

Mr. BORAH. From the testimony of Colonel Morrow. He continues:

During the fighting that occurred Sergeant Robins was killed, Private Montgomery died later of wounds, and Private Towney was knocked from the armored train when he attempted to board it, and his foot was cut off.

The CHAIRMAN. When were these men killed, with reference to the first attack?

Colonel MORROW. Right in the first fighting.

Continuing, Colonel Morrow says:

General Bogomoletz and his officers and men were brought under guard and placed in the guardhouse by my command. I at once notified Ataman Semenoff of the actions of this car, and requested the immediate trial of Bogomoletz and his officers. I recited to him the crimes of General Bogomoletz and begged him for immediate trial of these officers. I continued to receive from Semenoff evasive telegrams, which would lead nowhere. I was under order with my command to evacuate Siberia immediately. Of this fact I informed Ataman Semenoff.

Further, Colonel Morrow says:

While the men of Bogomoletz's train were under my command I caused Lieutenant Colonel Gillem to take their testimony. I propose to read the testimony of Asst. Surg. Michael Morosoff, who was aboard this armored train. This testimony was taken by Lieutenant Colonel Gillem, jr., of the Twenty-seventh Infantry. [Reading:]

"1. Q. How long have you been of the bronevick?—A. Since September, 1919.

"2. Q. Have you got a family?—A. A wife and a child. I was forced to work on the bronevick; I wanted to commit suicide because I couldn't stand the horrors of Semenoff's men.

"3. Q. Did you see any Americans at Station Posolskaya?—A. No; I was asleep at the time. Friends say that the bronevick fired first.

"4. Q. What did the bronevick do after the fighting?—A. The engine couldn't go at full speed, so it backed up slowly about 3 versts and stopped.

"5. Q. Why do the people call the bronevick 'destroyer' not only in name but also in action?

"6. Q. How many executions did you see at station Oloviannaya?—A. Fifteen men and one woman were taken into the car and whipped, then taken to the ice hole and killed one after another. In most cases they were lashed and hit with the bayonets and then thrown in the ice hole half alive. All took place January 1, 1920.

"At the last trip from Chita to Verkhne Udinsk there were killed about 40 men only because they were suspected of helping Bolsheviks.

"At the same expedition one woman was killed after she wouldn't give herself up to the military commandant of the station. All these cases can be verified, as the bodies were never buried.

"All executions were committed by order of the general himself, because it was a punitive expedition.

"The provodnick of the general's car was so badly whipped that he died two days ago.

"The general had mercy for nobody. He was also the only judge.

"Before his service on the bronevick he worked on Station Adrianova, and took part in executions of one group of Bolsheviks, 370 men, and small groups of 15 and 20 men.

"Everybody on the bronevick knows very well that the general would continue his executions up to Irkutsk. My opinion that the most men killed were peasants who knew nothing about politics.

"7. Q. Did the men like the service on the bronevick?—A. About six did. The rest were forced to do it. For the least offense people were whipped and killed. One man tried to leave the bronevick at Manchuria. He was caught and whipped. He died two days later.

"MICHAEL MOROSOFF."

Mr. BORAH. On page 19 of the printed record, Colonel Morrow says:

In December General Semenoff sent General Levitsky, with what was known as the Wild Division, to Verkhne Udinsk. That division consisted of about 2,000 Mongolians, mounted on Mongolian ponies and camels, and about 500 Cossacks.

Shortly after his arrival General Levitsky began sending detachments into the Selenga Valley.

This valley, as we were informed, is a large valley, having a population of about 1,000,000, who at that time, according to the statement of Colonel Morrow, were not active either in war activities or political activities. They were a quiet, inoffensive, law-abiding people—the Russian peasantry disturbing no one and taking no side in the conflict.

These detachments committed robbery and plunder and murder and crimes unspeakable. The peasants finally rose up and fought these detachments, defeating some of the smaller detachments.

In January General Levitsky took the field at the head of his forces and made a cavalry raid into the valley of the Selenga. He had no sooner started his raid than two or three applications every day from Russian peasants began to come to the American headquarters, begging for help and assistance against Semenoff's Wild Division. They also brought written petitions. I took down some of their statements, and some I kept. Many of them I lost.

To show the character of the operations of General Levitsky's command, I will read some of these signed statements.

The following is one of the statements addressed to the American forces:

VILLAGE SHERALDAI, January 3, 1920.

FRIENDS, AMERICANS: The people implore your help and request you to protect them from Semenoff's Wild Division, who burn villages, bread, and the property of the peasants; who kill old men, women, and children, and who have mercy on no one.

We beg you to help us for the sake of the babies and old men. Have mercy and help us. Upon your arrival, you can be convinced by your own eyes of the true facts, through seeing the remnants and ashes of our homes.

(Signed by 38 peasants.)

Senator STERLING asked Colonel Morrow this question:

I suppose, Colonel, you felt that you were not authorized to give the relief that was asked for?

Colonel MORROW. Not at that time.

Senator STERLING. Your business was to guard the railroad?

Colonel MORROW. My business was to guard the railroad. I did assist the people of that country finally. I was forced to do it. I could not help it. I helped them in every way that it was possible for me to help them, except to take the field myself against General Levitsky.

Another statement read by Colonel Morrow is as follows:

VERKHNE UDINSK, January 18, 1920.

On the 10th of January the Wild Division, commanded by General Levitsky, passed through the village of Bobkina, perpetrating there about 15 murders upon the people without arms.

The 18th of January, the former American vice consul at Chita, Mr. Fowler, and Lieutenant Davis, of the American Army; Lieutenant Fuji and Captain Keda, of the Japanese Army; Maj. Doctor Marand and Major De Latier de Jean, of the French Army, went to this very village and were there able to make the following observations:

A dozen corpses, with the hands cut off, were lying heaped up in a pile half destroyed, all the bodies more or less cut up by saber wounds. The greater part bore many wounds made while living by saber blows, particularly on the face and back. All the corpses were burned. Many bore evident traces of having been burned while still living. From this last observation it must be admitted that the greater part, severely wounded only, must have died of asphyxiation, as an inspection of the wounds shows not one was immediately mortal.

After the departure of the criminals the people of the village, attracted by the smoke, were able to recover the corpses before complete burning up, which act has permitted the very precise preceding observations to be made.

About 15 meters from this place, in a large space still stained by blood on the snow, we found the bloody remains of burned hair and a large piece of a scalp, cut by a saber blow.

FOWLER, United States Vice Consul.
E. DAVIS, United States Army.
FUJI, Japanese Army.
KODA, Japanese Army.
D. MARAND, French Army.
C. DE LATIER DE JEAN, French Army.

I read now from an official report to Colonel Morrow by one of his officers:

8. August 19, 1919, at 2 a. m., on this date a train of 52 cars of prisoners arrived at Adrianovka from the west. This train left Chita, (1) with 41 cars, picked up 8 cars at Chita; (2) 1 car at Atamanovka, 1 car at Makavayevo, and 1 car at Karemskaya. We knew there was to be a big killing, as the day previous there had been about 40 or 50 men, prisoners, digging four large holes out in the slaughter yard. These men had been prisoners for some time; that is, we always had from 1 to 4 or 5 cars of prisoners at Adrianovka all the time.

At 9.30 a. m. the yard engine took 29 cars of prisoners to the yard. The cars were covered with soldiers and a machine gun mounted on both ends of the train. Lieutenant McDonald and myself started to walk out to the yards, following the railway line.

Mr. TOWNSEND. What is the Senator reading from?

Mr. BORAH. I am reading from a report of Colonel Morrow.

About one-half verst from where the train stopped we were stopped by a guard; we gave him 1,000 rubles and he allowed us to proceed. We soon ran into a stronger guard—three soldiers—who refused to accept money, and we were unable to get closer. We were, however, then within sight of the train and saw them unload the cars, two cars at a time, and start the prisoners over toward the holes. The holes were not within our sight, being located about 300 yards from the track in a small spot almost completely surrounded by hills.

I want it to be borne in mind that these were not prisoners taken in war, taken as a result of conflict or as a result of fighting. They were people who were picked up in different parts of the country—unarmed, helpless, defenseless men, women, and children, old and young. There is nothing in the history of the world equal to the brutality of this man who is now in this country.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, what excuse was there for this? Why were they being killed? Just out of bloodthirstiness?

Mr. BORAH. The only excuse which a humane person like the Senator or myself could conceive of is that it was just total, unmitigated, indescribable depravity. It would seem, however, that Semenoff had the idea of terrorizing the country so as to bring it completely within his control and domination and establish himself as the ruler of that particular portion of the country. Whatever the reason was, or whatever reason could be assigned, the fact that it occurred can not be doubted. It is inexplicable. I had not supposed such monsters were left on earth. Indeed, I do not think such depravity is anywhere recorded in ancient or modern history.

The 29 cars, empties, were brought back to Adrianovka at 11.55 a. m. At 1.15 p. m. the other 23 cars were taken out.

They simply hauled these poor people out there like cattle are hauled to a slaughter pit. We have photographs of these scenes. They jammed them and crowded them into the cars like dumb beasts, drove them to the slaughter pit, shot them down, pushed them into these holes which had been dug, and left them there half covered for wild animals to prey upon.

I asked Colonel Stephanoff, about 9.15 a. m., if I might be allowed to go out with him, and he said yes, but not on the first trip, and requested that I wait until the second trip. When the train was ready the second time I got on with him on the platform of a brake car, but after the train started he told me to get off.

He had often told me he would take me out with him, and when he requested I get off this train he said wait until some other time.

He himself took a rifle with him on both these trips. August 19, new-style calendar, is a big Russian holiday. Colonel Stephanoff told me in the evening that he had enjoyed it, more so than ever.

I will state in this connection that a car of prisoners generally consisted of from 30 to 35 prisoners, and there were 53 of those cars. [Continuing reading:]

9. August 20 Lieutenant McDonald and myself walked down the track to the "yard."

That is, to the slaughter yard, which was as well known in that country as the slaughter pens of Chicago belonging to the packers are known here.

We found dead bodies scattered along the track for a distance of about half a verst east of the yard, from there clear up to the holes. They were on both sides of the track. From the point where the cars were stopped over to the holes they were the thickest. We took 18 different pictures of what we saw, all except one of which were later destroyed by a Semenoff officer in a photograph shop in Chita. I more correctly should have said confiscated instead of destroyed.

Senator STERLING. Were these persons, or any of them, people who had been taken in arms against Semenoff's authority?

Colonel MORROW. I do not believe it, from what I knew of the country. [Continuing reading:]

10. August 31, Sunday, at 8.30 a. m., this date, a train of 41 cars of Bolshevik prisoners arrived Adrianovka from west en route east under Kolchak guard. Colonel Stephenoff ordered station master to cut out 10 cars at Adrianovka for him. The guard in charge of train refused to allow this to be done.

There seemed to be a kind of competition among those people about who should participate in the killing. It was an honor which their satanic souls competed for.

There was no recourse for the Kolchak guard, and he was forced to turn over the 10 cars. They were taken out to slaugher yard at 1.15 p. m. and killed. Colonel Stephenoff remarked he had to show the people of Adrianovka that he could execute on Sunday as well as on other days.

* * * * * * *

These murders were not wholly confined to Adrianovka Station, but were carried on over our entire district. Makaveyevo Station, about 30 versts east from Chita, was another well-known place. When I first arrived at Mogzon the people were afraid to hear the names of Makaveyevo and Adrianovka.

I do not want to trespass too long upon the time of the Senate by reading this; but in order to get at least a skeleton of the hideous story into the RECORD I will read a little further.

Mr. Clark asked Colonel Morrow:

Have you never seen the report of Consul General Harris on that?

Colonel MORROW. I have not.

This is in regard to what was supposed to have been a punishment of Ataman Kalmykoff and some of those who were responsible for this killing. Colonel Morrow says:

I have not. Neither would I believe the report if I saw it, to that effect—

That is, to the effect that they had been punished—

All I know is that when I left, after begging and imploring him, and after General Myssura, his own Russian general, had begged him, to try those men, and after I had made every effort on earth to get him to try Bogomoletz and his officers, when he was in distress and his forces were being driven back I offered to give him a great armored train if he would try and execute those officers. General Janin, commanding the French Army, and myself had General Suzuki, commanding the Thirteenth Division of the Japanese Army, come to Verkhne Udinsk; and we told Suzuki the crimes that Semenoff was committing, and we asked him for the sake of everybody to stop the killings along the railroad, so that the railroads would not be destroyed and so that the Czecho-Slovaks and Americans could evacuate the country.

* * * * * * *

Mr. CLARK. In connection with the raids of which you got reports, which were made in that valley, did you take that report up with the Japanese officers, too?

Colonel MORROW. I did.

Mr. CLARK. Did you get any reports as to what they did about it?

Colonel MORROW. I know what they did. They did nothing.

Mr. CLARK. When were the incidents with regard to these slaughter yards which you have related; in August, 1919, were they not?

Colonel MORROW. The slaughter yards operated at all times. Before I came into the country they were in operation. They continued those operations until after I had left the country. I got reports by the hundreds concerning the slaughter yards at Makaveyevo and Borzya and Dlauria and Olivinnaya. I got reports from Russian railroad service men and from our own intelligence section.

Mr. CLARK. Did you have any knowledge as to the character of the people who were alleged to have been killed?

Colonel MORROW. The knowledge that I had of the men who were killed there was that they were generally old peasants or railroad employees in the country.

The CHAIRMAN. They were not belligerent forces which had been captured in battle?

Colonel MORROW. Understand the situation of the forces. When the Allies entered Siberia, between August, 1918, and up to November, 1919, the country was swept clear of all the armed Bolshevik forces. The Kolchak army was based on the Volga River in the European region. Kolchak himself had his army. There was a battle line along the Volga River.

Colonel Morrow makes it perfectly clear that there was really no fighting there in that portion of the country where this slaughter was taking place. The Bolshevik forces had been dispersed, if they had ever been there. There was no occasion for anything of this kind because of armed Bolshevists being in the vicinity or undertaking to interfere either with American forces or with Semenoff.

In this connection, Mr. President, I ask leave to read a paragraph or two from an article by Charles H. Smith in the May number of the magazine Asia. Charles H. Smith was the American representative on the Interallied Railway Commission in Siberia, and to that commission was assigned the coordination of all communications in Siberia. On the board with Smith were Russian, British, American, French, Japanese, Chinese, Italian, and Czech representatives. Among those who sat on the committee at different periods were: For Great Britain, Sir Charles Eliot, now ambassador to Japan, W. E. O'Reilly, now minister of Bolivia, and W. G. Hodgson, now trade commissioner to Soviet Russia; for France, M. Bourgois, of the embassy at Tokyo, and M. André, consul at Vladivostok; for Japan, Mr. Matsudaira, secretary general of the Japanese delegation to the recent Washington conference.

In this article Mr. Smith says:

Siberia itself is not Bolshevist nor communist, and it never has been and never will be, unless alien invasion gives the Siberian peasantry no choice except between alien conquerors and their own rulers, even though the latter are Bolshevists.

On page 374 he said:

We Americans, like the other allies, went there with those objects.

That is, to protect the railroad, and for perfectly legitimate purposes. He continued:

We stayed to fight imaginary Bolshevism. We gave our support to counterrevolutionaries like Kolchak instead of bolstering up Russian democracy with all the pillars we could construct out of our wealth and power. We provided the Japanese with their excuse for remaining.

Siberia is not Bolshevist, because it is populated by the descendants of political exiles, by the more adventurous and free-spirited Russians who came out as pioneers, and by the Cossacks, all of them more democratic than the Russians proper. Also the Siberians are not an urban people—there is not an industrial city in all Siberia—and even in European Russia it is only in the cities that there are Bolsheviki in any numbers. The Siberians had one ruling motive for their actions. That was to prevent the czarist régime from returning. For that reason they would have none of the numerous dictatorships, directorates, and other mushroom governments that sprang up in 1918 and 1919—Horvath in Harbin, Orloff in Pogranichnaya, Semenoff at large, and, conspicuously, Kolchak in Omsk, all of whom were reactionaries under an anti-Bolshevist disguise to deceive the Allies. And when the Siberians did for a time support the Bolshevist forces in western Siberia, after the defeat of Kolchak, it was because they knew that they at least would not restore czarism.

Again and again I have heard this from Russian workmen as I have traveled back and forth across Siberia. The Siberians had confidence in the Czechs, who understood them and their democratic aspirations and therefore hated the Kolchak régime, and pathetic trust in the Americans.

* * * * * * *

At this period those two butchers, Ivanoff-Rinoff and Rozanoff, were in the full power of their activity, and on a larger scale Kalmykoff and Semenoff. These men permitted their followers to torture their enemies, to brand them, gouge out their eyes, and whip them to death. Conscription of peasants was declared, but the peasants took to the hills, for they hated the Kolchak régime violently for its outrages. For revenge those who did not escape and the relatives of those who did were taken, tortured, and murdered. I have pictures and records of the bodies of victims, many pictures of corpses lying near to the charred ruins of their homes.

* * * * * * *

The Czechs were the first to show disaffection. They knew the Russian people and their dream of peaceful and democratic rule after their long agony. They knew the bitterness this cruel betrayal would work in them. The Czechs made formal protest, but although it was they who had done the fighting that kept the Bolshevist troops from swarming into Siberia, they were unheard. Some of the allied representatives joined in the protest. The railway committee, seeing the frustration of all its aims, sent telegrams to Kolchak and cablegrams to the home governments. Both were of no avail.

I ask permission to print this entire statement at the close of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. BORAH. I now read from the hearings before the committee:

The CHAIRMAN. Now, you were there on the ground all the time and in charge of that territory?

Colonel MORROW. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Commanding the American troops. You knew what was going on. You received your reports and talked with your own people, your own officers and men, and others. Who, in your opinion, as you were informed at the time, was responsible for these murders that were being committed in that territory?

Colonel MORROW. General Semenoff.

The CHAIRMAN. Had you any doubt about it at that time?

Colonel MORROW. No; nor had anyone else in all Siberia. It was the common report and the common knowledge of everybody. It was the commonest subject of conversation in that country, and all over it.

I have received some affidavits since the hearings closed from soldiers who were on that expedition, and I read from the sworn statement of John C. Steinel, of Battle Creek, Mich., who said:

Armored trains frequently stopped at our station, but as the Cossacks were supposed to be allies, and other detachments of Americans were on both sides of us, we never considered there was much danger, although we usually took a few precautions against a surprise attack. Midnight, January 9, 1921, the armored train Destroyer, commanded by General Bogomilich, arrived from the east at Posolskaya, and Lieutenant Kendall and myself were immediately notified by Sergeant Robbins, who was sergeant of the guard. Orders were issued to awaken the men and hold them in the cars in readiness, and I went over to the station to see if there was anything unusual, because the station agent had informed us early in the evening that there would be no trains coming in that night. Everything appeared to be normal and the train proceeded to take on wood and water.

The station agent was noticed on the train, but, considering the fact that they were supposed to be our allies, we told the men to go back to sleep but be prepared for an emergency. We increased the guard around the cars and at the bridge about a half mile from our box cars, but instructed the men they could go to sleep, as there appeared to be no immediate danger.

At 1 o'clock Sergeant Robbins reported that things looked suspicious, and he was ordered to get the men up immediately and personally to put the engine out of commission if anything started. Lieutenant Kendall and myself immediately prepared to go out, and just as we came out of our car we were met with a burst of machine-gun fire from the Cossacks' armored car, 40 feet away, directly opposite. Our men came out as quickly as possible, most of them having been asleep, and crawled under our cars and proceeded to return the fire, which was directed against the passenger coaches, where lights were seen, and against the engine, as it seemed hopeless to fire at the armored cars, which had 6-inch concrete walls, loopholes, and turret for their firing.

Sergeant Robbins was killed instantly when he attempted to board the engine, and Corporal Tommie had his heel blown off by a grenade at the same time. They continued firing at us for several minutes from that position, and then moved a few hundred yards east, opening with their 1-pounder and 3-inch fieldpieces in addition to the machine guns. Our men, deployed under Lieutenant Kendall on the south side of the track, advanced toward the armored train, while I took an automatic-rifle squad of four men on the north side of the track, and for 45 minutes kept up a continual fire. It was 25 below zero, a bright moonlight night, with the snow about knee deep.

In addition to Sergeant Robbins, who was killed instantly, Private Montgomery died in a few hours from a machine-gun wound in the body and Corporal Tommie was wounded by a grenade.

They claimed that it was all a mistake; that they were changing guards and did not know the machine guns were loaded; but all indications pointed to the fact that they were prepared and they had expected to wipe us out and then burn the village, because of some trouble with the station agent. We later found that the station agent had sent a telegram to Chita requesting that an armored train be sent to this station because of some trouble.

The attack was unexpected and unwarranted, as they were supposed to be our allies, and I believe that General Bogomilich, who was on this train and who was in charge of all of Semenoff's armored trains, made a deliberate attempt to wipe out the American detachment, and was acting under orders from his chief, Ataman Semenoff. We were the only American detachment close to the tracks, where the Cossacks could attack with armored train, as others were in barracks away from railroad.

I have also the affidavit of Capt. William F. Gent, which I will ask to have inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Supreme Court, New York County.

John N. Boyle, trustee in bankruptcy of Youroveta Home & Foreign Trade Co. (Inc.), plaintiff, against Gregory Semenoff, defendant.

STATE OF NEW YORK, County of New York, ss:

William F. Gent, being duly sworn, deposes and says:

"I am a captain in the United States Army; from August, 1919, until March, 1920, I was in Siberia on duty with the American Expeditionary Forces, and beginning September 22, 1919, until March, 1920, I was intelligence officer in the Twenty-seventh Infantry on duty in the Trans-Baikal region.

"I have read a copy of the affidavit of Gen. William S. Graves, verified the 4th day of April, 1922, and I am familiar with the episode referred to therein, concerning the killing of certain American soldiers. This action occurred on or about the 10th day of January, 1920, at 1 o'clock in the morning, at Posolskaya, which was in the said Trans-Baikal region. On January 14, 1920, Semenoff's men, who had shot upon the American troops, were brought to the regimental headquarters of the Twenty-seventh Infantry at Berozovka; there were 4 officers and 48 men. All of them were interviewed in my office in reference to their acts. They admitted that they were under Semenoff and gave various statements in regard to their activities, which are referred to in the affidavit of Charles H. Smith, concerning the extract from the article by Junius B. Wood. The statements contained therein are true to the best of my knowledge and belief. I have in my possession a personal diary, which I made at the time, and under date of January 14, 1920, I find the following entry:

"'Started examining prisoners to-day; some of the testimony given is horrible—murders, rapes, robberies, and everything imaginable. Most of the men are drafted men and don't like the work, but are forced to do it. They are afraid to run away.'

"Among other things these men told of the following incident: In the month of December, 1919, they captured civilians—consisting of 14 men and 1 woman. They stated that the woman had been outraged by the officers and the men, and thereafter the woman and the 14 men were taken to the river, which was frozen, and were forced to chop a hole in the ice and were then lined up and shot. The bodies were then crammed through the hole in the ice, whether there was life in them or not. The men who told me the foregoing actually took part in the shooting and rape. They stated that the incident occurred at Olovyanaya. Thereafter, I went to said place to verify their statements and saw the hole in the ice which they had described.

"These men also verified reports that we had received concerning the disposition of two trainloads of prisoners which Semenoff's men had captured. The reports were that these were civil prisoners, captured by Semenoff's men. Both of these trains had been moved back and forth along the Siberian railroad sealed. One of the trains contained in the neighborhood of 1,230 persons and the other in the neighborhood of 800 persons. The prisoners were sick with cholera and typhus, and many had died. The train containing about 1,230 was brought to Makavyeyeva. There it was unloaded and all the prisoners were lined up and shot down by machine guns. The other train, containing about 800 prisoners, was brought to Adrianovka and the prisoners were there unloaded and also shot down by machine guns. The soldiers who described this had either taken part in the same or had first-hand information. The former place became generally known as 'The Barrel of Blood' and the latter became generally known as 'The Bucket of Blood.' After receiving this report, I personally went to Adrianovka and verified the statements made to me by the soldiers. I there saw a long trench which was covered with railroad ties. I pulled aside several of these and there saw the bones and clothes of numerous human bodies.

"The foregoing are mere isolated instances which were brought to my attention of the atrocities committed by Semenoff's men—supposedly acting under his orders. He was generally regarded as a mere free-lance bandit, and was thoroughly hated and despised by all the American troops and most of the Russian population because of his abuse of the civilians. By his general attitude he was considered as very antagonistic to Americans and their operations, and did everything possible to obstruct American movements in Siberia.

"WM. F. GENT,
"Captain, Twenty-second Infantry, U. S. A."

Sworn to before me this 5th day of April, 1922.

PAULA GROSS,
Notary Public, New York Co., No. 357, N. Y. Reg. No. 3183.
Commission expires March 30, 1923.

Mr. BORAH. This is a very brief statement with reference to what the record discloses. It would seem that General Semenoff was in complete control of this territory; that he was the supreme authority, so far as the Russian forces were concerned, for that territory at times, although at times he seemed, in a way, to recognize the authority of Kolchak.

During the time that he was in control of this territory a reign of massacre continued such as I know nothing of in all the history of the world. As the hearings disclose, they took one day 53 carloads of prisoners, from 30 to 35 people in a car—people whom they had taken from the different localities and communities not as the result of a fight or a contest or battle but people they had picked up from their homes out of the suburbs or the villages—drove them out to the slaughter pens, as they called them, two different trains running out for that purpose, marched them off the trains, turned the machine guns on them, slaughtered them, and pushed them over into the holes which had been dug, as if they were animals. These facts are narrated by officers and soldiers of the American Army. They are corroborated by the American representative of the Siberian interallied railway commission. They are all but indescribable and unbelievable. But the facts narrated compel us to believe.

There can be very little doubt in the mind of anyone from this record that it was Semenoff's desire to drive the American forces out of that territory. The officers in charge of the American forces entertained little doubt in regard to it. It was, I presume, because the American forces were there really seeking to protect the railroad and were not interested in the kind of a campaign in which Semenoff was interested. They were, in other words, a hindrance to the full execution of his purpose and his murderous schemes, and this attack upon the 10th of January was, from the evidence as it appears to us, a deliberate attack upon what were supposed to be the friendly forces there representing our interests. We had two soldiers killed, others wounded—they were in every sense murdered. Only the vigilance and the courage of our men prevented the entire number at that point from being assassinated. The man who is responsible for it is now our guest in this country.

Mr. President, when Semenoff came to this country among the first gentlemen whom he visited was Boris Bakhmeteff. A subpœna was issued for Bakhmeteff and he refused to respond. The subpœna was answered through the Secretary of State stating that Bakhmeteff was the recognized ambassador of the Russian Government, and that he was therefore protected by virtue of the statute with which we are all familiar and the principle of which no one desires to question.

Early in the spring of 1917 the Imperial Government of Russia fell. It was succeeded by the "new provisional government of Russia," as it was called, which was recognized by our Government April 12, 1917. George Bakhmeteff, the resident imperial ambassador, immediately presented his resignation to the Secretary of State, Mr. Lansing, and left the embassy. On the 26th of April the minister of foreign affairs of the provisional government, Paul Milukoff, at Petrograd, sent Boris Bakhmeteff as special commissioner to the United States. Boris Bakhmeteff, as such special commissioner designated, with his assistants, arrived in Tokyo about May 20. In the meantime the provisional government had fallen and Kerensky was in control.

On May 15, 1917, the Kerensky government had revoked the orders of Milukoff and authorized Bakhmeteff "to proceed to Washington and await further instructions there." Bakhmeteff at this time was not accredited to this Government as ambassador and had no other instructions from the then existing Russian Government than to proceed to Washington and await instructions. I desire to say here that I have not been able to consult original sources, but I feel sure the facts as I state them are substantially correct.

On June 19, 1917, Bakhmeteff arrived in the city of Washington and at once took possession of the Russian Embassy. July 5 he was formally recognized as ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary from Russia to the United States of America.

It is said, Mr. President, upon what seems to be good authority, that Kerensky made no secret of his dislike as to the selection of Bakhmeteff, and was at first disposed to direct his return to Russia, but changed the order and directed him to proceed to Washington to await instructions, and it was in that manner that he arrived. Boris Bakhmeteff, as I understand, had visited America prior to this and was supposed to have been interested in placing some investments here for the Czar. He was, in other words, thought to be too closely associated with the Czarist party to be satisfactory to Kerensky. But he is supposed to have directed him to proceed to Washington for further instructions.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator, for information, when Bakhmeteff was recognized by our Government as ambassador, did he present credentials? He must have done so, I presume.

Mr. BORAH. I do not speak with absolute accuracy, but I am informed that he never did present any credentials until about the 25th of August, when a question arose in the mind of Mr. McAdoo whether he had not been paying out about enough money until he saw some credentials. Then some correspondence took place between the Secretary of State and the Secretary of the Treasury, and there may be credentials in the office of the Secretary of State dating from about that time. I do not think there were before. I doubt very much if there is now—that is, credentials in the usual form accrediting him as ambassador. There is much doubt upon that question.

Mr. LODGE. I only wanted to ascertain if there had been any credentials presented. I thought there must have been credentials presented at some time.

Mr. BORAH. My opinion is that there are not to-day in the State Department any credentials in proper form accrediting Bakhmeteff to this country. I should be very glad to see them if they are there. All the evidence points to the fact that they finally continued to do business with him upon a cablegram from the Kerensky government that Kerensky recognized him, but no formal accrediting and proper credentials, so far as I have been able to ascertain, and we can only deal with this from the outside, have ever been presented. Of course, not having access to the files, I may be mistaken.

Bakhmeteff was recognized July 5, 1917. On July 6, 1917, he went to the Secretary of the Treasury and got a loan of $35,000,000.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, will the Senator give those dates again?

Mr. BORAH. On July 5, 1917, Bakhmeteff was recognized as ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary from Russia. On July 6, 1917, according to the record as I have seen it——

Mr. LODGE. The very next day?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; the next day he went to the Treasury and secured a loan of $35,000,000. On July 13, 1917, Boris Bakhmeteff again drew upon the Secretary of the Treasury for $10,000,000. On August 25, 1917, the press carried this statement:

> Word from Ambassador Francis has encouraged the State Department in the success of the provisional government and a further loan of $100,000,000 has been made to the new ambassador, Boris Bakhmeteff.

On November 17, nine days after the Kerensky government had fallen, as a matter of fact, Bakhmeteff had secured from this Government loans to the amount of $187,729,750. This all took place between July 6, 1917, and November 17, 1917.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I am very much interested in the figures the Senator is giving. I hope I shall not disturb him by asking a question?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly not.

Mr. LODGE. About that time—I can not give the exact date—there was some bond bill before the Committee on Finance and the then Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. McAdoo, came before the committee. In the course of the discussion on that bill inquiries were made as to this matter of credits and, as I recall it, when he was asked about the Russian credit he said that at that time—and I have not the exact date—he had given a credit of $90,000,000, but that $45,000,000 was retained in order to pay for locomotives contracted for by the Russian Government, and that the other $45,000,000 was in the hands of Bakhmeteff. I know that statement was made in substantially the form in which I have given it, but it now appears that Bakhmeteff had a great deal more than the sum Mr. McAdoo named.

Mr. BORAH. I will say to the Senator that I obtained these facts from an examination of the hearings. There have been two or three hearings in which the facts have been discussed. For instance, in the hearing with reference to the deportation of Martens they were pretty fully gone into. There was a hearing before the House Committee on Foreign Affairs in which the matter was discussed. I may not be absolutely accurate as to all these dates, but I am sufficiently accurate to make substantially true the statement which I am presenting. A date would not be material if there is a discrepancy of a day or two.

In the meantime the Kerensky government had fallen on November 8, 1917. On November 15 Francis, our ambassador, notified the Secretary of State that the Kerensky government had fallen. Kerensky went into exile. His entire structure disappeared. It has never assumed to perform any of the functions of government since. The government which Bakhmeteff assumed to represent ceased to exist completely and absolutely.

Now, Mr. President, I desire to make some observations with reference to the present status of Bakhmeteff, and I do so with entire respect for the Secretary of State, entertaining simply a difference of opinion with reference to the application of the statute.

I can not conceive of a man being an ambassador without a government. Since the 8th day of November, 1917, there has been in existence no government which Mr. Bakhmeteff has assumed to represent. Since that time there has been reared a different government, a structure which calls itself the soviet government, and that government, whatever it may be, is nevertheless the only government which exists in Russia, superseding, as it did, the Kerensky government. It has raised armies and maintained armies and has fought battles. It has been recognized by other governments, has made trade contracts with a number of other governments, and is to-day recognized throughout the world as the government in Russia. I do not mean to say by that that all governments have recognized it in the sense that they have been willing to accept an ambassador, and so forth, but our own officers and our own Government have proceeded upon the theory that the Kerensky government is gone and that the soviet government is there doing business. The soviet government, which succeeded the Kerensky government, is now represented at Genoa in one of the most important international conferences in the history of nations. It is the government of Russia.

How could there be such a thing as an ambassador enjoying the immunities and privileges of an ambassador after his government has disappeared? The privilege of an ambassador, the immunity of an ambassador, belongs and attaches to the office and not the individual. It is the government, not the individual, whose privilege and immunity is covered by the statute.

I could cite for an hour the incidents in which we have recognized the existence of the soviet government. For instance, Mr. Colby, in his letter of August 10, 1920, in one paragraph, said.

> It is not possible for the Government of the United States to recognize the present rulers of Russia as a government with which the relations common to friendly governments can be maintained.

And again:

> In the view of this Government there can not be any common ground upon which it can stand with a power whose conceptions of international relations are so entirely alien to its own, so utterly repugnant to its moral sense. There can be no mutual confidence or trust, no respect even, if pledges are to be given and agreements made with a cynical repudiation of their obligations already in the mind of one of the parties. We can not recognize, hold official relations with, or give friendly receptions to the agents of a government which is determined and bound to conspire against our institutions; whose diplomats will be the agitators of dangerous revolts; whose spokesmen say that they sign agreements with no intention of keeping them.

We recognize the fact that there is a government there so inimical to our conception of what government should be that we have refused to recognize it—nevertheless a government. There it is. We do not like it, but we admit and proceed upon the theory that the soviet government exists and that the government of Kerensky does not exist. We recognized the former; it is gone. We refuse to recognize the latter, but there it is. To illustrate: Would anyone claim that Kerensky is president or chief ruler of any government anywhere? Yet we have on our hands here an ambassador of that government of which Kerensky was chief head.

Upon page 5 the Secretary of Labor, Mr. Wilson, in a letter to Charles Recht, Esq., counselor at law, 114 West Fortieth Street, New York, recognizes the same state of affairs as is outlined in the Colby letter.

On page 13 the President of the United States, in his address to Congress at the beginning of his administration, said:

> We do not recognize the government of Russia nor tolerate the propaganda which emanates therefrom, but we do not forget the traditions of Russian friendship.

There are any number of instances in which we have proceeded upon the theory that the government which Bakhmeteff was supposed to represent, of which he is the ambassador, if he is an ambassador, has disappeared, and no government which accepts him has taken its place. That condition of affairs has existed for nearly five years. Now, is it possible, Mr. President, that a man may be an ambassador, enjoying the privileges and the immunities of an ambassador, unless he has a government back of him? The rights, the privileges, and the immunities attach to the office and not to the individual. When the government disappears the office disappears. His government has been abolished, as it were, just as if we were to abolish a judgeship, the judge would disappear; he would not be permitted to draw his salary or to perform his functions. Bakhmeteff's government exists no more, and has not existed for five years. Under those circumstances it seems to me that we ought to be entitled to ask Mr. Bakhmeteff to come before the committee.

I am perfectly aware that we are advised through the public prints and through what seem to be inspired articles that we can get Mr. Bakhmeteff's statement through the Secretary of State. In the first place, Mr. President, so far as I am individually concerned, I do not propose to recognize the perfectly fraudulent claim that he is an ambassador. In the second place, that kind of an examination, under the peculiar circumstances which exist in this matter, would be utterly worthless. There are some precedents along this line which I find in Mr. Moore's Digest of International Law. In 1856, as an illustration, a case of homicide occurred in Washington in the presence of the Dutch minister, whose testimony was deemed altogether material for the trial. Inasmuch as he was exempt from the ordinary processes to compel the attendance of witnesses, an application was made by the District attorney, through the Secretary of State, to M. Dubois to appear and testify. The minister having refused, by the unanimous advice of his colleagues, in a note of 11th of May, 1856, to appear as a witness, Mr. Marcy on May 15, 1856, instructed Mr. Belmont, minister of the United States at The Hague, to bring the matter to the attention of the Netherlands Government.

Now, Mr. President, suppose that the situation here was sufficiently serious to impress the mind of the Secretary of State that Mr. Bakhmeteff ought to appear, and that Mr. Bakhmeteff should, upon the advice of his colleagues of the diplomatic corps, refuse to appear, and the Secretary of State desired to do the only thing that he could do, to take the matter up with his government. with what government would he take it up? To what government is Bakhmeteff responsible, and how could he be compelled to comply either with our request or the request of his government? He enjoys the immunities, he enjoys the privileges of an ambassador, and yet he has no government and no one to whom we could make him responsible, even if we desired.

In his note Mr. Marcy said:

> It is not doubted that both by the usage of nations and the laws of the United States, M. Dubois has the legal right to decline to give his testimony; but he is at perfect liberty to exercise his privilege to the extent requested, and by doing so he does not subject himself to the jurisdiction of the country. The circumstances of this case are such as to appeal strongly to the universal sense of justice. In the event of M. Van Hall's suggestion that M. Dubois might give his deposition out of court in the case, you will not omit to state that by our Constitution, in all criminal prosecutions, the accused has the right to be confronted with the witnesses against him, and hence, in order that the testimony should be legal, it must be given before the court.

I have not been able to find out from Mr. Moore's work just what became of this case, but I find in Halleck's International Law this statement:

> In 1856 the United States of America requested the recall of the minister of the Netherlands for having refused to appear before the court in the city of Washington to give his testimony in a criminal cause which was then pending, and in which this minister was a most important witness.

It would seem, therefore, from the facts as given to us in Moore's Digest of International Law and from the quotation from Mr. Halleck's International Law that Mr. Marcy finally requested the recall of the Dutch minister because he refused to testify.

I submit that in the present instance there is no one with whom we may lodge any such request; there is no one with whom we may correspond, to whom we may make a suggestion with reference to the proper conduct of the alleged ambassador of the Russian government here.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Idaho a question at that point for information?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. I presume that in the investigation of this matter he may have some information of which I have no knowledge whatever. The question I wish to ask is, Has any government or any body that has assumed to act as a government of the Russian people notified our Government that Bakhmeteff no longer represents the government of Russia?

Mr. BORAH. I do not know definitely. I am of the opinion that fact was brought to the attention of our Government.

Mr. McCUMBER. The facts which the Senator gives and which are within our own knowledge would upon their face indicate, of course, that there is a different government in Russia from that which Bakhmeteff at one time represented. But has that government in any way represented to our Government a statement that Bakhmeteff no longer represents Russia?

Mr. BORAH. Well, Martens came to this country for the purpose of doing something of that kind, but they put him under investigation and deported him. He did make a demand upon Bakhmeteff for the possession of the Russian embassy and for its property; and I will not be positive about it, but he made known the fact to Bakhmeteff and also to the Government here that he assumed to represent the soviet government and desired to be recognized as such representative. Whether he formally presented any credentials I do not know.

Mr. President, it is not an immaterial matter with me that Mr. Bakhmeteff should refuse to appear at this hearing. One of the first men that Semenoff called upon was Bakhmeteff. There have been different reports made as to what occurred, but as those reports are not verified in the sense that I could state them as being absolutely reliable, perhaps it would be better that I should not state them in detail; but sufficient reports have been made to make it exceedingly important for the committee to be informed concerning the facts charged with reference to Bakhmeteff's reception of Semenoff, why he wanted to see him, and what Semenoff's business in this country was. Under the circumstances those questions are of sufficient importance to make it exceedingly interesting for the committee to know about them.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, does the Senator know where Bakhmeteff saw Semenoff? Was it here in Washington?

Mr. BORAH. I understand so; but it may have been in New York.

Mr. STERLING. When was it?

Mr. BORAH. It was some time shortly after Semenoff arrived in the country, but the date I can not give. It was, however, before the investigation conducted by the committee took place.

Mr. STERLING. There was no testimony in regard to it in the hearings, was there?

Mr. BORAH. No; there was no testimony with regard to it, but there is no doubt that he saw Bakhmeteff. The only doubt is in regard as to what took place after he saw him, as to what part Bakhmeteff took in this entire affair. For instance, there was published an interview given out by Bakhmeteff to the press. I read afterwards that it was contradicted, but I do not know whether that is true or not. There is no doubt, however, that Semenoff saw Bakhmeteff, consulted with him, counseled with him. As to why he wanted to see him and what he did after he arrived at the Russian Embassy and what comfort he got out of the situation, I do not know. There are only two men who know that. One of them I am seeking to bring before the committee.

There is another phase of this matter, Mr. President, in which I am interested. Mr. Bakhmeteff has received from this Government a loan of $187,000,000. My investigation leads me to the conclusion that no part of that money ever served the Russian people or any Government of the Russian people. I do not believe that any Russian Government or the Russian people ever received the slightest advantage or benefit from that $187,000,000, or any part of it. I am perfectly aware that it is said there was an effort to make purchases and to provide materials which would be utilized for the benefit of the Russian people.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit another question?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. STERLING. Does the Senator recall the time when Semenoff was in Washington or was reported to be in Washington?

Mr. BORAH. No; I do not.

Mr. STERLING. I will say to the Senator I do not remember to have heard that he was ever in Washington, and in consultation with Senators in their seats they do not recall that he was ever in Washington.

Mr. BORAH. I can not state what the fact may be as to that, but so far as my view of it is concerned, it is wholly immaterial where Semenoff saw Bakhmeteff; whether Bakhmeteff went to New York or went to San Francisco to meet him.

Mr. STERLING. I understood the Senator to say a while ago in answer to my question that he had seen him in Washington.

Mr. BORAH. I so understand, and I have letters in my possession which state that fact, but I can not assure the Senator that the statement is correct. I undertake to say, however, that there is not a particle of doubt that Semenoff saw Bakhmeteff and talked with him.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I should like to ask what Semenoff is doing in this country?

Mr. BORAH. The statement was made that Semenoff was on his way to France; that he was simply passing through this country. I do not believe that to be true. I think he was here for the purpose of raising money to start another movement in Siberia. There was an interview given out at Tokyo that that was his purpose in coming here, and there are a great many things to indicate that that is what he had in mind, until a disturbance was made with reference to his coming. Since that time he has not, of course, pursued his purposes, even if he entertained them in the first instance.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, may I be allowed a word there?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. STERLING. As I recall the testimony in the case, it showed that he merely made an application for transit through the country, in the first place, and his original application was turned down; permission was refused him; but afterwards the special board of inquiry changed their decision and admitted him for transit across the country, if I remember correctly.

Mr. BORAH. The statement that he was admitted simply for transit is correct, but it amounts to nothing, for the reason that he could stay just as long as he wanted to stay by forfeiting the deposit. It will be recalled that the Commissioner General of Immigration, before the committee, said that a transit permit really amounted to nothing; that the person who was given such permission could remain here indefinitely if he desired to, but that if he remained in the country he would not have returned to him the $8 which, it seems, it is necessary to deposit to secure such a permit.

Mr. OVERMAN. Has Semenoff been ordered deported?

Mr. BORAH. No.

Mr. OVERMAN. He has been arrested, has he not?

Mr. BORAH. He was arrested in a civil case, under a civil judgment for confiscations which he made of some property in Siberia, and the court at Harbin rendered judgment against him. It was under that judgment that he was arrested.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator please, is he in this country now?

Mr. BORAH. He is somewhere about New York.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not know what the rulings of the Department of Labor should be in the matter, but I assume that the right of transit does not give the right to remain indefinitely in the country.

Mr. BORAH. I am of the opinion, from a letter which I have from the Secretary of Labor, that he is getting a little impatient about Semenoff's long stay, and my opinion is that the Secretary of Labor will take due action in regard to him. That would be my judgment. The testimony is now in the hands of the Secretary of Labor, and I think the record discloses that the Labor Department did not desire Semenoff's coming into this country at all in the first instance. All the facts which I have read here have been on file with the departments from the beginning—General Grave's report, including Colonel Morrow's report, and Smith's report—and these matters were brought to the attention in brief of the immigration officers at the port where Semenoff was admitted; but, for some reason or other, they saw fit to admit him, possibly upon the theory that they believed that he was just passing across the country.

I was going to say, Mr. President, that Mr. Bakhmeteff has secured from this Government in excess of $187,000,000. From the most diligent inquiry I have been able to pursue, I can not find that the Russian people ever received any benefit from that.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator restate the dates within which that amount of money was received by him from this Government?

Mr. BORAH. From the 6th day of July, 1917, to the 17th day of November, 1917.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question in that connection? It has been stated that with this money that was turned over to Russia certain military supplies were purchased, and that after the downfall of the Kerensky government these military supplies were sold and purchased by our Government.

Mr. BORAH. Part of them were, I think, perhaps all of them; I do not know; but part of them were.

Mr. POMERENE. And that the money for those purchases was paid over to representatives of the Russian Government, when it is stated that the amount of those supplies thus purchased by this Government should have been credited on the debt of Russia to this Government. Has the Senator any information on that subject?

Mr. BORAH. I think the Senator has stated it correctly. I have been unable to understand why, for instance, our Government purchased back these supplies; but we paid the money over to Boris Bakhmeteff.

Mr. POMERENE. I can understand why we might have purchased back those supplies, and done it in a proper way; but I do not understand why we did not get credit for the amount on the money which was due this Government from the Russian Government.

Mr. BORAH. I was going to say that that is the precise proposition about which I should like to have an opportunity of questioning the ex-ambassador. The transaction may be all right. On the face of it, it looks very bad. If it is all right, there is not any reason in the world why he should not come before a committee and state the facts. He is relying upon his immunity and his privilege as an ambassador from a government which he knows does not exist, which of itself, in my mind, brands the entire transaction with a wrongful purpose.

Mr. POMERENE. It seems to me there is another way of getting at that fact, if the Senator desires it. Certainly there must be some one in authority here in this Government who knows whether or not these purchases were made by our Government from the representatives of the Russian Government.

Mr. BORAH. I think there is no doubt about that. That has been shown.

Mr. POMERENE. And it can then be further ascertained whether or not the amount of those purchases was credited on the debt which Russia owed to us.

Mr. BORAH. Those facts could be gathered. I think it will be found that those facts are already gathered; but I want to know what has become of the money which has been in Bakhmeteff's hands since the time we paid it back to him for the purchase of these things.

Mr. President, the statement which I am about to make I wish to make with due consideration.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. Do I understand from the Senator that there has been paid to somebody more than $187,000,000, or whatever it is?

Mr. BORAH. No.

Mr. LENROOT. I understood from the question of the Senator from Ohio that he understood that that sum was paid, and then an additional sum for the repurchase of goods by this Government.

Mr. POMERENE. I was a little preoccupied at the moment and I did not hear the Senator's question.

Mr. LENROOT. I asked the Senator whether he understood that more money was paid to somebody on the Russian loan than the original amount of the loan.

Mr. POMERENE. Oh, no.

Mr. BORAH. No; I do not understand that.

Mr. LENROOT. I understood the Senator to inquire why this money was not credited. He understands that when this Government purchased goods it paid additional cash for them.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator from Idaho made the statement that loans were made approximating $187,000,000. With that money, as I understood, Russian representatives bought military supplies. Later the Kerensky government fell. They had no need for these supplies in this country, and they could not be transported to Russia under that peculiar situation. It was at that juncture that it is said that the United States Government repurchased from these Russian agents or representatives these military supplies. At that time the Russian Government owed us $187,000,000; and my query is, Why was not the amount of those purchases credited on that loan of $187,000,000?

Mr. LENROOT. That was my question to the Senator from Idaho, and the Senator from Idaho states that he does not think more than an aggregate of about $187,000,000 was paid out. The Senator's question involves $187,000,000 plus whatever sum was paid for the repurchase of the supplies.

Mr. POMERENE. No, no.

Mr. LENROOT. I can not understand it in any other way.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, were not a great many railroad engines bought for the Russians in this country which, through the Railroad Administration here, were transferred somehow, by purchase or otherwise? I think during the war they bought a number of engines from the Baldwin Co., and they were transferred and were sold here, probably to the railroad director, by the Russian Government. What became of the money I do not know.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have not looked it up of late, but this is as I understand the transaction:

In the year 1917 the Government of the United States advanced to the Russian Government $187,000,000 at different periods within six months' time. Those advances were made for the purpose of purchasing goods in the United States, just as the Senator from Ohio says. The purchases were made and the payments for those goods were made to a certain extent out of the $187,000,000 advanced by this Government.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. How much?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not remember exactly how much the goods that this Government bought back from the Russian Government were; but I think the position that was taken was that after the Government of the United States had loaned this money to the Russian Government whatever goods were purchased with that money belonged to the Russian Government, and in case they sold the goods, if they sold them to the Government of the United States, the Government of the United States had to pay for them. If Russia had sold them to the Baldwin Locomotive Co., the Baldwin Locomotive Co. would have to pay for them; and I understand, Mr. President, that Russia was paid the money, and that was not a part of the $187,000,000 that was loaned. That money went for the purchase of the goods sold by Russia. The goods belonged to Russia, and the money received for those goods was in addition to the $187,000,000 loaned to the Russian Government.

Mr. BORAH. In addition to that, Mr. President, from time to time small sums, I do not know to what extent, have been paid to Bakhmeteff for the purpose of maintaining the embassy here.

Mr. SMOOT. I think I have that amount here.

Mr. BORAH. I was about to say, Mr. President, that since this hearing was begun a number of statements have been made to me as to how this money has been used. A priest of the Greek Church has appeared in my office twice and has made statements in some detail as to certain investments which have been made. He has given the details; he has given the property; he has told where it is, and says that he is perfectly familiar with the facts and is willing to testify in regard to the matter. Other statements have been made along the same line, but not so much in detail.

This is the question which I submit: Is it to the interest of this Government to give Mr. Bakhmeteff his immunity as an ambassador—ambassador of a government which disappeared five years ago—when the question of his relationship in this country to Semenoff, the man who assassinated American soldiers and who murdered right and left, is under investigation? Upon what possible theory shall we throw about him a shelter designed to protect men who in fact represent governments, ambassadors in good faith, maintaining the dignity and the honor of their governments? Under what theory shall we throw that protection about him, when we know that his government no longer exists?

Secondly, I think it is due to those who have to pay the amounts which are loaned to these governments that the real facts concerning the use of this money be known. If this money has been invested in private property in the cities of New York and Chicago, it must be manifest that it is not being utilized in the manner in which this Government designed that it should be at the time it was loaned. It must be manifest that some one has broken faith. It must be perfectly manifest that he is no longer representing or pretending to represent a government as its ambassador, but that he is representing himself and making his investments.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. No other interpretation can be placed upon the language cautiously and carefully used by the Senator from Idaho than that this pseudo ambassador has appropriated this money to his own use and invested it in property in New York and Chicago and taken the title in his own name.

Mr. BORAH. No; he has not taken it in his own name. He has taken it in the name of a corporation which was organized for the purpose of holding it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Who were the incorporators?

Mr. BORAH. The names of the incorporators I have not on my desk, but I have them in my office, and the name of the company, and the description of the property, and the street where it is located.

Mr. President, I say again that these facts are put out by men who are perfectly responsible. There is just one man who can put the matter in such condition or give such explanation that there can be no longer any question about it. If he is acting in good faith, he will no longer for a moment claim the privilege of this statute. He will not shelter himself behind the privileges and immunities of a statute designed and intended to protect the rights of governments and not individuals.

He will come out from under cover, a false and fraudulent cover, and give the American people and his own people a statement of the true facts in regard to it, and he will explain why he received a man who is now regarded as the monster of the modern world.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho has just made the statement that a corporation was organized, and that this property was in the possession of that corporation, or in its name. Clearly, that corporation must have some books, there must be certain officials, and those officials could be called before the committee, it would seem to me.

Mr. BORAH. They can be; but, Mr. President, I am determined, so far as I am concerned, to go to the source of authority in this matter. There must be some reason for protecting this man with which the public is not yet familiar. The reason may be a perfectly legitimate one, and do credit to those who are relying upon it, but as the facts now appear, Mr. President, the result of protection is to shield one who has not dealt with this Government or with his own government according to the principles of honest dealing.

APPENDIX.

WHAT HAPPENED IN SIBERIA.

(By Charles H. Smith, McAlpin Hotel.)

It was St. Petersburg on that unforgetable Saturday in March, 1917. I was out in the Nevsky Prospekt to see how much excitement there was after the strike that had been called the night before. In the crowd I was brushed against one of my Russian friends of the upper classes and we stopped to chat. "The old régime will fall," he said, and then, pausing to enjoy the obvious effect of his words as registered on my face, "that will end it forever." I thought that he was mad; and so would have thought every other foreigner in Russia that day, and nearly every Russian.

The truth of his words I have seen vindicated by events every day from then until a few months ago, when I returned to America, and everywhere across the endless reaches of Russia from the Gallic quondam capital to its farthest outpost on the Pacific. Seven or eight times since then I have crossed Siberia, and it is with the Siberian reflection of the revolution that I have had most contact. By reason of my work my contact has been necessarily most intimate.

A railroad man by profession, I went to Russia in a private capacity in 1916. When America entered the war I was dissuaded from going to France by Mr. Francis, our ambassador, who told me there would be no lack of opportunity for service in Russia, which only one who knew Russia and its language could do. And a few months later I was appointed American aid to Mr. L. A. Oustrougoff, associate minister of communications, chosen by the Kerensky government as special commissar for the rehabilitation of the Trans-Siberian Railway. Less than a year later, when the allied expeditionary forces arrived in Siberia, I was appointed American representative on the interallied railway committee, to which was assigned the coordination of all communications in Siberia and the restoration of transportation. On the board were Russian, British, American, French, Japanese, Chinese, Italian, and Czech representatives. Among those who sat on the committee at different periods were: For Great Britain, Sir Charles Eliot, now ambassador to Japan; W. E. O'Reilly, now minister to Bolivia; and W. G. Hodgson, now trade commissioner to Soviet Russia; for France, M. Bourgois, of the embassy at Tokyo, and M. André, consul at Vladivostok; for Japan, Mr. Matsudaira, secretary general of the Japanese delegation to the recent Washington conference. I sat throughout as American representative.

The railway is the key to political and economic control of Siberia and also the most valuable developed asset, and therefore the biggest stake in the country. It and its branches are the only fast means of communication. The committee became therefore the clearing house of all military, diplomatic, and political activities of the intervention. Before troop movements could be made, or government supplies or even commercial shipments forwarded, the committee had to be consulted. It was therefore on the inside of the inside of Siberian affairs. Under the committee, it should also be explained, were two boards—the technical board, to supervise operations, and the military transportation board, to coordinate military traffic.

For three years I sat with the committee, reporting directly to the State Department and receiving instructions from the State Department. I went as a railway man and found myself soon with the duties of a diplomat. There I saw not only what my Russian friend had prophesied, but what no man could have prophesied: Siberia, for decades the continent-wide dungeon of the freest spirits of Russia, became a new arena of international contention, one with the Balkans, the Near East, the African coast, and China, especially China. Both countries have become "problems" out of the same causes—the disturbing influences of a selfish alien interference. They afford a new piece of evidence for Shaw's dictum that history tells us that we never learn anything by what history tells us; while repenting by way of international conferences for the errors we made in China a hundred years ago, we repeat simultaneously the same errors in Siberia. And I am convinced in my own mind that we shall some day see in Siberia, too, as we are beginning dimly to see in China, that there can be no progress without threat to the peace of the world unless Siberia is free from foreign interference and unhampered in working out its problems.

Nor is the method of solving these problems inconsequential to the future of any country, no matter how distant. Siberia is now remote, sparsely populated, and of small immediate political importance. But it is a great storehouse of raw material, and the world is crying for fuel to feed the fires left dying by the war. Remember that before the war one-ninth of the world's gold production came from Siberia. In Siberia are the largest timber supplies in the world and the biggest fisheries. There are huge, undeveloped fields of coal and oil and minerals. Siberia may also become a world granary, as was European Russia. Monopolistic control of Siberia's resources may well produce another war.

As in Siberia, so in China, the concrete, pressing question is, What shall we do with Japan? In Siberia, also, Japan is the enfant terrible with giant ambitions. In its broadest outlines the present situation in Siberia can be briefly put. The wave of counter-revolution has passed. It will not recur, unless rolled up by the magnetic force of foreign gold, in this case Japanese gold, with French moral contributions. There is at Chita a struggling government, known as the Far Eastern Republic. Whatever may be true of the private economic beliefs of some of the men at the head of it, it is a democratic government. It is not Bolshevist nor communist, because Siberia itself is not Bolshevist nor communist, and it never has been and never will be, unless alien invasion gives the Siberian peasantry no choice except between alien conquerors and their own rulers, even though the latter are Bolshevist. And with respect to the competency of the government, I can testify that where its sway is unchallenged there is order. Disorder exists only where there are foreign troops and consequent foreign meddling. The irksomeness of alien regulations to civilian populations, the friction produced by the arrogance of conquering troops, the resultant defiances by the civilians inevitably produce a clash. Sometimes they are intended to have precisely that effect.

The chief obstacle to the consolidation of power by the Chita government and the extension of its sway over all Siberia is the presence of Japanese troops. The Japanese now have troops in and about Vladivostok, on the coast and on the Chinese Eastern Railway, between Manchuria and the Siberian border. Since Vladivostok is the only important port of entry, as well as the chief commercial distributing point and the railhead, its control by Japan may be likened to a clutch on a single artery somewhere in the human body that can choke off the circulation of blood over the whole body. You have only to consider what would be the results if an alien power held the New York terminus of the New York Central Railroad and the harbor. Also, Japanese control of Vladivostok can and does serve as a breeding place for counter-revolutions, local disturbances, and subtler forms of obstruction. First one Russian hireling, and then another, is bought by bribery, fitted out and sent off either as a frank bandit or as a more ambitious insurrecto by the Japanese. Thus the Japanese are able to announce to the world that disorder prevails in Siberia and they must remain to prevent chaos. In 1920, for instance, when the Japanese were forced to evacuate the city of Khabarovsk under allied pressure, they caused it to be noised about that it would be dangerous for residents to remain after they left and offered facilities to all who wished to depart under Japanese protection. Then it was learned by the Chinese merchants in the city and immediately telegraphed to the Chinese consul in Vladivostok that the Japanese had arranged with the leaders of a band of 2,000 Chinese brigands, supplied with Japanese arms, to pillage the city as soon as the Japanese left. This report was confirmed from Russian sources, and the Chita government, which was taking over control, rushed troops to the city and frustrated the plan. But such plans have not always been frustrated.

That affairs have come to this pass is merely the logical sequence of the inexcusable torturing of the original object of the allied intervention into something totally different. The Allies entered Siberia to keep military supplies accumulated in Vladivostok from falling into the hands of German and Austrian prisoners in Siberia and to evacuate the Czech troops who had started across Siberia from eastern Europe in order to get to the western front via the Pacific and America. We Americans, like the other allies, went there with those objects. We stayed to fight imaginary Bolshevism. We gave our support to counter-revolutionaries like Kolchak, instead of blostering up Russian democracy with all the pillars we could construct out of our wealth and power. We provided the Japanese with their excuse for remaining.

Siberia is not Bolshevist, because it is populated by the descendants of political exiles, by the more adventurous and free-spirited Russians who came out as pioneers, and by the Cossacks, all of them more democratic than the Russians proper. Also, the Siberians are not an urban people—there is not an industrial city in all Siberia—and even in European Russia it is only in the cities that there are Bolsheviki in any numbers. The Siberians had one ruling motive for their actions. That was to prevent the czarist régime from returning. For that reason they would have none of the numerous dictatorships, directorates, and other mushroom governments that sprang up in 1918 and 1919—Horvath in Harbin, Orloff in Pogranichnaya, Semenoff at large, and conspicuously, Kolchak in Omsk, all of whom were reactionaries under an anti-Bolshevist disguise to deceive the Allies. And when the Siberians did for a time support the Bolshevist forces in western Siberia, after the defeat of Kolchak, it was because they knew that they at least would not restore czarism.

Again and again I have heard this from Russian workmen as I have traveled back and forth across Siberia. The Siberians had confidence in the Czechs—who understood them and their democratic aspirations, and therefore hated the Kolchak régime—and pathetic trust in the Americans. I have had conferences in railway centers with workmen's committees, composed of hostile, sullen men, suspicious already of all foreigners. I have outlined what I conceived to be American aims in Siberia and then have seen their sullenness dispelled. I am afraid, however, I did not represent American actions accurately, though I believe I did give American intentions accurately. I told them we wanted to show them American methods of railway operation, because greater efficiency meant more speed and quicker relief to their needy peasants. This policy they welcomed heartily enough, though they did not see it in evidence when the Kolchakists were paralyzing the railway. I remember one committee meeting in Chita, where we had a delicate task, for the atmosphere was none too cordial. Before I had finished the chairman arose, an engineman named Kasachaeff, a square-built, bullet-headed chap, and abruptly spoke: "All of you know that I am not much of a man to talk, for I believe in action. I have heard what the Americans have said at Irkutsk and here, and I merely want to tell you that I am for them first, last, and all the time." That was all, and that was enough.

Some months after that, when American troops had been sent out on the Trans-Siberian Railway to guard the line, there were one or two brushes with the Partisans, bands of peasants embittered at the atrocities committed by the Kolchak government and making guerilla attacks all over the country. The American troops had explicit orders to avoid hostilities with the Russians, and a private and unofficial meeting was held between representatives of the Partisans and American field officers. It was an unorthodox and interesting meeting. "We understand your position, and see why you are taking up arms," the Americans said in effect, though in more official phraseology, "but you must understand ours also. Our duty is to guard the railway. We have orders to do that, and we must obey them. So don't attack the railway in our district. If you do, we shall have to protect it by force. Do whatever else you believe to be your duty, but let the railway alone." The Russians acceded to this demand, and did not attack the railway—at least where there were American troops.

Though the Russians could understand our position in regard to the railway, they were pathetically bewildered by our support of Kolchak. "But you are Americans," they said to me again and again. "You have been fighting in the war for democracy. You are the greatest democracy in the world. That is all that Siberia wants—democracy. We only want what you have. Why don't you sympathize with us? Don't you see Kolchak and his kind stand for everything opposed to American ideals?" I never tried to explain the incongruity. I could not explain it to myself. I do not think it can be explained.

To the Kolchak fiasco and the support given it by the Allies may be traced all the evils that subsequently developed. This is not wisdom after the fact. I may say that the majority of those who knew Siberian conditions most intimately and had been longest on the scene and were without preconceived prejudices felt at the time that a mistake was being made, and those of us who were in official position said so. As American representative on an interallied organization I did say so repeatedly in my official dispatches.

The arrival of the allied troops was the signal for the reactionaries to mass and prepare to act. I have always supposed they knew they would get foreign support. On November 18, 1918, at any rate, they did act. They overthrew the democratic directorate at Omsk, and Kolchak was proclaimed supreme ruler.

It was not long before the true nature of the Kolchak government revealed itself. It did away at once with all the democratic organs of government, beginning with the Siberian Duma. Then it curbed the zemstvos, clapped censorships on press and speech and every other form of activity, and made arrests innumerable, which were always followed by secret military trials and the disappearance of the prisoners. The old black hundred of Czarist Russia—no, in truth, a worse power—was in the saddle. There was a modicum of law and justice and impersonality in the old capital; here there was unrestrained cruelty—the settling of personal grudges under cover of the law and indiscriminate extermination.

At this period, those two butchers, Ivanoff-Rinoff and Rozanoff, were in the full power of their activity, and on a larger scale Kalmykoff and Semenoff. These men permitted their followers to torture their enemies, to brand them, gouge out their eyes, and whip them to death. Conscription of peasants was declared, but the peasants took to the hills, for they hated the Kolchak régime violently for its outrages. For revenge those who did not escape and the relatives of those who did were taken, tortured, and murdered. I have pictures and records of the bodies of victims, many pictures of corpses lying near to the charred ruins of their homes. Undoubtedly such pictures are contained in the official files at Washington, and were there at that time—at the very time when we were working ourselves into a fury over Bolshevist atrocities and acclaiming Kolchak as savior of Russia from the red demon.

The Czechs were the first to show disaffection. They knew the Russian people and their dream of peaceful and democratic rule after their long agony. They knew the bitterness this cruel betrayal would work in them. The Czechs made formal protest, but although it was they who had done the fighting that kept the Bolshevist troops from swarming into Siberia, they were unheard. Some of the allied representatives joined in the protest. The railway committee, seeing the frustration of all its aims, sent telegrams to Kolchak and cablegrams to the home Governments. Both were of no avail. I myself cabled repeatedly to the State Department not only that the Kolchak government was acting in a way subversive of all decent government anywhere but that it was doomed, because it had alienated the population, and existed only by the strength of allied arms behind it.

But not until it was too late was any move made to apply pressure. In the spring of 1919, when the Allies were debating in Paris whether or not to recognize Kolchak, it was already apparent, only four or five months after he had declared himself supreme ruler, that he had so completely repelled the Siberian people that only a miracle or an enormous allied army could save him. To this ironic or tragic pass we had come: First, because of the personality of the highest allied representatives in Siberia; and, second, because of the poisoning of the world's mind with propaganda.

The allied representatives at Omsk were men drawn from the ultra-conservative ranks in their own countries. They naturally agreed with the Russian reactionaries that the only way to bring the Russians back to their senses was to rule them with a military dictatorship and to use measures stern but supposedly just. The allied military commanders reported to their Governments that all was well. General Janin, French commander, a thorough-going pro-interventionist, was outwardly pro-Kolchak. General Knox, British commander, was recognized as creator of the Kolchak government, and the man behind it. The Japanese were intent only on reaping a harvest for themselves and getting military control of the country, no matter at what cost of suffering. General Graves, American commander, possessed but limited authority. He was not to interfere in internal affairs. Besides, the American Government also was, at least half-heartedly, supporting the Kolchak government. I have only the highest admiration for the way General Graves discharged his duties. I am sure conditions would have been worse if he had not been there. And I think I can say that if General Graves ever empties his heart of his feelings concerning the American expedition to Siberia and what he saw, what we shall hear will tincture a little with shame our pride in the part we played in the war in Siberia.

Siberia was the largest well from which was drawn the poison that crazed the mind of the world on Russia between 1918 and 1921. The Russian reactionary agents, ignoring the fact that not more than 5 per cent of the Russian people were of Bolshevist tendency, painted allied citizens in Siberia and through them to the allied people at home such picture that the world visualized Russia as a country of raving communists with a bomb in one hand and a firebrand in the other. Those of us who were living in the Siberian part of Russia all this time and hearing of these terrors always in some other city than the one in which we happened to be, saw soon enough what were the sources of the propaganda and the motives for it.

The end of Kolchak's power came quickly. The Siberians rose against him, dispersed such of his troops as had not deserted, overthrew his government, captured him, and put him to death.

Meanwhile the Japanese had already taken advantage of conditions ideally suited to imperialist profiteering in Siberia. Evidence accumulated early to indicate that the Japanese military were backing individual aspirants to Siberian supremacy. When Rozanoff, who had butchered with obscene bestiality, was defeated and had to flee for his life, he was given shelter by the Japanese military command.

The Japanese military were shrewd enough to know that they could never hold so huge an area as Siberia. They determined instead on a policy of holding a few strategic points. To do so they would have to make terms with local chieftains. Rozanoff, Kalmykoff, and Semenoff were their first tools, and the worst of these was Semenoff. Since that time they have had to restrict their scope even more, because the world has begun to look a little too sharply at events in Siberia. They have determined therefore on a policy of holding all the means of ingress into Siberia, and they do hold them. They have Sakhalen, which commands the mouth of the Amur in the north, Vladivostok, the principal port, and Dairen, a China coast port. To those points, which they hold as they do everything else they have obtained in Siberia, by means of their Russian tools, they have had to recede. Those points, however, are sufficient to constitute the mastery of Siberia for all practical purposes.

The allied expedition had not been long under way before we realized that it had two aspects: One Russian, and the other Japanese. I can say from my own official experience that the latter was the more difficult and the more troublesome. Everybody knows now that although the Japanese Government and the American Government agreed to send 7,500 troops each into Siberia, Japan in a few months had poured in 70,000 or more. From that time forward every allied object met with Japanese obstruction in an indirect, oblique, maddening form. "Cherchez le Japonais" became the rule of action, at least in the interallied railway committee, no matter what happened. The greatest disorders, the most awkward obstacles in the way of the objects of the committee, were always in the territory controlled by one of the Japanese-supported Russian generals, usually Semenoff. It was interesting that when the Allies allotted the stretches of the Trans-Siberian Railway that the forces of each were to guard, the Japanese chose the section under Semenoff's control. And when the Japanese were requested by the committee to compel Semenoff to cease disorganizing traffic on the railway and pillaging towns along the railway they replied that they could not "interfere." Yet when anti-Semenoff Russian forces threatened to enter Semenoff territory they could always stop them. And it was interesting that Semenoff's acts always produced results in harmony with results that the Japanese wanted to accomplish, and that Semenoff's money was always Japanese yen. The Japanese could not interfere and did not attempt to interfere in Russian internal affairs. It was known that a guard of Japanese troops was stationed around Semenoff's house in Chita, and Japanese officers lived in his house. Once during an American official call, made nominally to pay respects, but really to sound him on his intentions, he said, for he never really has disliked Americans: "Be careful. There are Japanese in the next room. They overhear everything I say and watch everything I do."

There is special American interest in Semenoff now, because at the time of writing he has just been granted permission to enter America. Having become a marked man he has outlived his usefulness to the Japanese.

I first met him in March, 1918, in a modest room in a Harbin hotel. He was then unspoiled, a Cossack captain of medium height and build, with no outstanding physical characteristics. In fact, with a quiet voice and colorless manner he gave little indication of the horrible part he was to play. He told me of his plan of action against the Bolsheviki and his aim to make conditions favorable for a democratic régime. All the Allies were then supporting him, but when he showed his character, all but the Japanese dropped him. Two months later he made another trip to Harbin. He was then drunk with power, and soon he was drunk with the conventional intoxicant. He painted Harbin red—redder than it usually is. From that time he degenerated, officially and personally.

He accumulated wives here and there—among them the famous Mascha, once humble danseuse of the Café Palermo, who he gauded with diamonds bought with yen—and the wives and his other habits required money. And the more money and the more power Semenoff got, both through Japan, the drunker with power and wine he became, and the more barbarous. He shot up towns, leaving the dead in his path, and looted them of all valuables, apparently for mere sport. And the Japanese never interfered with his pastimes. I do not suppose they really approved of all his activities, but they allowed him his savagery because he did their political bidding, and he was willing to do their political bidding in exchange for protection while he went on with his atrocities and profited by them. Yet he never really trusted the Japanese, as the incident I have told illustrates. But he needed them. For now and then he overstepped his bounds and had to flee. He never had stomach for fighting; in fact, he was always conspicuous for his remoteness from the region of battle. And when he fled he found it convenient to take refuge in Japanese territory, either in Siberia or on the China coast, where Japan has territory. When he returned from his Japanese asylum he always bought his ruble exchange with Japanese yen.

The most illuminating illustration of Japanese methods was the manner in which they used Semenoff to obstruct the Czech evacuation. It was to protect the Czechs in their evacuation, remember, that the Allies entered Siberia. The Czechs played a heroic part until they were revolted by Kolchak's oppressions. When they found that protest was futile they decided to avail themselves of the permission previously granted them to leave. But Kolchak did not want them to go, for they were his chief support; and the Japanese did not want them to, for if they did then the Japanese themselves would have no reason for staying. So they hired Semenoff to hinder the proposed withdrawal.

Finally the Czechs threatened to force their way through. So serious did the situation become that the interallied committee had to take cognizance of it, and on a French proposal I was authorized by the committee, including the Japanese member, to go to Chita with full power to arrange for the evacuation. On my arrival I found a Japanese-dominated committee acting on the matter—or rather, not acting. I presented my credentials and was told by General Hoshino, the Japanese chairman of the committee, that he had not heard of my appointment. I soon got confirmation from Vladivostok, so the Japanese set out by other means to delay the Czechs.

They resorted to a multitude of petty obstructions. They left locomotives on the main tracks at big stations to hold up Czech trains. They offered excuses that rolling stock and locomotives needed repair. If the Czechs offered to send their own mechanics into the shops, the Japanese replied that they would have to have Japanese workmen, who would soon be there. The Japanese workmen never came.

One night in Chita the Semenoffites blocked all the tracks leading into the city just before the arrival of one of the fighting echelons from the west. The Czechs demanded entry. The Semenoffites refused. Then the Japanese ordered out 800 troops and two pieces of artillery, which they placed outside the station. The Czech commander, not knowing the cause of the delay, came into the city on foot. He took one look and then sent a notification to both the Semenoff officers and the Japanese that at 8 o'clock the next morning he intended to enter. Semenoffites and Japanese both understood. They knew the Czech mettle. They knew that the commander would come in or fight. They withdrew. Naturally, the Japanese did not want to fight. That would be advertising to the world that they were fighting the very men they were in Siberia to protect.

In the meantime the Japanese were busy with their own exclusive enterprises. They sent detachments of troops to all the principal stations along the Chinese Eastern Railway, which the Chinese had been commissioned to guard. The Chinese protested to the Allied Railway Technical Board and to the allied commanders. The Japanese explained to both that the troops were there merely to keep the telegraph line to Chita in repair. They said further that they would make no change in the guarding of the railway, but that anyhow this was a matter for them to settle with the Chinese separately. It must be remembered that the Peking Government at that time was in the hands of Japanese agents. It must also be remembered that the Chinese Eastern Railway is the southeastern loop that connects the trans-Siberian line with the Chinese coast, and therefore commands North Manchuria.

About the same time—the spring of 1919—the Japanese sent troops to Nikolaevsk, on the Amur River, although there had been no agreement with the Allies to do so, and there were no railways to guard within 400 miles. They explained in defense that they had to protect their fisheries in the coastal region around Nikolaevsk. Why the navy could not do this work they never explained. As a matter of fact, they wanted to hold the mouth of the Amur, the great channel of water communication in north Siberia. At Nikolaevsk occurred the massacre of 700 Japanese, in reprisal for which the Japanese have seized the southern island of Sakhalen with its wealth of resources. The Japanese have never brought out the fact that their garrison was in Nikolaevsk without permission or lawful right, nor do they tell what their troops did to the Siberians there before the latter retaliated.

It is necessary to cite, as one more instance of Japanese methods, the first siezure of Vladivostok. On April 1, 1920, the last of the American troops sailed. The other allied troops had already gone. There were left only the Japanese. Three days after the Americans had gone the Japanese seized Vladivostok and then Khabarovsk and Nikolsk. And then they sent dispatches all over the world saying they had been attacked. But on my return a few days later—I had been west with the Czechs—not a bullet mark could be found on the building occupied by the Japanese troops, though the near-by buildings occupied by the Russian military were riddled. So it was wherever there had been fighting. It would seem strange that the Japanese should be attacked simultaneously in three widely separated cities; that all the casualties should be Russian; that the Japanese should be ready to put up signs in Japanese characters with the names of all the stations on the railway between Nikolsk and Vladivostok, and that suddenly troops should be found all along the railway.

What events like these meant to the Russians I can best tell by a concrete case. In Nikolsk there was a Russian school-teacher named Polushkin. He was also secretary of the Railway Club, housed in a building that had been seized by the Japanese military. As secretary he went to the club to get some papers. By several people he was seen entering. He was never seen to come out. He was never seen again. The affair was reported by the Russians to the American railway inspectors in Nikolsk. They asked the Japanese chief of gendarmerie to investigate. He denied that the man had ever come into the building. The affair was then reported to the Interallied Railway Committee, which could find out nothing.

Through this entire period there came reports from our technical board in Harbin of demoralization of the Chinese Eastern Railway by the Japanese. Trains were being stopped, sent back, held for long intervals. Russians were being arrested and executed without trial. Men were beaten. Private residences were searched. Everywhere terror reigned. The Japanese had seized upon the excuse that they had to protect Korea and China from Bolshevism, which the American press swallowed, and then they sent Semenoff, Kalmykoff, and other Russian employees off on sacking expeditions to prove that there was disorder in the country.

The effect on the Siberians can be imagined. They were goaded to fury, the more frantic for being helpless. In constant dread, submitted to every indignity and outrage, they took their revenge, where they could, by boycotting Japanese goods. For, remember, the Japanese brought in thousands of merchants and exploiters as their clutch tightened, and simultaneously they prevented business men of other nationalities from shipping their goods on the railway.

On one occasion the Russian railway workers threatened to strike in protest against the way they were treated by the Japanese. Mr. Matsudaira, the Japanese member of the railway committee, came to me and asked me to intercede, knowing that I spoke Russian and had the confidence of the workers. I went to them and finally dissuaded them from striking, on the plea that all would suffer if the railway ceased operations. When I reported my success to Mr. Matsudaira he told me he should like to talk to one of the workmen directly and pressed me to arrange an interview. I asked the head of the switchmen's union if he would talk to Mr. Matsudaira. He consented, and I brought him to my office and called Mr. Matsudaira.

Mr. Matsudaira asked why the Russians were so opposed to the Japanese. "For three reasons," said the Russian; "because of the undemocratic government of Japan, and because of the brutalities of Japanese intervention, and because of the Japanese treatment of Korea." Mr. Matsudaira admitted that Japan was not a democratic country and that the army was not under the control of the civil government, but he said that Japan would soon be democratic. He made rather a lame explanation of the intervention and was silent on Korea. He then asked the Russian to come to his house. The Russian hesitated a moment and then spoke to me in Russian, which Mr. Matsudaira did not understand. "Should I go?" he asked. I asked him why not. He said he feared that it was a ruse to trap him and that he would be arrested. I explained to Mr. Matsudaira, who looked embarrassed and then wrote out a safe-conduct on his visiting card.

A few days later I met the Russian and asked him how he had fared on his visit. Mr. Matsudaira, he said, had argued with him lengthily and then asked him to go to the Russian workmen and tell them that Japan was all right.

"Did you?" I asked.

"No."

"Why not?"

"Because I don't want to be hanged by my own people."

Now I want to make one point clear. I do not think the reprehensible policy of the Japanese military was the expression of the unanimous will of the Japanese. I have had evidence to the contrary. I know, for instance, that, at sessions of the Interallied Railway Committee, Mr. Matsudaira himself frequently squirmed when confronted by the fact that the army had violated his promises. I know that at times he intervened with the military to call them off some outstandingly evil project. I have had one of the foremost publicists speak condemningly to me of the actions of the Japanese military.

Once in Harbin, while I was reading in my private car, in which I lived, a Japanese in a colonel's uniform entered. "I will not tell you my name," he said, "for I should be ruined if this were known, but I want to tell you that there are some of us who are ashamed of the conduct of our representatives here and that it does not typify our people. We ought to get out and leave these Russians alone. I can not give you my name, but you may tell your Government what I have said."

Less dramatic but more enlightening and promising was a visit I had from a representative of the Bank of Japan, accompanied by a Japanese foreign office man. They came to protest against the conduct of their own army and asked me to protest also to my Government in the strongest possible terms. I told them I usually did.

Another man of wide financial interests came to me once and said: "We are trying to enlist the help of America. We are trying to abolish in our country the graft that ruined China and Russia, too.

"I can tell you our largest business houses all feel the same way. Our very Army officers here are engaged in corruption, besides following a line of conduct that can only make us enemies in Russia. We want you to fight the military all you can." By way of proving his sincerity he told me of definite cases of corrupt deals then under way involving the military clique and certain business firms. I had heard something of these matters before. He confirmed the information I had that certain officers of high rank were helping Japanese business companies with political connections to evade customs duties on commercial shipments into Siberia. Through him also I obtained a hint that commercial shipments were entering the country as Red Cross supplies with the connivance of military officers.

I had later a specific instance of this kind of trickery from an American, who told me of a Russian firm that refused his orders because the Japanese underbid him. He was curious to know how such a thing was possible. The Russian showed him goods that had come in cases marked with the Red Cross stamp.

"Why can't you do this?" the Russian asked.

I should add that I reported this whole matter to Mr. Matsudaira and that he immediately took steps to prevent the dishonest practices of Japanese importers.

Let me say in conclusion just why and how the Siberian question is of practical, immediate importance to Americans. It concerns our commerce now—our legitimate commerce. Just before I left Siberia there arrived in Vladivostok a 12-car shipment of hardware consigned to a Russian importer in the west. When the American agent tried to have the goods shipped he was balked. The Japanese would not give him the cars. One carload left immediately, because that contained a small Japanese order. The remainder of the shipment was held up for two months.

A little later there came a British consignment of cable. It, too, eventually got through, but only after long delay. The Japanese insisted and still insist that no trains shall leave Vladivostok without their permission. How long British and American competitors could hold out under such conditions experience in Dairen, Tsingtao, Port Arthur, and other Japanese-controlled ports proves.

In Siberia, as in China, there is hope in the existence of a class of Japanese who feel as do some of the minority I have cited, but this class, though liberal, is now decidedly in the minority and powerless. It can but slightly mitigate the evils of the nature of the Japanese occupation and of the occupation itself. So long as the Japanese are in Siberia there must be trouble. Until they leave a real Siberian government can not possibly be established. Trumped-up revolutions will be unceasing, and each will bring its loss of life and property. This is the real crime of the Japanese occupation. But I would not seem to lay the crime at Japanese doors exclusively. I have tried to point out that the European allies and America must share the guilt. That is the real tragedy of Siberia.

THE TARIFF.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7456) to provide revenue, to regulate commerce with foreign countries, to encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STERLING in the chair). The next amendment of the Committee on Finance will be stated.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 9, before the word "cents," to strike out the numeral "2" and insert "1½," so as to read:

Boric acid, 1½ cents per pound.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I am a little at a loss to understand why the chairman of the Finance Committee remained silent and would permit this amendment to be adopted without any statement or any information as to why it should be made.

Under the present law this article, boric acid, is taxed three-fourths of a cent a pound. The House, in the bill which it passed, increased that duty to 2 cents per pound. The majority of the Finance Committee fixed the duty at 1½ cents per pound. The item is now reached for a vote, and there is not a word from the Finance Committee regarding it.

In the report which the Finance Committee submitted to the Senate with this bill no reference was made to this item. There is not one word of testimony in the hearings of the Finance Committee regarding it. The item is not even mentioned in all of the hearings taken by the Finance Committee.

I can not imagine how this course is going to be acceptable to the Senate. I can not construe it in any other way than that the Finance Committee expects the Senate to ratify what it proposes, regardless of any information on the subject. If that is what is expected by the majority of the Finance Committee, the country ought to know it now. The country ought to be advised as to what the Senate is expected to do in regard to this great taxation measure, and the underlying reason for imposing the tax upon the consumers of this country.

To me, Mr. President, this can not be viewed in a commendatory light. Is that what we are to be subjected to with regard to every item in this bill? I did not take the floor until after the chairman was practically going to consider this amendment adopted without any objection. The chairman of the Finance Committee made no attempt to give any explanation or any information about it.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Mexico yield to me for a few moments?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

ATTORNEY GENERAL DAUGHERTY.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I had hoped not to take any more time in the discussion of matters not relating directly to the bill before the Senate, but I rise now merely to ask that the Attorney General, Mr. Daugherty, come to the rescue of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON]. I have no doubt but that the Attorney General told the Senator from Indiana that he, the Attorney General, was not connected with the procuring of a pardon for Morse, and received no compensation for services in that matter. I am sure that he told him that, or the Senator from Indiana would not have made the statement Tuesday on the floor. Since there is a question of veracity between the Senator from Indiana and the Attorney General, as I shall show in a minute, I want the Attorney General, if he will not set himself right with the people, at least to set the Senator from Indiana, who came so nobly to his rescue last Tuesday, right before the public. The Senator from Indiana was misled by the Attorney General, and the Attorney General ought to have consideration enough for his friends to come forward and admit that he misled the Senator from Indiana, because after this commutation of Morse was granted, in 1912, by Mr. Taft, the present Chief Justice, before he went out of office by unanimous consent as President, the present Attorney General gave out an interview, published in a local paper in Columbus, Ohio, and it should have been a matter with which the junior Senator from Ohio was familiar yesterday when he spoke, but he has evidently forgotten it. In that interview the Attorney General took credit—I use the word because he seemed to think that credit was what he was entitled to receive—for having procured the pardon of Morse.

Let me read, first, the statements made to Mr. Taft. I know that Chief Justice Taft, who was President, thought he was pardoning a man who was afflicted with a fatal malady. As one Republican Senator told me—though I am not at liberty to give his name—all he had against Morse was that he jumped his bond; that he gave bond that he would die in six months, and is alive yet, and the Senator feels aggrieved. But Taft said in an interview:

> In my opinion the prisoner's duration of life will, in all probability, be less than one month if kept in confinement, and in the event of his release under commutation of sentence, it is not probable that he will live as long as six months.

That was in 1912, and it seems that he will go down there to get another certificate that he has a fatal malady from the same doctor who gave him this one. Mr. Daugherty has made that possible by appointing this doctor to the same place he occupied then. Nothing like having your friends in a position where they can prove helpful.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. CARAWAY. I yield.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, Charles W. Morse himself said that he had only a few days to live, and that all he asked the President to do was to let him die outside of the penitentiary, so that he would not leave the stigma upon his wife and child of having died inside of the penitentiary, unpardoned.

Mr. CARAWAY. He is still alive?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. It seems so.

Mr. CARAWAY. On the following day after his pardon there appeared in the Columbus Dispatch, with which, I presume, the Senator from Ohio is familiar, an afternoon paper published in Mr. Daugherty's home town, whose representative had, apparently, just interviewed him, a story under the following headlines:

Morse owes his commutation to Harry Daugherty.

That is the present Attorney General. This is in quotation marks, showing that this is what the Attorney General said:

Succeeded after efforts of other attorneys had been of no avail.

The paper said:

Mr. Daugherty convinced the President through the Attorney General (George W. Wickersham) that Mr. Morse has but a few months to live, and the President thereupon commuted the banker's sentence, so he could be released at once.

Here is what Mr. Daugherty said. It is in quotation marks. It quotes Mr. Daugherty thus:

My interest in the case was not as an attorney to get Mr. Morse's freedom but representing a number of certificate holders in a steamship company interested with Mr. Morse. Mr. Morse's attorneys in Atlanta are Anderson, Felder, Roundtree & Wilson, a firm with which our firm has had considerable business, and we became interested through them.

About $2,000,000 is involved in having the affairs of these certificate holders straightened out satisfactorily, and unless they could get the advantage of Mr. Morse's aid—for he is a genius and a wizard—

I understand that was what he was called when he organized the Ice Trust in New York and caused the death of dozens of poor people. I repeat:

And unless they could get the advantage of Mr. Morse's aid—for he is a genius and a wizard—a lot of innocent people would suffer. His health was such that it was necessary to get him in a position to assist us as soon as possible. The President said a year ago when efforts were made to get a pardon for Morse that he would not consider the case again until January 1, 1913, but by that time Morse will be dead.

So I went to Washington and laid the facts before Secretary of War Stimson and before the Attorney General and Judge Hough, the trial judge. Mr. Wickersham was opposed to taking any action whatever the first time I saw him, but the facts were presented to him so completely that he took the matter up, had examinations made by Government physicians, and then laid the matter before the President. The President personally sent a Government physician to make an examination and report to him, then commuted the sentence.

Morse was sent to the penitentiary as the result of a bank war in New York City. There were three or four examinations of his bank, and all reported everything O. K., but still another man was sent to make another examination and he made the report that caused the trouble.

Morse's violation of the law was entirely technical.

That was what Mr. Daugherty said about it. So he should not have misled the Senator from Indiana and have him pledge his word as a Senator that Morse was pardoned without any assistance from Daugherty, because Daugherty entered a plea of guilty in the matter 10 years ago.

But there is another matter to be straightened out, Mr. President. A man came here to see me yesterday, whose graphic picture was painted in the record by the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. WATSON], and I want to read just a line or two of it to have it fresh in our minds, especially because I am going to read a letter from Mr. Felder, in which he intimates somebody is going to be responsible for anything that is said against his character—and I am going to say something against it—and I want to draw his picture. Here it is as painted by a man who lives in Georgia and who knows him. This is from Senator WATSON of Georgia:

Mr. President, for the last 40 years I have known Thomas B. Felder well, and I have known him to be a crook. I know him to have been a professional lobbyist of the whisky ring, opposing every one of the temperance laws that I was advocating and other temperance people were advocating in Georgia. He combated us at every step. We had to close the barrooms over his protest; and he never ceased to be a lobbyist in Georgia until the attack made upon him by myself and by others destroyed his usefulness as a lobbyist. Then he left the State and went to New York.

I would not say this here if I had not said it to his face in a State convention in Atlanta. I denounced him to his face in that convention, and he turned about as white as a piece of paper and did not open his mouth. I am asserting a fact in saying that he was not a lawyer, but a lobbyist; not an honest man, but a knave; not a witness whom anybody would believe, but a man who, in the State of Georgia, would be impeached if offered as a witness on the trial of a case by men of the highest standing and character, who would say that from their general knowledge of his character they would not believe him on oath.

Mr. Felder intimates in the letter that if anybody says anything about him, trouble is brewing. If so, here is where I kiss good-by to all my dear relatives, I reckon. I would be glad, if Mr. Felder feels so inclined, because I shall not put it in the record, to have him tell what I said to him yesterday when he approached me about this case and made a statement that I knew was not true. He is at liberty and has my permission, and I will take my chances on getting churched for having said it.

But this man wrote me a letter. If I would not let him talk with me, he is going to communicate with me, and I want to read his letter, but will first say this: I am sure that he thinks that if Judas Iscariot had left a kindly mention of the devil in his memoirs the devil would have been in good standing to-day, because he rushes to the defense of the Attorney General, and therefore thinks he washes the Attorney General whiter than snow.

Here is his letter, leaving off the salutation:

It is inconceivable to me that a Senator who fairly represents the people of the great State of Arkansas could under even the temptation of partisan politics assail a distinguished member of the official family of the President of the United States. The statement made by you that Charles W. Morse ever at any time or under any circumstances paid Hon. Harry M. Daugherty $25,000 to get him out of the penitentiary is absolutely without any foundation in fact.

How much he did pay he does not say. The amount is not of any consequence. The question is, Did he act for Morse?

At the time Charles W. Morse was serving sentence in the Atlanta Penitentiary I was a member of the Atlanta (Ga.) bar. I was attorney for Fred L. Seeley and his interests, including the Atlanta Georgian. Mr. Seeley was essentially a philanthropist.

I understood eventually he was also something of a skinner and left Georgia for Georgia's good.

He became sentimentally interested in the fate of Charles W. Morse. He employed me to examine fully the case and determine if upon the merits he was entitled to Executive clemency. I reached the conclusion that the penalty was excessive, in view of the fact that the court of appeals had reversed the lower court on several of the counts in the indictment. I was requested to proceed with the case.

Now, here is the interesting part of the letter:

I told my client that the case was a very important one; that my acquaintance in official circles was circumscribed; that I knew an attorney in Columbus, Ohio, with whom I had been associated both personally and professionally—

He is the man whom Felder, whose picture I have just reproduced, says he knew—

I knew an attorney in Columbus, Ohio, with whom I had been associated both personally and professionally, who possessed in an eminent degree not only ability—

I presume he means for this particular kind of work—but character, which entitled and gave him the confidence and respect of officials who had to do with the case.

That was President Taft and his official family.

He authorized me to employ him. We proceeded with the case.

Now, Mr. President, I say again the Attorney General ought to apologize to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] for having misled him, because here is this man stating that he hired him.

Morse was pardoned. I, as leading counsel in the case, directed step by step the policies pursued by and with the advice of my associate—

By and with the advice of his associate, who is the present Attorney General.

If anything irregular was done I am solely responsible. If anything irregular is charged to me by anyone at any time I will take care of that situation.

A tiny little threat.

I dislike to take part in political bickerings and wranglings. I like a calm, placid life.

I should like to recommend him, if he enjoys that kind of a life, that he go back to South Carolina, where he was under indictment and where he might have gotten it. But apparently he did not care for a calm and placid life of that particular kind.

But I have sat mute and listened to the vile and baseless insinuations uttered against this great and good man whom I personally know would not under any temptation so far forget either his manhood or his honor as to do an unethical, much less corrupt, professional act. I feel that even without his consent I must break the silence.

Very truly yours,

THOS. B. FELDER.

Well, Daugherty said he got into the case because he wanted Morse for a witness. Felder says he got into the case because he hired him to help a philanthropist to get Morse out. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] said he was not in the case at all.

Now I want to say this, Mr. President, that whether the Attorney General ought to have done this thing as a practicing attorney, I am not passing judgment. In fact, that was only secondary when I came into the controversy. I was merely trying to show how helpless these children were to get a pardon, because they did not have an attorney, and how successful crooks were in getting pardoned where they were able to hire attorneys, and the Senator from Indiana rushed to the defense of the Attorney General and said that I was wrongfully charging Attorney General Daugherty, and that he had nothing to do with it.

Frankly, I had never investigated it. I had heard it referred to so often and never denied that I presumed it was true, but since the Senator from Indiana saw fit to deny it and so emphatically, and the Attorney General then came out in an interview in which he intended to be insulting and was in a way, although I am not much hurt by it, and since I then was approached by this "good" man from Georgia, Mr. Thomas B. Felder, who was a lobbyist, and I have it on the information of men who are perfectly willing to stand up and tell it at any time that he was not only a lobbyist for the whisky ring but he was a lobbyist of the kind which least commands the respect of anyone—he was a lobbyist against every attempt of the legislature to strike the fetters from the wrists of little children by enacting laws that would relieve children from the burdensome and unjust imposition put upon them of employing them in factories, where they were compelled to work when they should have been in school.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. CARAWAY. I yield.

Mr. WILLIS. I did not hear all of the colloquy between the Senator from Arkansas and the Senator from Indiana, but I read it rather hastily. My recollection is that the Senator from Indiana, who unfortunately is not here at the moment——

Mr. CARAWAY. Oh, before the Senator goes further let me say that I told the Senator from Indiana that I had the matter and was going to bring it up. He had full knowledge of it.

Mr. WILLIS. What I was about to say is that, as I recall the colloquy, the Senator from Indiana did not say Mr. Daugherty had nothing to do with the case, but he did say that Mr. Daugherty did not get $25,000, or any other sum, as a fee in the case. That is the way I recall the colloquy.

Mr. CARAWAY. No; if the Senator will read it some time, he will find that after he qualified his first statement he did state it as I have stated it. The first statement was that Daugherty had nothing to do with it. I want to say now that I do not want to be put in the attitude of criticizing the Senator from Indiana, because he was repeating what he was told; and I am not overly criticizing the Attorney General. I am just talking about him. I presume he is a good enough Attorney General for this administration. The President knew all about him before he was appointed, and I am not expecting him to be gotten rid of.

But that is not the idea I have in discussing the matter at all. The defense of the Attorney General was so heated that it left an implication in the minds of some people that I was accusing him of having done something of which he was not guilty. I say to the Senator from Ohio, and I say to the Senator from Indiana and to the Attorney General, that I do not care whether he got $25,000 or 25 cents. I do not care whether the story that has been told this morning is true or not—that Morse never paid him, and therefore that Morse is going to be sent back to the penitentiary; I do not care whether that is true or not. I do not care whether he got a nickel or got $25,000, or whether Morse paid him or promised to pay him and did not pay him. I will say, however, that I rather imagine I shall be able to put in the RECORD some receipts, but I will wait until some more defenses are made, and I will print them a little bit later.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I know the Senator desires to be accurate. I refer him to page 6726 of the RECORD, which sets forth the colloquy between the Senator from Arkansas and the Senator from Indiana. Down past the middle of the page the Senator from Indiana said:

> I did not say that he did not represent Morse; but I say on my knowledge of the situation that he received no fee for the service rendered, nor did he represent Morse directly, according to my understanding.

Mr. CARAWAY. What did he say just previous to that?

Mr. WILLIS. Does the Senator desire me to read it to him?

Mr. CARAWAY. No; I just want the Senator to read it for his own information.

Mr. WILLIS. I have read it all.

Mr. CARAWAY. No; the Senator has not read half of the colloquy.

Mr. WILLIS. I have read what precedes that, and what pertains to this matter. Will the Senator from Arkansas refer me to the place in the RECORD where the Senator from Indiana makes a contrary statement?

Mr. CARAWAY. No; but the Senator can read it himself.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator was asking to have it read. Here is what the Senator from Indiana said:

> Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Does the Senator charge on his responsibility as a Senator that Mr. Daugherty, even before he was Attorney General, received a fee for helping to get Mr. Morse out of the penitentiary?
> Mr. CARAWAY. I charged that that was a matter of public information. I was not, of course, present when any contract was made. I will say that I have heard it so often that I think it is true, without question.
> Mr. WATSON of Indiana. The Senator, then, accepts a rumor as true, and charges it on the floor of the Senate?
> Mr. CARAWAY. Does the Senator from Indiana say that it is not true?
> Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I do.
> Mr. CARAWAY. On the Senator's own personal knowledge?
> Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I do.

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes, sir. Everybody, including the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS], knew that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] intended in that statement to say that Daugherty was not employed in that case.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Utah has not expressed any opinion in reference to the matter; he knows nothing about it; but he simply read what transpired in the Senate between the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON].

Mr. CARAWAY. I know. I know what everybody understood that the Senator from Indiana was intending to say—that there was no relation between Daugherty and this man.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. He further says that there was.

Mr. CARAWAY. I know he did later; I have stated that two or three times.

Mr. WILLIS. Will the Senator from Arkansas point out any such language in the RECORD that was used by the Senator from Indiana? I know the Senator from Arkansas wants to be fair. Where did the Senator from Indiana say anything such as the Senator from Arkansas now attributes to him?

Mr. CARAWAY. Let me read it to the Senator, laying all heat aside, for I have not any.

Mr. WILLIS. The Senator from Arkansas will find the statement of the Senator from Indiana on page 6175, and I trust he will read it all.

Mr. CARAWAY. When the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] rose he first said:

> Mr. WATSON of Indiana. We did not hear over on this side what it was that the Senator said about the Attorney General. Will he kindly repeat it?
> Mr. CARAWAY. I know the Senator did not hear it, because all the Senators over there got busy in order not to hear what was being said. I said that I understood that the greatest achievement of the Attorney General was that he got a pardon for a criminal, and got a fee of $25,000 for doing it.

The charge was that he got a pardon for a criminal and that incidentally he got a fee of $25,000. The fee, whether he got a nickel or a million dollars, was not important; everybody understood that. The question was whether he got a pardon. That is what the controversy was about. The Senator from Indiana further said:

> Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Does the Senator mean since he became Attorney General?
> Mr. CARAWAY. Oh, no.
> Mr. WATSON of Indiana. May I further question the Senator?
> Mr. CARAWAY. Yes, sir.
> Mr. WATSON of Indiana. To what case does the Senator refer?
> Mr. CARAWAY. The Morse case.
> Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Does the Senator charge on his responsibility as a Senator that Mr. Daugherty, even before he was Attorney General, received a fee for helping to get Mr. Morse out of the penitentiary?
> Mr. CARAWAY. I charged that that was a matter of public information. I was not, of course, present when any contract was made. I will say that I have heard it so often that I think it is true, without question.
> Mr. WATSON of Indiana. The Senator, then, accepts a rumor as true, and charges it on the floor of the Senate?
> Mr. CARAWAY. Does the Senator from Indiana say that it is not true?
> Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. That related to the fee.

Mr. CARAWAY. That related to the fee. The important question is not what fee he got, and I am not going off on a side issue like that, but did he help get the pardon? That was all I had in view. As I have said before, I was only incidentally criticizing the Attorney General. I had no quarrel with him then, and I have not any now. If I should do the Senator from Indiana an injustice, nobody would be quicker than I to admit it; but I understood the Senator at first to intend to say that the Attorney General had nothing to do with it. He then over and again quibbled about whether he was directly or indirectly employed. That is my understanding from his language. I want to be fair with him, and I will quote further from the RECORD. Afterwards I asked:

On the Senator's own personal knowledge?
Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I do.
Mr. CARAWAY. That Mr. Daugherty did not represent Morse?
Mr. WATSON. I did not say that he did not represent Morse; but I say on my knowledge of the situation that he received no fee for the service rendered, nor did he represent Morse directly, according to my understanding.
Mr. CARAWAY. Did he indirectly represent him?
Mr. WATSON of Indiana. No.
Mr. CARAWAY. Why did the Senator say, then, that he did not directly represent him?
Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I meant by that that my understanding of the situation is that he was representing his client, and that the testimony of Mr. Morse was necessary, and that in that way he had contact with Mr. Morse; but he did not get him out of the penitentiary; he had not anything to do with getting him out of the penitentiary; and he received no fee for getting him out of the penitentiary.

That is absolutely plain. That is what the Senator from Indiana said. Even the Senator from Utah will bear me out now that he denied that the Attorney General had anything to do with getting Morse out of the penitentiary, did he not?

Mr. SMOOT. I never made any statement that he did not.

Mr. CARAWAY. Then I misunderstood the Senator from Utah. The Senator from Ohio evidently had not read this. I would not want to misrepresent the Senator from Indiana, and I will read it again. The Senator from Indiana said:

I meant by that that my understanding of the situation is—

And he said he obtained his information from conversations with the Attorney General—that he was representing his client, and that the testimony of Mr. Morse was necessary, and that in that way he had contact with Mr. Morse; but he did not get him out of the penitentiary; he had not anything to do with getting him out of the penitentiary; and he received no fee for getting him out of the penitentiary.

That was the statement of the Senator from Indiana, was it not? I am sure the Senator from Ohio will bear me out in that.

Mr. WILLIS. I have no doubt the Senator from Arkansas has read correctly.

Mr. CARAWAY. But the Senator from Ohio had overlooked what I have just read.

Mr. WILLIS. I had not overlooked it. I merely want to straighten out the controversy between the Senator from Arkansas and the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. CARAWAY. I thought the Senator from Ohio said that the Attorney General did not have anything to do with it.

Mr. WILLIS. I did not say anything of that kind.

Mr. CARAWAY. I thought the Senator from Ohio said that the Senator from Indiana said—but I will not quote the Senator from Ohio because he said he did not know anything about it.

What I have read was the positive statement of the Senator from Indiana, that the present Attorney General had nothing to do with it, and he said that that statement was based upon a statement made by the Attorney General to him.

The Attorney General, however, gave out an interview in 1917, in which he said that he obtained the pardon; that others had failed, but that he had succeeded. It is true he said in that instance that he wanted to use Mr. Morse as a witness to help straighten out some matters, or rather, to get the advantage of his business genius to help him straighten out some matters before Morse should die in the week or 10 days that he had to live; but now comes the bosom friend of the Attorney General, a man who can not sit still when anything is said against the Attorney General, a man who knows all the facts, a man to whom the honor of the Attorney General is so sacred that if anybody says anything about him he is going to settle with him later—and I am perfectly willing—and says that I was employed, that I got the pardon, advised and assisted by the present Attorney General.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, will the Senator state again to the Senate his opinion of the reputation of the man to whom he has referred by name for truth and veracity? Does he believe him?

Mr. CARAWAY. His reputation is that he was a common liar, but his relations with the Attorney General are so close that he can not stand to hear him mentioned without rushing to his rescue. They are bosom friends, and the Attorney General in his interview said he was his associate. If the Attorney General wants to select that sort of people for his representatives and his associates, both socially and professionally, the Attorney General is entirely at liberty to choose his friends where he will. I do not care as to that; I am not an applicant for a seat in the circle.

Now, I wish to say in conclusion——

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes, sir.

Mr. MOSES. The Senator has been commenting upon a letter received by him. I did not get the name of the signer. Will the Senator give it?

Mr. CARAWAY. I will, and I will say he could have been mighty useful to the Senator when he was organizing Georgia some years ago. His name is Thomas B. Felder. I will put the letter in the RECORD, so that there may be no question about it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the letter will be printed in the RECORD.

The letter referred to is as follows:

MAY 3, 1922.

Hon. T. H. CARAWAY,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: It is inconceivable to me that a Senator who fairly represents the people of the great State of Arkansas could under even the temptation of partisan politics assail a distinguished member of the official family of the President of the United States. The statement made by you that Charles W. Morse ever at any time or under any circumstances paid Hon. Harry M. Daugherty $25,000 to get him out of the penitentiary is absolutely without any foundation in fact.

At the time Charles W. Morse was serving a sentence in the Atlanta penitentiary I was a member of the Atlanta (Ga.) bar. I was attorney for Fred L. Seeley and his interests, including the Atlanta Georgian. Mr. Seeley was essentially a philanthropist. He became sentimentally interested in the fate of Charles W. Morse. He employed me to examine fully the case and to determine if upon the merits he was entitled to Executive clemency. I reached the conclusion that the penalty was excessive, in view of the fact that the court of appeals had reversed the lower court on several of the counts in the indictment. I was requested to proceed with the case.

I told my client that the case was a very important one; that my acquaintance in official circles was circumscribed; that I knew an attorney in Columbus, Ohio, with whom I had been associated both personally and professionally, who possessed in an eminent degree not only ability but character, which entitled and gave him the confidence and respect of officials who had to do with the case. He authorized me to employ him. We proceeded with the case.

Morse was pardoned. I, as leading counsel in the case, directed step by step the policies pursued by and with the advice of my associate. If anything irregular was done, I am solely responsible. If anything irregular is charged to me by anyone at any time, I will take care of that situation. I dislike to take part in political bickerings and wranglings. I like a calm, placid life, but I have sat mute and listened to the vile and baseless insinuations uttered against this great and good man, whom I personally know would not under any temptation so far forget either his manhood or his honor as to do an unethical, much less corrupt, professional act. I feel that even without his consent I must break the silence.

Very truly yours,

THOS. B. FELDER,
165 Broadway, New York City.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, the Senator has a very poor opinion of the writer of the letter, I assume——

Mr. CARAWAY. I have.

Mr. MOSES. Because of his reputation as a common liar and because he has been active in trying to prevent the enactment of child-labor legislation, if I correctly understood the Senator.

Mr. CARAWAY. I said that was to his discredit.

Mr. MOSES. That is to the discredit of any person.

Mr. CARAWAY. Well, I think any lobbyist has a very poor job. A man who goes around lobbying may be an entirely respectable citizen in some sections, but I do not take to him kindly myself.

Mr. MOSES. I will call the Senator's attention to the fact that if the opposition to child-labor legislation is reprehensible, he may gain some very valuable information if he will turn to a roll call in the Senate on the 18th of December, 1918, which is recorded on page 629 of the RECORD. On that roll call 12 votes are recorded in the negative, which may be worthy of his study.

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes; and they will be worthy of the Senator's study.

Mr. MOSES. I was here at the time.

Mr. CARAWAY. I know the Senator was. I voted for the child-labor law myself, but other Members on both sides of the House of Representatives, where I then served, were opposed to it because they thought it was unconstitutional, and unfortunately the Supreme Court agreed with them. They had taken an oath to support the Constitution, and some people feel bound by oaths—others do not.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, I may call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the measure to which I have reference was not the child-labor law for which the Senator from Arkansas voted and which the court held unconstitutional.

Mr. CARAWAY. I know nothing about it, then.

Mr. MOSES. I refer to the amendment to impose a special tax upon the products of child labor.

Mr. CARAWAY. That act has not as yet been passed upon by the Supreme Court.

Mr. MOSES. The vote was 50 to 12 in favor of it, and all of the 12 negative votes happened to come from the side of the aisle which the Senator is ornamenting. It may be interesting to him to know that.

Mr. CARAWAY. It might be interesting to know that those on this side of the aisle have been the ones who thought the Constitution ought to be upheld.

Mr. MOSES. Including the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments?

Mr. CARAWAY. I want to ask the Senator from New Hampshire a question. Does he think Felder is a man who ought to be believed?

Mr. MOSES. I do not know him at all; I have taken the Senator's word for it.

Mr. CARAWAY. Do not do that.

Mr. MOSES. I recognize, of course, that the Senator is an authority on such matters, and I take the Senator's word about a constituent from his neighborhood.

Mr. CARAWAY. Well, he used to be in my neighborhood, but his reputation grew so unsavory that he moved up the Senator's way, where the company would be more congenial.

Mr. MOSES. He has not as yet happened to come within the circle of my acquaintance.

Mr. CARAWAY. You will meet him; do not be impatient. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I started to say—and I hope I shall be able to do so—that I do not care to discuss personal differences. In the controversy that has now grown up concerning the Attorney General it was not my intention to repeat anything except what I understood was of common reputation and undisputed fact. The charge against the Attorney General was not made by me. It had been published over and over again, and, as I have been able to show from the newspapers, the Attorney General admits the charge. He had taken the credit for his performance, whatever it amounted to, long years ago. The mere mention of it, however, met with a storm of protest, as if it were a new charge which I had dragged to light. Since it has been repeated and denied I find that it is true, and have so shown.

Permit me again to express the hope that the Attorney General—and I rather believe he will, for the Senator from Ohio, for whom I have great respect, tells me that Mr. Daugherty is a man without fear and of personal integrity, and therefore I know he does not want to leave his friend the distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] embarrassed—will make a full statement admitting he had misled the Senator from Indiana, so that the Senator from Indiana, for whom I have the very greatest respect and liking, will not be subjected to criticism for having repeated the statement the Attorney General had made to him.

THE TARIFF.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7456) to provide revenue, to regulate commerce with foreign countries, to encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, recurring to the item of boric acid in the bill, I believe that some reason should be given for the action of the majority of the Senate committee. I observe that the chairman of the committee is not present at this time; but, inasmuch as he and the Senator from Utah were conferring just before the Senator from North Dakota left the Chamber, I presume that the Senator from Utah will be able to give us the information, and if he has any information on the subject I think it should be given.

I therefore ask the Senator from Utah to tell us why the Finance Committee took the action which it did take regarding this item, boric acid.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from New Mexico that the Senator from Utah and the Senator from North Dakota were discussing another subject matter.

The Senator complains because of the fact that in the report of the committee this item was not mentioned, and therefore, he says, the Senate knows nothing about it. I wonder if there ever was a report made by any committee on a tariff bill where there were thousands of amendments that mentioned every item and gave the reason why all the changes were made. The report is long enough as it is; but if the committee had made a report of that kind we would have not one volume but a good many volumes to present in a report. This, however, is an item that can be discussed in a very few words and the reasons given why the Finance Committee of the Senate reduced the rate provided for in the House bill.

Briefly, I will say to the Senator, the reasons are these:

In my opinion we can make boric acid in this country as cheaply as it can be made anywhere in the world. Ninety per cent of all the boric acid that is shipped into the United States comes from Italy, and they can make it about as cheaply—not quite as cheaply, I think—as we can make it in the United States, although at times the cost is about equal, and I think with the depreciated currency to-day they may have a little advantage over the producer in the United States. In normal times they would not have any advantage, and America could hold her own if the product were on the free list. The Payne-Aldrich Act placed a rate of duty of 3 cents a pound on boric acid; the Underwood Act placed a rate of duty of three-fourths of a cent a pound on it. In the latter case it was purely a revenue measure, without a question of doubt. The rate that the Senate has put in here will be purely a revenue measure if this bill is on the statute books a year or two.

I will say to the Senator from New Mexico now that I do not believe the industry would be destroyed at all if boric acid went on the free list, but if we can raise some money in this way by Italy shipping boric acid into this country at certain points where it does not have to be reshipped and where the freight rate enters into the question I think we ought to have this little revenue from it. Frankly, I will say to the Senator that that is what this is, and nothing more nor less.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I think the Senate is entitled to this information; but nothing was tendered by any member of the committee before the matter was submitted for a vote, and I can not understand why this duty should have been imposed upon this commodity under all the information which was presented to the Senate Finance Committee.

I do not know yet how the Senator from Utah or the other members of the committee reached the conclusion that this was a mere revenue duty. There is no testimony on the subject, either as to the cost of production in this country or as to the cost of production in Italy.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that the reason is that no producer of the article cared whether the duty was 3 cents or 2 cents, and I do not think they cared whether it was 1½ cents. Nobody was here asking for a reduction or for an increase. Nobody appeared here upon it, and we did not expect anybody to appear.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I think I shall show before I conclude that somebody did appear.

Mr. SMOOT. Before the Finance Committee?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Not before the Finance Committee, but before the Committee on Ways and Means in the House, all of which hearings have been referred to by the members of the Finance Committee from time to time when they have been seeking some light upon the subject.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator want the Senate to reject the amendment and have the House provision adopted?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. No, Mr. President; I do not want that. What I do want is to leave the duty upon this item just where the law puts it to-day, because I do not think it can be shown that any just reason has been given for increasing this duty 100 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. I suppose the Senator refers to the brief of the Italian Chamber of Commerce before the House committee.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Yes; I am going to refer to that. I desire now to present some information regarding this subject myself.

This product, boric acid, is a commodity that is used in many ways in the United States. The production of it is quite large, and its use is rather common, and I think I shall read what the Tariff Commission has to say about it.

The first reference to it in the report of the Tariff Commission is that—

> Boracic acid, or boric acid, as it is usually called, is made in the United States from a mineral which occurs abundantly in California. Before the war imports were less than 5 per cent of the American production. Within the last four years a substantial export business has developed.

Further on in the Tariff Commission report the statement is made that—

> Crude borate minerals are mined in the United States, Chile, Turkey, Italy, Peru, Argentina, Bolivia, and Germany. Before the outbreak of the European war the United States produced about one-half of the total world's supply, Chile about one-third, and Turkey about one-tenth. This output of the United States grew rapidly during the war.

Then the report gives the tonnage of this crude borate, beginning with the year 1903 and going down to 1918, showing that the quantity produced increased from 34,430 tons in 1903 to 88,794 tons in 1918.

This industry is controlled by four concerns:

> The Pacific Borax Co., of New York City.
> Charles Pfizer & Co., of New York City.
> The Stauffer Chemical Co., of San Francisco.
> The Thorkildsen-Mather Co., of Chicago.

The information from the Tariff Commission further is that—

Imports of boric acid have been less than 5 per cent of the domestic production. In 1914 Italy furnished 80 per cent of the imports, 18.5 per cent came from England, and the balance from Germany. Imports of refined borax have been entirely negligible, less than 0.01 per cent of the domestic production.

The imports of boric acid for consumption in the United States from 1909 to 1919 are also given, with the unit value of these imports for consumption. The amount of boric acid imported into the United States in 1909 was 230,968 pounds and in the calendar year 1919 it was 276,795 pounds. The unit value of this product imported in 1909 was only 3 cents a pound, and ranged from 3 to 4 cents for several years, and finally, during the war, it reached 11 cents a pound, and in 1919 it was reduced to 8 cents a pound.

There are no statistics on exports available. It is, however, known that before the beginning of the European war exports were small and chiefly to the Orient, but that during the war a substantial export business to Europe was developed. The scarcity of ocean shipping has forced the European nations to supply their needs with refined products from the United States rather than with crude borate material from Chile and Turkey.

Although no statistics of production in foreign countries are available, the import and export statistics show that England and France have large manufacturing industries based on imported raw materials. The German statistics do not show the amount of crude materials imported, but do show that imports of borax and boric acid exceed the export of these commodities. Italy exports boric acid made from Italian raw materials, but imports borax.

Mr. President, the price of boric acid in the United States prior to the war was from 7 to 8 cents per pound. The price in Italy, according to the valuation put upon the exports to the United States, was, as I have just stated, around 4 cents per pound, showing that the cost of transportation and the profits which the importers made, and so on, only justified the importation into the United States prior to the war of not exceeding 5 per cent of the American consumption of boric acid, and the American price was kept up to 7 and 8 cents per pound. During the war the price in the United States reached 14 cents per pound. At the present time the price of boric acid ranges from 11½ to 12½ cents per pound, whereas before the war it was from 7 to 8 cents. In other words, the price of that acid now is about 50 per cent or more above the pre-war price. The amount imported was very small, never at any time in excess of 5 per cent of the domestic production.

The only testimony upon this subject was in a brief or communication presented to the Ways and Means Committee from some people in New York City. That letter is most interesting and it makes an appeal for the retention of the present rate of duty on boric acid. It is really a very impressive appeal from one of our allies in the war. It is called "The brief of the Italian Chamber of Commerce in New York," and it reads:

The Italian Chamber of Commerce in New York is an association of American citizens and business men, incorporated under the laws of the State of New York, representing not only the commercial and industrial class of a community of nearly 4,000,000 of their kinsmen in the United States, of which over half a million are in the city of New York alone, but also the general interests of American firms having trade relations with Italy. This chamber is, therefore, interested in the promotion of commerce and mutual friendly relations between the United States and Italy, as well as in the production and trade of domestic articles and generally in the welfare and prosperity of both countries. It desires to submit to the consideration of your committee in respect to the various sections and schedules of the customs tariff its views and desiderata in connection with their revision, and earnestly hopes that they will receive the attention of your committee. This as Americans we expect, relying upon that spirit of cooperation between the duties of citizenship and the responsibility of legislators that should mark their mutual endeavors to protect and promote the best interests of this country, without forgetting our obligations to those whose pressing needs for help and liberal treatment, enabling them to retrieve, in part at least, their fortunes sacrificed for a just and common cause, we should not be unmindful of on the morrow of battles fought together for the triumph of right and the mutual good. A solidarity of record this, which can not be entirely overlooked, even in such unsentimental work as the framing or revising of a tariff.

The chamber is not unaware of the great difficulties confronting legislators in a tariff revision, particularly now, under such a critical period as that of readjustment from war to peace conditions and after a conflagration of unprecedented magnitude, that has caused the greatest upheaval and strain ever recorded in the economic conditions of practically all nations of the world, and recovery from which can not be, at best, but slow and laborious when the lawmakers intrusted with the serious risk of hastening this recovery are met by an array of most perplexing problems and often left in a quandary of most arduous deliberation. Circumstances like these which, while counseling both conservativeness and prudence in their resolutions, seem at the same time to call more than ever for the sympathy and earnest cooperation of the public in the discharge of their responsible duties.

From the outset this chamber desires to record its conviction, which it confidently believes is shared by your honorable committee, that tariff revision should aim strictly at such purposes as come legitimately within the scope of the tariff, namely, first that of raising revenue by such sober and wise regulation of rates as will secure, with a minimum cost to the Government and the least inconvenience to trade, a satisfactory yield, taking above all good care that the source of revenue be not impaired, since an excessive increase of duty would void this purpose, and next that of offsetting the difference in the cost of production of an article between this and foreign countries. Furthermore, we believe that rather than considering an eventual revision of the tariff to make it serve the purpose of tiding the unavoidable deflation in the prices of commodities, due to the operation of the law of supply and demand in the process of economic readjustment from war to peace conditions, possibility should be afforded between this and foreign nations for entering into such reciprocal agreements regarding their respective commercial relations as would meet with their desires and interests and tend to promote and increase trade between the United States and foreign countries, and thus form an economic cooperation which experience has shown to be of mutual advantage.

Then comes the head "Boric acid, crude and refined borax," and I continue reading from the brief:

Even under normal conditions the importation of boracic acid of 276 short tons in fiscal year 1914 was a mere trifle against the domestic output of boric products in this country, amounting in that year to 4,292 short tons of boracic acid and 26,501 tons of borax. This is still more true since the war, which has practically eliminated importations, with only 97 short tons to their credit in fiscal year 1918, and 140 and 127 short tons, respectively, in fiscal years 1919 and 1920. Domestic producers are absolute masters of the market, and, notwithstanding their location on the Pacific coast, will easily remain such in future, as transportation through the Panama Canal enables them to land East their output at no higher freights than the imported, while the lower cost of fuel and materials gives them the advantage in an industry where labor has been replaced by machinery to a far greater extent in this country than abroad. There being absolutely no possibility of competition to American industry from the imported product in this line of commodity, this chamber respectfully recommends that the present rates of three-fourths of 1 cent per pound on boracic acid and of one-eighth of 1 cent per pound on refined borax and the exemption of duty for crude borax continue unchanged.

Mr. President, I have read that statement in full for the purpose of showing the attitude in which those people come before the Congress regarding this item of commerce. That is a body representing the business interests in the United States of 4,000,000 people of Italian extraction. They present to us the situation in which the unfortunate countries are following this Great War. They make this appeal, and, so far as I am advised, it is the only article in this entire bill about which a request has been made from that representative association. Evidently it means something to Italy. According to the statement, it can not harm the United States. It will not harm an industry in the United States. The importations have never exceeded 5 per cent. The importations in 1920 were only a few tons.

One hundred and twenty-seven tons is all that has been imported of this boric acid.

The production in this country is over 5,000 tons. It can not affect this industry in the United States, but these people came and presented the situation which affects their country. They are trying to recover from the woeful effects of the recent world-wide conflict, and I want to know whether there is anything in the general situation which would warrant anyone in increasing the duty upon a product where an express appeal is made not to have it increased, and where no satisfactory reason is given for the increase.

The revenue which will be derived from the duty to be levied on this item will be infinitesimal because of the very small quantity which can be imported. The great deposits of the crude material are in the United States, and the process of refining is simple and inexpensive. The commodity is produced by only four corporations in this country. There is no evidence of competition between them. All indications are otherwise. To increase the present duty 100 per cent, as the committee proposes to do, will obstruct the small importations which have been coming in and enable the American producers to maintain present prices, which are 50 per cent above pre-war prices, or more probably enable them to raise still higher the price of the enormous quantity sold to the consumers.

I have here the statement regarding our trade with Italy, and I desire to just call attention to it, and I think it will appear that this country is not in danger of being flooded with commodities from Italy. Our imports from Italy in 1918 amounted to $24,340,000. In 1919 they were $59,060,000. In 1920 they were $75,356,000. In 1921 they were $62,000,000. Certainly that was not a great flood of importations from Italy into the United States, but Italy has been one of our best customers. In 1918 we exported to Italy $492,174,000. In 1919 we exported $442,676,000. In 1920 we exported $371,762,000. In 1921 we exported $215,462,000.

That shows, Mr. President, that while we have been importing from Italy a very small amount, our exports to Italy have been in large amounts. It is true they are diminishing, and the reason they are diminishing must be evident. They are no longer able to buy the commodities from the United States, and that is one of the reasons why this association from New York appealed to the American Congress to permit this duty to remain as it is, because they wanted to exchange some of their commodities for the commodities of the United States.

To my mind that appeal is a most pitiful one. Unquestionably this item means something to the people of Italy, else that great association, representing business interests in this country and in Italy, representing the welfare of 4,000,000 people of Italian extraction living in the United States, would not feel that it is of such importance that they would come before Congress and ask that the duty remain as it is. Instead of granting that appeal, that prayer, if you please, while the House increased the duty about 175 per cent, the Finance Committee of the Senate feels that it is doing the righteous thing by increasing the duty only 100 per cent. That is the answer which the Senate Finance Committee sends to New York to these people who are pleading for an exchange of commerce between this country and the rest of the world, where the production in the United States will not be injured. There is no claim here that it will be injured. This increase of duty is the only response to that touching appeal which comes to us, echoing the cry from Italy, from those people who turned the tide on the Piave during the World War, who sacrificed their blood and their resources that, jointly with us, there should be brought about the successful conclusion of the war. That is the appeal which they make, and the only answer is that we will increase the duty 100 per cent.

Mr. President, I think it advisable that there be put into the RECORD the other industries which will be affected by slowing up or diminishing importations from Italy. The impression has gone abroad, and it is doubtless quite prevalent in the United States, that the only industries interested in foreign trade are the farming industries of the country. I want that impression to be gotten out of the minds of the people of the country. It is true that our exports of food products are quite large, but the exports of material for manufacture in foreign countries and the exports of manufactured products each are substantially as large as the exports of food products. There is a great variety of manufactured products sent to Italy. I want to call attention to just a few.

We start in with a lot of agricultural implements; brass; breadstuffs. Then come machinery, airplanes, automobiles; cars, freight cars and passenger cars; bicycles, tricycles, and motor cycles; a lot of acids; dyestuffs; coal and coke; copper of different kinds; cotton; earthen, stone, and china ware; electrical machinery; fertilizers; iron and steel products, pig iron, ferromanganese; bar iron; bars and rods of steel; wire rods, billets, ingots of steel; bolts, nuts, rivets, washers; car wheels; chains; cutlery; razors; enameled ware; locks and hinges; hardware, hooks; machinery of different kinds; adding and calculating machines; air-compressing machinery; cash registers and parts of; elevators and elevator machinery; engines and parts of, combustible and otherwise.

Then come other iron and steel products, excavating machinery, lawn mowers, metal-working machinery, machined tools, mining machinery, printing presses, pumps and pumping machinery, sewing machines, shoe machinery, textile machinery, typesetting machines, typewriting machines, woodworking machinery, and various other classes of machinery commodities; leather goods; meat and dairy products; and various other classes of commodities of which a surplus is produced in this country.

Mr. President, as an appendix to my remarks I desire to insert a statement showing the various classes of exports which we send to Italy. It is the latest statement I could obtain regarding those exports. The data have been compiled by the Tariff Commission and show the various items of our exports to Italy during the year 1921 covering this great class of commodities. I desire to have that inserted at the close of my remarks upon this subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCNARY in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in the different items which the Senator mentioned I did not hear him name those which make up the bulk of the amount, because they are nearly all agricultural products, such as wheat and cotton.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I have had appended to my remarks the entire list, including both the quantity and the value.

Mr. SMOOT. But the value is generally largely based on agricultural products which they purchase from us.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. While of course the agricultural products are large, yet I am not so certain about the Senator's statement. Of course they get a great deal of meat products from this country.

Mr. SMOOT. The wheat alone is $91,054,928, and wheat flour is $32,726,716.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The list will appear as a part of my remarks. The Senator, however, should not minimize the importance of this trade with Italy, because our principal exports to Italy are products of the farm. But I was calling attention to the fact that the manufacturing interests of the country are as much concerned substantially about the export trade of the country as are the food producers of the country. If the Senator wants to get some information regarding this international trade as a whole as related to the different commodities, I will repeat what I stated in the Senate a few days ago from the list which was published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

In 1920 the exports of foodstuffs amounted to $1,861,000,000; the exports of manufacturing materials for that same year were $1,852,000,000, and the exports of manufactured products ready for use for that year were $1,807,000,000. There were the three great divisions of the export trade just about equaling each other.

In 1921 the exports of the food products amounted to $1,263,000,000, the exports of manufacturing materials $991,000,000, and the exports of manufactured products $899,000,000. They are just about on a parity so far as the export trade is concerned. That was figured out, as the Senator doubtless remembers, by the statistician for the City National Bank of New York, Mr. Austin.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator say that exports to Italy were that much, or all of our exports?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. All of our exports, of course.

Mr. SMOOT. I was speaking only of those to Italy.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I gave the amount of our exports to Italy, I think, while the Senator was for the moment out of the Chamber. But it should be remembered that exports to Italy—I will call the attention of the Senator to that again—in 1918 were over $492,000,000, while our imports from Italy were only $24,000,000, or only about 5 per cent as much imported as was exported.

Mr. SMOOT. That was on account of shipping facilities.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. In 1919 our exports to Italy were $442,000,000 and our imports from Italy $59,000,000. In 1920 our exports to Italy were $371,000,000 and our imports only $75,000,000. In 1921 our exports to Italy were reduced to $215,000,000 and our imports were reduced a little also. We only imported $62,000,000 from Italy in 1921.

So, Mr. President, we should encourage this international exchange of commodities, especially where it will not interfere with home production. On the one item which is under consideration it is admitted by everybody that there is no danger of interfering with home production. We have a touching appeal here from the representatives of Italians, naturalized Americans, who yet retain affection for their mother country, and in response to their appeal to allow the tariff on this item to remain where it has been, the Senate committee answers with an increase of 100 per cent, and that in the face of these large exports to Italy and our relatively small imports from Italy. That is the situation and I do not believe the people of this country will tolerate it.

I have here the monthly letter of the Alexander Hamilton Institute, of New York City, giving a review of general business conditions, and I find this statement regarding trade indicators. It refers to the monthly exports of iron and steel. I think the statement gives the March figures, because it is dated April, 1922. I have not the exact date for which the figures are given, but I assume they are for the month of March.

The monthly exports of steel and iron in the corresponding month a year ago amounted to $137,803,000; in the corresponding month six months ago they had been reduced to $27,647,000. In the preceding month, the month preceding that in which the letter was written, the exports of iron and steel were $29,502,000, and in the month covered by the report had been reduced to $15,149,000. The exports of steel and iron have been reduced from $137,000,000 a year ago to $15,000,000 at this time.

The merchandise exports monthly show this situation: That in the corresponding month a year ago they amounted to $486,000,000; six months ago they amounted to $367,000,000; one month ago to $279,000,000, and, according to the last monthly report, they were $250,000,000; while our imports remained substantially the same for each of those months.

For the corresponding month a year ago the exports of merchandise, I repeat, amounted to $486,000,000; six months ago they amounted to $195,000,000; for the preceding month they amounted to $216,000,000; and, according to the latest report, they amounted to $217,000,000.

That shows, Mr. President, the very definite trend of our commerce; it shows that our exports are rapidly diminishing, while our imports are remaining comparatively the same. There can be but one reason why our exports are diminishing in such degree and why our imports are practically remaining stationary. The reason may be attributed to the fact that after the World War our Government was loaning money abroad—though not a year ago, it is true. Then commercial interests took up the question of extending credits, and did extend credits by the billions of dollars. I have seen the estimate made that private credits extended to the rest of the world by interests and people in the United States amount to about $5,000,000,000. Last year there were floated in this country about three-quarters of a billion dollars of funded securities from foreign countries. Those foreign securities are being put upon the market of the United States every week. Just a few days ago $100,000,000 of Canadian bonds were floated in the American market. In every commercial report is found a statement of bonds issued by nearly every country in South America and by every country in Europe which is entitled to credit.

They have all come to the United States to get credit, and as they secured credit they bought our goods; but notwithstanding the huge offerings of foreign credits here and their absorption by the American people our exports have been gradually diminishing, until this year our exports of merchandise have decreased about 50 per cent—from $486,000,000 in the month a year ago to $251,000,000 in the month last reported. That is what is happening. It is affecting not only the food producers of this country, but it is affecting the manufacturers of the country as well.

When Senators talk about increasing wages and also the products of the manufactories, it can only be as to a certain few which are not affected by the export trade; but if we stop our exports we are going to bring unemployment to the people who labor in the exporting manufactories of the country. That is what is going to happen. The existing condition can not last much longer. Some attention must be paid to the export trade.

I am perfectly willing that full consideration may be given to the support of our domestic industries so far as it may be done, but the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] and all other Senators must know that the levying of a tariff, whether big or little, does not tend to encourage exports. I agree with the association of Italians in New York that we ought to look at this matter in a spirit of reciprocity; that we ought to aid the restoration of the world, so far as it may be done, if it will not materially injure ourselves. We must build up the foreign market if this country is to be prosperous; but we can not restore prosperity here and at the same time build up a wall around the United States and decline to permit the importation of certain commodities.

Mr. President, I have been very much interested in a recent questionnaire of the National Chamber of Commerce. The National Chamber of Commerce, I presume, is composed of more different business interests in this country than were ever brought together at any other time into one association. Quite frequently that association sends out questionnaires for the purpose of obtaining the opinion of the business men of the United States regarding public questions.

A couple of months ago in the issue of the paper from which I shall now read, the March, 1922, issue of the paper called The Nation's Business, which sets forth what that chamber of commerce did, there were six propositions submitted. I only desire to refer to two of them. One was:

Reasonable protection for American industries subject to destructive competition from abroad and of benefit to any considerable section of the country.

The next was:

The principle of maintenance and encouragement of our export trade should be observed in tariff legislation so far as consistent with protection of American industries of benefit to any considerable section of the country and subject to destructive competition from abroad.

That is the first time that that measure of a tariff has been announced, so far as I know. We have heard various other standards put forth for the fixing of tariff rates. The difference between the cost of production at home and abroad has been the one most dwelt upon. It has been the one which has been advanced here during the discussion of the pending bill. That difference in cost has been ascertained by the majority of the Finance Committee, according to my notion, in a very uncertain and precarious fashion; the committee has no definite information on which to proceed; but here is another element added by the members of the National Chamber of Commerce; and that is that a duty should be levied for the purpose of protecting the industries which are threatened with destruction from abroad. That is the standard which the chamber of commerce now presents; and I should like to call attention to the vote upon that. The vote on it was 1,852½ for, and against it but 24½.

Remember that that is the standard for the fixing of the tariff according to the vote of the National Chamber of Commerce. An industry must not only be subject to destructive competition from abroad, but the industry must be a benefit to a considerable section of the country. That is something new in tariff legislation, so far as I know. The National Chamber of Commerce insists that two things shall occur: That the industry shall be a benefit to a considerable section of the country, and that protection shall be used for the purpose of preventing destruction. Why have they added those two new elements? They have done so because they have realized, as I have tried to point out, the absolute necessity of doing something to foster our export trade; to enable the countries of the remainder of the world to purchase the things of which we produce a great surplus. That is what they say in the other question. Mark the standard laid down by the National Chamber of Commerce:

The principle of maintenance and encouragement of our export trade should be observed in tariff legislation so far as consistent—with protection of American industries of benefit to any considerable section of the country and subject to destructive competition from abroad.

The vote upon that question was 1,804½ for it and only 57½ against it.

The Chamber of Commerce, composed of business interests throughout the country, had vision enough to see this situation. So far as this bill is concerned there does not appear anywhere anything which is calculated even to sustain, much less promote, our foreign commerce.

We have the farmers of the country appealing for a market for their wheat, for their corn, for their meat; we have some of the mining interests of the country appealing for a market for copper, and the manufacturers appealing for a market for machinery and for various other commodities which enter into our export trade. The export trade is diminishing almost every day, and nothing under the sun can help it or even sustain it unless we shall bring about an exchange of commodities. This thing of extending credits indefinitely to the rest of the world can not continue.

Mr. President, as I have said, there is nothing in this bill which tends to promote this trade. There is nothing said in the report anywhere on that subject, but the chairman of the Finance Committee undertook to indicate what he expected would result from the passage of this bill. I want to read just a few words from what he said in his opening speech presenting this bill.

After contending that we should sustain the manufacturing interests of the country, and that we could do it only by a drastic protective tariff, he referred to this surplus of farm products. He did not refer to the surplus of manufactured products, but here is what he had to say:

Our soil to-day produces more than the American public consumes. The depressed prices of agricultural products are due to our surplus, augmented, of course, by the Old World bankruptcy.

What does that indicate should be done?

What the farmer needs is the greatest number of consumers of his product. If he can make the home consumption greater than the home production, even though the deficit does not exceed 1 per cent, then, with a proper tariff wall, he can secure a just price for his product.

For the most part, wheat is a drug on the American market. As stated by President Harding in his address to the Congress, a bumper crop of wheat in the United States often brings in less cash to the farmer than a very much smaller crop. We want more acres of farm land planted to other products. We want to encourage the farmers in this country to sow millions of acres to flax, to hemp, to onions, to beans, and other such products. * * * We want to reduce the wheat surplus.

Mr. President, those are the consoling recommendations which come to us from the chairman of the Finance Committee in presenting this bill. What he would do with regard to the surplus of wheat would be simply to compel the farmers of this country to quit producing wheat, and he tells them in a very complacent manner to quit producing wheat until the amount is so reduced that there will not be quite enough for the consumers of this country, to quit producing wheat and go to growing flax. That is what he would do, and that is his only message of condolence to the people of this country—that they must quit growing wheat and go to growing flax. That is his message to the meat raisers of this country—quit raising meat and go to raising flax. That is his message to the copper producers of this country—quit producing copper; go to raising flax. That is his message to all these thousands of employees in the great industries of this country of every kind which produce a surplus—to quit producing their surplus and go to raising flax. That is what he says to the cotton producers of this country: "Do not produce a surplus. Let us build around this great United States a tariff wall. Let us produce only enough of these commodities to satisfy home consumption. Let us isolate ourselves from the rest of the world. Let our cotton producers stop raising cotton and go to raising flax."

That is the consolation which is brought to us here by the chairman of the Finance Committee. That is what this bill means. Take up that speech, rendered here deliberately, prepared in advance, doubtless every word studied, read in the Chamber, and that is the consolation which this country receives: "If you can not produce copper, raise flax. If you can not find a market for your surplus of anything else, raise flax." My humble judgment is that if this bill becomes a law, instead of these people raising flax they are going to raise—fire and brimstone for the supporters of this bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-six Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I move to amend the committee amendment on page 2, line 9, by striking out "1½" and inserting "¾"; and upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 2, line 9, in the committee amendment it is proposed to strike out the numerals "1½" and to insert "¾."

Mr. HITCHCOCK. How will the amendment then read?

The READING CLERK. So that it will read:

Boric acid, three-fourths of 1 cent per pound.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New Mexico to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CARAWAY (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCKINLEY]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] and vote "yea."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STANFIELD] and vote "nay."

Mr. TRAMMELL (when his name was called). In the absence of my pair, the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT], I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. WATSON of Georgia (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Arizona [Mr.

CAMERON]. Being unable to obtain a transfer, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] is paired with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. McKELLAR (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW], which I transfer to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I have a general pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD]. I find I can not obtain a transfer of my pair, and I shall therefore be compelled to withhold my vote, which I do. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. DIAL. I desire to announce that my colleague the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] is detained by illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. HALE. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] to the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CROW] and vote "nay."

Mr. WALSH of Montana (after having voted in the affirmative). The senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], with whom I have a pair, is absent from the Chamber. I transfer my pair to the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. EDGE. I desire to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] is absent on official business.

So the amendment of Mr. JONES of New Mexico to the amendment of the committee was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the next amendment.

The READING CLERK. On page 2, line 10, strike out "12" and insert "18," so as to read:

Citric acid, 18 cents per pound.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I offer an amendment, and ask that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The READING CLERK. On page 230, line 6, after the words "provided for," strike out the proviso in the following words:

Provided, That for a period of five years beginning on the day following the passage of this act there shall be levied, collected, and paid, on the actual potash (potassium oxide) content of all the foregoing, a duty of 2½ cents per pound for the first two years; 2 cents per pound for the third year; 1½ cents per pound for the fourth year; and 1 cent per pound for the fifth year: Provided further, That thereafter the said potash content shall be free of duty.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, nearly all the potash brought into this country is used in the manufacture of fertilizers, and the duty placed on potash will be paid by the farmers. Those engaged in agriculture have suffered more than any others during the business depression, and it is almost impossible for the farmers to make any profit on their products. It would be a great injustice to tax them on the fertilizers they must buy to raise their crops, and I hope the Senate will pass the amendment I have offered placing potash on the free list.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment submitted by the Senator from Georgia will be printed and lie on the table. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I move as an amendment to the committee amendment to strike out the numerals "12," in line 10, page 2, after the words "citric acid," and insert in lieu thereof the numeral "5."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator from California whether he desires to address the Senate upon this amendment?

Mr. JOHNSON. I want to submit some very brief observations respecting it.

Mr. KING. I yield the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. KING. I supposed the Senator from California desired to address the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON. What is the desire of the Senator from Utah? He has presented an amendment to the amendment. Does he desire to be heard concerning it?

Mr. KING. I shall speak at some length concerning it, but it would be very gratifying to me if I might have the pleasure of hearing the Senator from California first.

Mr. JOHNSON. I would rather deny the Senator that particular pleasure and listen to him.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I regret that I have not been advised by the Senator from California, who I assume is the spokesman for the Senate amendment which increases the House rate upon citric acid, what reasons exist for this remarkable advance. In my opinion, the increase from 12 cents per pound to 18 cents per pound is wholly unwarranted and indefensible. I shall ask the Senate to not only not concur in this Senate amendment but support a motion to reduce the rate to 5 cents per pound, which is the rate in the Underwood-Simmons law.

The Finance Committee have asked for 18 cents per pound tariff upon citric acid, the House bill carries 12 cents per pound, the Payne-Aldrich tariff law fixed 7 cents per pound, and, as stated, the Underwood-Simmons law fixes the rate at 5 cents per pound.

Before proceeding to a discussion of citric acid, I desire to read an editorial appearing in to-day's New York Journal of Commerce, a Republican paper of influence and power. I wish all Senators would read the editorials appearing in this ably edited journal upon tariff and cognate questions, because I am sure they would derive benefit and obtain enlightenment, and thus be enabled to vote—shall I say more intelligently, certainly more logically—upon the schedules now before us.

Under the heading "Tariff joker No. 3" the following is stated in the editorial:

In the House form of the pending tariff bill the duty on glue and gelatine was fixed at 20 per cent ad valorem.

The distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. McCORMICK], who is the chairman of the Senate Republican committee, just passed me and made some comment sotto voce about "glue." Unfortunately for his party the Indiana Republicans were not glued sufficiently to the reactionary policies of the Republican Party and therefore voted for Mr. Beveridge.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. ODDIE. I think it might be interesting to the Senator from Utah to make a little calculation of the combined votes of the two Republican candidates and the combined votes of the several Democratic candidates in the election held in Indiana yesterday.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I am delighted that my friend the Senator from Nevada has projected himself, perhaps indirectly, into a discussion of political conditions in Indiana. His great familiarity with the situation there undoubtedly enables him to speak authoritatively as to the reasons for the small vote in the Democratic primary. If he were familiar with the situation there the Senator would know that there was a bitter contest between our distinguished and greatly esteemed colleague [Mr. NEW] and former Senator Beveridge. Our colleague, as everyone knows, is a warm friend of the President of the United States and undoubtedly represented in that contest the administration; in a sense the administration was on trial and he was the representative of the views and policies of the President and the administration, policies which I have heretofore denominated as reactionary, and which are being defended by the "die-hards" and the "hard-boiled" elements of the party in power with such accretions as it may receive.

Mr. Beveridge is a former Progressive. He followed the flag of Mr. Roosevelt when President Harding and Senator NEW followed the flag of Republican orthodoxy. Presumably Mr.

Beveridge stands for policies adverse, in some respects, at least, to the reactionism of the Republican Party.

The Senator from Nevada must know that when swords are drawn between such antagonists as Senator NEW, a brave, gallant, and chivalrous man, fighting as he did for the reactionaries of his party and for the Republican administration, and Mr. Beveridge, representing the more liberal elements of the Republican Party, and having, of course, his personal following, and the remnants of the Progressives, there would be a battle royal that would bring to the polls the combined strength of the Republican Party as well as the personal following of the two leaders.

Mr. ODDIE. The Senator has undoubtedly noted the statement by Mr. Beveridge in his campaign that he would be a strong supporter of the present administration.

Mr. KING. I remember what the Senator states, and though Mr. Beveridge, according to the press, made statements of a general character about supporting the administration, he proceeded to denounce some of the policies and tendencies of the Republican Party, including the way some Republicans in this Chamber, including the Senator from Nevada as well as the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW], voted upon certain questions. The Senator knows what votes I have particularly in mind.

Among the Democrats there was no contest. Former Governor Ralston, whom everybody knew to be a genial, able, chivalrous gentleman, was a candidate in the Democratic primaries for the Senatorship. His nomination was conceded by all. There were two gentlemen who announced their candidacy, but no campaign of any importance was waged and the Democrats, realizing the situation, paid but little attention to the primary. There was nothing in the political contest upon the Democratic side that occasioned organization activity or the bringing to the polls of any number of votes. But let me say to my friend from Nevada to be a little patient and wait until next November; he will then see the invincible Democracy of Indiana with its army of voters who will commission Governor Ralston to occupy a seat after the 4th of March next on this side of the Chamber. The Republican administration will be repudiated there as it is being repudiated throughout the United States.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. McCORMICK. Will Governor Ralston or the Senator from Utah in the interim between now——

Mr. KING. The Senator is going to ask about the League of Nations?

Mr. McCORMICK. Precisely.

Mr. KING. I knew it.

Mr. McCORMICK. Will Governor Ralston and the Senator declare before November whether or no they wish the United States to subscribe to the covenant of the League of Nations and enter into the integral enforcement of the treaty of Versailles?

Mr. KING. Is that the end of the Senator's question?

Mr. McCORMICK. That is the question the Senator from Illinois has asked.

Mr. KING. I am not in the confidence of Governor Ralston. I am not his political keeper. I can not say what he advocated during the primary campaign or what he will declare for between now and November. One thing I think I can say to the Senator, though, and that is, Governor Ralston will not declare for the four-power treaty which has been provocative of an alliance between Germany and Russia which not only threatens the peace of Europe, but may constitute a menace to the world.

Mr. McCORMICK. Perhaps the Senator will tell us how many of his colleagues who are candidates for reelection are prepared to urge that the United States shall subscribe to the covenant of the League of Nations and the integral enforcement of the treaty of Versailles?

Mr. KING. My colleagues upon this side of the Chamber do not have to advise me of their views as to the League of Nations, and I do not need to ask them. We have perfect freedom upon this side of the Chamber. I have no doubt those who are candidates for reelection upon the other side of the Chamber advise the Senator from Illinois and get his consent as to what to say and how to act in the coming campaign. So I do not know what the Senators on this side of the Chamber who are candidates for reelection will say or do respecting that question, but I will say to the Senator from Illinois that I know they will do this: Those who are candidates for reelection, as sensible, rational, patriotic men, will point to those questions which are the supreme issues of the hour——

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. Let me finish, and then I shall be glad to yield.

The supreme issues of the hour, or at least the paramount issues of the hour, relate to internal and domestic problems; and one of such questions, if not the principal one, is the infamous McCumber-Fordney tariff bill which is now before us——

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. One moment. Of course, I disassociate my friend from North Dakota from the evils and monstrosities of the bill.

Mr. McCORMICK. The Senator from North Dakota is a little heterodox on the League of Nations. I want to finish this debate uninterrupted by him.

Mr. KING. I should be glad to debate with both Senators, but one at a time.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator states that the really dominant issue now is the tariff bill—not the League of Nations, not what has happened in Indiana, but this particular tariff bill. We have now reached the item of citric acid——

Mr. KING. A very sour subject.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator point out what he thinks is a proper duty upon citric acid?

Mr. KING. I have already stated——

Mr. McCUMBER. That is the real dominant question now.

Mr. KING. I have already stated 5 cents a pound and have moved to amend the bill which is before us.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator tell us why he thinks the rate should be 5 cents a pound?

Mr. KING. I shall be very happy to do so; but I can not answer both Senators at once.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am asking the Senator to hold to what he considers to be the dominant issue—the pending tariff bill.

Mr. KING. I do not wonder that my good friend from North Dakota wants to lead us away from a discussion which to him and, doubtless, to the reactionaries upon the other side is not very palatable. I stated that one of the dominant issues of the hour was the tariff bill and that it and various domestic questions, in my judgment, would be regarded as the controlling and, indeed, paramount questions before the American people in the coming campaign. If I may be permitted to resume at the point I had reached when interrupted by the Senator from North Dakota, I was stating to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. McCORMICK] that my colleagues who are seeking reelection, as rational, sensible, and patriotic men——

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. Let me complete my sentence.

Mr. McCORMICK. The Senator's colleagues are thinking men, but not speaking men. There are beside him candidates for reelection. Will they join their voices to the still small voice of the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] and say that they would have the United States enter the League of Nations and enforce the treaty of Versailles? Come forward, gentlemen! Speak out, gentlemen! Are you for the League of Nations as you were before? Would you not enforce the treaty of Versailles? I do not ask the Senator from Utah. He has announced that he is going to return to the practice of law, but you who are to seek the suffrage of the people in your State next November, are you for or against the League of Nations? Would you or would you not enforce the treaty of Versailles?

Mr. KING. The Senator from Illinois, among his many other virtues, does not have the still small voice. [Laughter.] I will come back to the question which I was stating when twice interrupted by the Senator from Illinois.

I was stating that my colleagues, and they are competent to speak for themselves and will speak before the election in such a manner as may not be satisfactory to the Senator from Illinois, as rational men would address themselves to the supreme issues before the American people.

It has been said by writers who are familiar with our political contests that only one great political question is settled in any one election. I do not affirm the correctness of that position. Indeed, it will bear study and consideration. In my opinion the controlling and paramount questions that will be before the American people in the coming election will relate largely to domestic problems. There are enough of those questions to entitle the Democrats to a victory. The record of our Republican friends in dealing with domestic problems, to say nothing of foreign problems, has been so malodorous and so imperfect that undoubtedly there will be reactions against their party in other States, as there was yesterday in the great State of Indiana.

Now, Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois as an adroit, clever, and capable political leader, schooled in the politics of the State of Illinois and elsewhere, has learned, under the leadership of Theodore Roosevelt and under the leadership of reactionaries whom he is now following, all angles of the issues involved and the best methods of securing results. As an adroit political leader he knows that the American people are turning against the Republican Party upon domestic questions, and he is trying to divert their attention from the mistakes of his own party, from its palpable blunders, from its wretched administration of the affairs of the Government, and to do so seeks to project into the political arena a question which is not now the paramount or the controlling question before the American people. I congratulate him upon his skill, upon his perspicacity, but I can assure him the Democrats will not follow him as their political leader. We prefer to follow the distinguished Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and other great leaders in the Democratic Party who by their experience and devotion to Democratic principles are competent to direct the policies of the Democratic Party.

Mr. MOSES. And, Mr. President, may I add, who helped to frame the four-power pact which the Senator from Utah has just denounced?

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Illinois has just returned from a remarkable convention in Illinois in which he was the pilot. He joined forces with Thompson, of Chicago, for the first time in a long time. He wrote the platform. Did he indorse the four-power pact in that convention?

Mr. McCORMICK. The Senator from Mississippi can read the platform. It is very definite. It speaks clearly upon the foreign policy of this administration, upon the League of Nations, and the treaty of Versailles.

Mr. HARRISON. Did it say anything about the four-power pact?

Mr. McCORMICK. It did not.

Now, let me continue, if I may. The junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] has charged me with raising the issue of the League of Nations.

Mr. KING. No; I said the Senator was trying to do it.

Mr. McCORMICK. The Senator means to be exact; he always means to be just. It was the former candidate of the Democratic Party, the ex-governor of Ohio, who first proclaimed that the League of Nations was still a political issue in this country; who proposed that the Democratic National Committee should again meet to indorse the proposal that the United States enter the League of Nations. There is no one on this side of the Chamber who raised the issue. There were some of us who thought, as does the Senator from Utah, that one great question may be settled in an election, and we had hoped the question of the League of Nations had been settled. The present President of the United States, speaking for his party, has said that we would have none of the league.

The candidate of the Democracy in the last election has announced, not once but three times, that events were drawing the United States into the League of Nations; that he believed that we must subscribe to the covenant thereof; and that the Democratic National Committee should meet to proclaim that proposition. I ask the leader of the Democratic Party yonder, and the Senators who are to be candidates in the forthcoming campaign, to say "aye" or "no," whether they agree or disagree with ex-Governor Cox upon the question of the League of Nations?

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. McCORMICK. Is that an unreasonable request? Is it unreasonable to ask that some one other than the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD], secure from any division between the parties, or some one other than the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], who is voluntarily to retire from the Chamber, should answer that question?

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah pardon me? It is only imperative necessity which prompts the inquiry I am about to make.

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Committee on Patents is meeting at present for the consideration of one very important question that is pending before it. There is an impasse between two departments of the Government as to——

Mr. KING. I shall not ask for a vote while the Senator from California is absent from the Chamber.

Mr. JOHNSON. I desire to be present when the Senator from Utah speaks in reference to the duty upon citric acid.

Mr. KING. When citric acid is reached, if the Senator from California is not then present, I shall refrain from discussing that subject and take up another item in the tariff bill.

Mr. JOHNSON. I thank the Senator. I wanted the Senator from Utah to pardon me for being absent during his speech.

Mr. KING. I want the Senator to be present when I speak.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am most anxious to hear the Senator in other regards as well; and I am more sorry than I can tell that I shall miss his rejoinder to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. McCORMICK]; but it is an important matter on which the Committee on Patents are engaged.

Mr. KING. I know the importance of the work which is pending before that committee, and I hope the committee will report a bill that will not permit patentees, when they obtain a monopoly from the Government, to hide their patents and deny their benefits to the people.

Mr. JOHNSON. We are wrestling in the committee with the subject.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, after getting through with Indiana for a moment, and the ex-Governor of Nevada, I come back to my distinguished friend, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. McCORMICK]. However, there is one remark I want to make before proceeding to answer him, and that is that one thing the election in Indiana did was to take "New" out of "Newberry." It accomplished that result. The Newberry question was an issue in that campaign and will be an issue in other States in the coming election. In making that observation, let it be understood that I am speaking with due courtesy of the able junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. NEWBERRY] and without any desire whatever to offend him or to impugn his motives or his character——

Mr. ODDIE rose.

Mr. KING. Let me complete the sentence—but the American people believe that the expenditure of more than $200,000 in the last senatorial primary campaign in the State of Michigan was not consistent with American traditions or consonant with fair and honest elections. They feel that there was nothing that could warrant such a stupendous expenditure.

They believe that in the expenditure of such an enormous fund there must have been, directly or indirectly, corruption somewhere, somehow, and they will visit their displeasure upon the party which indorsed that expenditure, as the Republican Party indorsed it in their vote seating the junior Senator from Michigan, and as they indorsed it in adopting the amendment which was offered by the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] to the resolution seating him.

I now yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. ODDIE. I should like to ask the Senator from Utah if he does not believe that Henry Ford is anxious that the discussion on the Newberry matter shall continue, for the reason that it sells thousands of automobiles for him?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I am not interested in what some persons irreverently call "Tin Lizzies," as the Senator from Nevada evidently is. I am not selling Henry Ford's cars. I am not in the confidence of Henry Ford, as evidently the Senator from Nevada is. The Senator from Nevada seems to think that this discussion—and he is to blame for it—will aid Henry Ford in selling cars; the Senator being responsible for the discussion, and it being of benefit to Mr. Ford, it is clear that the Senator from Nevada is the agent of Henry Ford, and is aiding him in the sale of his products.

Mr. President, I want to be frank with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. McCORMICK]. He has asked me—he did so several days ago, and repeated the question to-day—what my views are upon the League of Nations. It is wholly immaterial what my views on that subject are.

I am not of enough importance in the Democratic Party or elsewhere that my views would be controlling, but I frankly say to the Senator from Illinois, speaking for myself and myself alone, that, sooner or later, the United States of America, with proud and triumphant step, and with a desire to serve this Nation and the world, will enter a league of nations, an association of the nations of the world. This it will do—as a progressive, Christian nation—in order that the peace and prosperity of all peoples may be secured. Humanity is marching toward the goal of international amity; peace on earth, good will toward all men, world fellowship—world association—these are not baseless dreams or mere phantasms. The unity of the race and a common civilization are objectives toward which the moral and spiritual leaders of the world will direct humanity's faltering steps. It may be an ideal, but it is one that will never perish; it will persist until it conquers; thus the ideal will culminate in the attainable and in the attained.

The Senator from Illinois stated that the President of the United States, Mr. Harding, had repeatedly declared against the League of Nations. I hope I correctly state what the Senator said. I do not know whether the President of the United States has said that or not.

Mr. McCORMICK. The Senator will recall the address delivered in this Chamber by the President.

Mr. KING. I remember the cryptic utterances of the President of the United States; I remember that he said repeatedly before and during the campaign, in substance, that he was for an association of nations. I know that in the Senate of the United States Warren G. Harding, when a Senator, voted for the League of Nations with reservations, the chief of which related to article 10 of the league. I am advised, may I say in passing, that the members of the league place the same interpretation upon that article as was given it by Senator Wolcott, of Delaware, and by a number of distinguished Senators upon this side of the Chamber, as well as by able lawyers of the United States when the treaty was before the Senate, namely, that it imposed no legal or moral obligation upon members of the league to go to the aid of any member nation when its territorial integrity or its political independence was attacked, but that each nation was to determine for itself what its attitude should be in the light of the then existent circumstances.

Mr. McCORMICK rose.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator desire to interrupt me?

Mr. McCORMICK. I was going to say that the President voted for the league with reservations, and doubtless with qualms as well.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I am not in the confidence of President Harding. If the Senator says he has "qualms," doubtless he speaks with authority. I do not know, however, what he means by "qualms"—whether he is speaking of the President's mental and intellectual organism and faculties or his physical attributes, his physical qualms. The Senator may be a pathologist; he may be able to distinguish between intellectual qualms and physical qualms. I congratulate the Senator upon his knowledge of pathology and therapeutics, as well as his psychological attainments.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, may I call the attention of the Senator to a strange recurrence?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. McCORMICK. I note that whenever the question of the League of Nations is discussed nearly all of the Senators on the other side of the Chamber from north of the Mason and Dixon's line who are candidates for reelection leave the Chamber.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator may take what comfort he pleases from the alleged absence of candidates for reelection upon this side of the Chamber. I repeat that, after reading the speeches of President Harding—his preelection speeches, and the speeches which he has made since—no man can say that President Harding is against a world association of nations.

I say to the Senator from Illinois, while the association or League of Nations may not be, and probably will not be, the great question in the coming election it is a live question in the United States; it is a question that will not down; that can not be buried by the sophistry of the Republicans, by their cunning, by their subtlety. It will be here to-day and to-morrow and next year and in the coming years, until, in God's own providence, there will be international fellowship, brought about and effectuated through a world organization and a world association of nations. I am for the League of Nations with proper reservations——

Mr. McCORMICK. Oh!

Mr. KING. Oh. I voted for the League of Nations with reservations, and I voted for it without reservations; and I say now, Mr. President, that the economic collapse of the world, which reacts to the disadvantage of the United States, is attributable largely to the folly of Republican Senators in not ratifying the Versailles treaty, which would have permitted this Nation, entering the league, there to sit down at the world's council, indeed heading that council and wearing the crown of moral, of political, and material primacy.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, does not the Senator think that if we sat down at the table at Genoa our waistcoat might——

Mr. KING. There would have been no Genoa conference if the United States had gone into the League of Nations.

Mr. McCORMICK. It might not have been necessary. Our pockets might have been frisked before any such conference was held.

Mr. KING. They have been frisked now. Under your policy you have frisked from us since the Republicans have come into power billions of dollars in the depreciation of the value of American products. You have cut off our trade with other nations; you have laid your deadly hands upon other nations and contributed to their demoralization and to their economic ruin, as you have contributed to the economic ruin of the American people. The Republican Party, Mr. President, has been weighed in the balance with respect to its foreign policies, as it is being weighed in the balance now with respect to domestic policies, and it has been found wanting.

Mr. President, I return to the point that I was discussing when the able Senator from Nevada [Mr. ODDIE] challenged my attention to the delightful results of the election in Indiana day before yesterday. That election is a sore spot for you Republicans, and it will be much sorer to-morrow and the following day. You have your ears to the ground to-day listening—listening to portentous sounds. Your heads were high day before yesterday. You were to have a vindication in the returns in Indiana. Your heads to-day are bowed, your hearts are sore, your cheeks are blanched, and you are waiting now with trepidation and fear for the ides of November. God help you! You need it.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, where are those Democratic Senators who were for our subscribing to the League of Nations?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I have said to the Senator once, and I say again, that Democratic Senators do not have to consult with me as Republican Senators who are candidates for reelection have to consult with the Senator from Illinois, who is the purseholder and the money gatherer, and who will control the elections through the instrumentality of the campaign funds in the various States—I say that with all due respect, of course—legitimate campaign funds.

Mr. McCORMICK. I think the Senator does not mean that.

Mr. KING. Yes; I do, in a sense. Let me explain.

Mr. McCORMICK. Oh, I think not.

Mr. KING. The Senator is chairman of the Republican senatorial campaign committee.

Mr. McCORMICK. He is. The Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], who is absent from this debate, is chairman of the Democratic senatorial campaign committee.

Mr. KING. And the Senator from Montana undoubtedly will attempt to collect some money from Democrats to use in the campaign, in a legitimate way, as I expect my distinguished friend from Illinois will do; but the Senator from Illinois knows that one of his duties—and I am not complaining, it is a laudable, it is a proper duty—is to try to obtain needed and proper campaign funds for legitimate use in States where Republican candidates are seeking reelection.

Mr. McCORMICK. The Senator, if I remember his remark, suggested that I would seek to control the course of candidates through the instrumentality of that fund.

Mr. KING. Oh, no.

Mr. McCORMICK. If the Senator said that, I am sure he will want to withdraw the remark.

Mr. KING. The record will show what I said. I did not mean to say that. If my remarks bear that construction, I apologize to my friend, because I would not do him an injustice. What I intended to say, and what I say now, is this:

The Senator from Illinois, because of his ability—and I say that not in flattery, but sincerely—because of his long political experience, because of his knowledge of political affairs in the United States, because of his association with Mr. Roosevelt and the Progressive Party, as well as his association with the reactionary Republican Party, knows political conditions in the United States, and he has been selected because of his superior knowledge as the chairman of the Republican senatorial campaign committee, and as political leader it is his duty to gather such campaign contributions as he can in an honorable way, as I know he will, and that he will expend the funds so collected in the various States where there are candidates for reelection. I have no doubt that the Republican candidates who are candidates for reelection are consulting the Senator now, as they will continue to consult him in the future.

I return to the reading of the interesting editorial, Mr. President, from the Journal of Commerce, of New York:

> In the House form of the pending tariff bill the duty on glue and gelatin was fixed at 20 per cent ad valorem and 1½ cents per pound, while manufactures of glue and gelatin were 25 per cent.
> The Senate bill varies the rate from 20 per cent and 7 cents to 20 per cent and 15 cents, while in certain cases the ad valorem rate is as high as 25 per cent.
> As to this, careful inquiry shows that these packing-house commodities are simply by-products. They have no "cost of production" as such, but any duty is a clear gift to the makers by enabling them to raise their prices to correspond. Under the old tariff rates our total product of glue, which was $13,733,000 in 1914, rose to $32,132,000 in 1919, while our exports advanced from $259,000 to $2,405,000 in 1920. Imports meanwhile were only $590,000 in 1920. There is no danger whatever of foreign competition, the quantity brought from abroad being, as just shown, negligible. The Senate bill is an absolutely unwarranted advance in the rate.

Mr. President, the Senate bill with respect to these items—and the same is true as to carbide, dyes, and hundreds of others, as will be shown before we get through—is written in the interest of trusts and combinations, which already have raised the price levels until they bear oppressively upon the consuming public. A gratuity, a gift, is bestowed upon the packers and other interests that directly or indirectly control the glue industry of the United States, according to this Republican newspaper.

Aside from raw material the cost of gelatin is said to be determined by the cost of coal, sulphuric acid, muriatic acid, and peroxide of hydrogen, all of which are cheaper here than in Europe. The Payne tariff permitted domestic producers, it is estimated, to add $3,800,000 to their prices—

And the American people had to pay for it—while the present tariff may allow $6,400,000 under the House bill and greater amounts under the varying rates of the Senate draft. Here is a handsome, if surreptitious, gift to producers under the guise of protection based on difference in cost of various grades of the article.

There are many Republican newspapers, as well as many Republicans, in the United States who are voicing their opposition to this bill, pointing to its inequitable features and to the evils which will follow the adoption of these schedules.

I promised the Senator from California not to discuss the item of citric acid until his return to the Chamber; accordingly I shall refer to a subject which is pertinent to the question before us.

It has been repeatedly stated that the high rates of duty provided for the various commodities in Schedule 1 of this bill were necessary to protect the manufacturers of chemicals produced in this country, and the inference was that we had no chemical industry until the war, and that as a new industry it must have what it demands. I believe that some persons listening to the statements of Republicans and to some Republican newspapers would reach the conclusion that the chemical industry was the child or the product of the war; that we had no chemical production in the United States, either direct chemical production or chemical productions of an allied nature or character, prior to 1914.

The fact is, Mr. President, that on the 31st day of June, 1914, we had invested directly and indirectly in chemical production $2,017,000,000 plus, and that the products for that year of chemical industry covered by Schedule 1 of the bill aggregated more than $3,000,000,000; in other words, that the output exceeded the capital in the ratio of 3 to 2. And yet we are appealed to to support this bill because we must have a chemical industry in the United States, and without these prohibitive rates it is impossible. Many of our chemical industries, as a matter of fact, have been in existence for many years.

Some instructive tables and valuable information are found in a publication of the Department of Commerce in 1919 called "Miscellaneous Series, No. 82." It is there shown that the chemicals which we would denominate chemicals per se, measured by that standard—which are found in this bill—if they were put into juxtaposition with the products of the chemical industry, it would appear that they represent less than 2½ per cent of the total value of the commodities provided for in Schedule 1 of this bill.

Mr. President, this pamphlet which I just referred to, on page 8, has the following:

This publication presents statistics for 5,500 natural and manufactured articles imported into the United States during the fiscal year 1913–14.

Substantially all of those 5,500 articles are embraced within Schedule 1, though most of them are under what are called "basket clauses."

The principal classes of materials considered in this publication are:

Abrasive materials, asbestos, baking powder, blacking, bronze powders, candles, chalk, chemicals (including acids), clays, coal-tar products (except dyes), drugs, dyeing materials, explosives, fertilizers, gelatin and glue, greases and tallows, gums and resins, inks and ink powders, medicinal preparations, oil cake; oils, animal; oils, mineral; oils, vegetable; oils, essential; petrolatum, pigments, paints, perfumes, cosmetics, and toilet preparations, salt, soaps, sulphur, tanning materials, turpentine and rosin, varnishes and waxes.

Some of the articles are found in the next schedule. They are not all included in this schedule.

I wish there were more Senators here to understand the significance of this statement that of the 5,500 products listed in this publication, only 2,500 were imported in amounts exceeding $100 in value, totaling approximately $268,000,000. The remaining 4,000 products were imported in amounts less than $100, totaling in the aggregate $61,000.

What does that mean, Mr. President? It means that for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914—that is, before the war, when Germany was reputed to be the dominant and controlling factor in the chemical world—she shipped to the United States but a fraction of the $268,000,000 of all these 5,000 items which are found in this schedule. On the following page of this report it is shown that our exports for the same period covered by this schedule amounted to $265,019,258; so that from all the world, Germany giving but a portion of them, we imported but $267,000,000 plus, and exported $265,000,000 plus, and produced more than $3,000,000,000 of chemical products.

Turning to page 11, we find here the classification of all of the items within the chemical schedule which were imported into the United States for the fiscal year 1913–14, keeping in mind, now, that that was before the war, when Germany was alleged to be supreme. We imported only $2,000,000 plus of acids, $28,000,000 plus of chemicals, $8,000,000 of coal-tar products, except dyes, and, according to the figures of the Norton census, given us also by the Department of Commerce, as I carry them in my head, that amounted to approximately $10,000,000. They are not in this book.

Drugs, flowers, leaves, nuts, and herbs, $7,000,000 plus.

Dyeing and tanning material, $2,000,000 plus.

Extracts for dyeing and tanning, except coal-tar dyes, $2,000,000 plus.

Fertilizers, $28,038,000. I shall show later on that those came from Chile, or most of them.

Gums (including india rubber, crude, valued at $71,219,051), $88,903,829.

Medicinal preparations, dutiable (including menthol, valued at $424,917, imported from British India), $1,289,608.

Oils, animal, $1,000,000 plus.

Oils, vegetable (expressed), $43,000,000 plus.

Oils, essential (distilled), $3,000,000 plus.

Paints, pigments, artists' colors, and varnishes, $2,000,000.

Perfumes, cosmetics, and toilet preparations, $2,000,000.

Sodium nitrate, $7,951,455.

Mr. President, all of these imports—$197,343,535—consisted of crude materials; that is to say, they came into the United States not in the finished and consumable-by-the-public form, and became the basis of American industry, so that the larger part of our imports under this schedule, while Germany was supposed to dominate the chemical world, consisted of crudes, which were used by manufacturing plants, by industries in the United States, thus giving an impetus to our industrial development and employment to thousands, if not tens of thousands, of American workingmen.

Yet our Republican friends, in their midsummer madness—because it will be midsummer before this bill passes—are determined to strike at the very foundations of our industrial prosperity and development. They would cut off the importation of crudes and all finished products. They would in their devotion to trusts and special interests prevent the exportation of American products, and while striking at friendly nations they would at the same time strike at their own country and injure the American consumers. This they would do in order to give a monopoly to the Carbide Trust, the National Chemical Co., the du Pont Co., and other great trusts and combinations, whose names will be mentioned before we conclude the discussion upon this bill. We propose to let the people of the country know, so far as we have the power to do so, that this schedule is drawn for the trusts, in the interest of the trusts, and that the result will be, when this bill becomes a law, the exploitation of the American people.

Only $43,674,163 of manufactured chemical products—that is, products which I have called chemicals per se and are comprised in the figures shown on page 12 of this report (Miscellaneous Series No. 82)—were imported into the United States at the time when Germany was supposed to be supreme and the United States was, according to our Republican friends, supposed to have no chemical industry.

Mr. President, if Germany in 1913–14, with her tremendous wealth, with her technical skill, with her claimed world supremacy in chemical matters, could not send to the United States any greater value of chemicals than that which the records show, how, I ask, can Germany, prostrate, now compete with American industry, which has access to the inexhaustible resources of this great Nation?

I stated the other day that Germany had lost most of her coal, iron, and potash. Germany is now compelled to go into the markets of the world and buy copper and other raw materials in order to make any showing as a manufacturing nation. We have the raw materials to make the products; and still our Republican friends say we must keep out any competition, as Germany and the European nations are about to destroy American industries.

I turn again to this same Miscellaneous Series No. 82 and find the list of the imports of chemicals for the year 1913–14, where each item was valued at less than $100. The names appear, totaling, as I recall, 4,500. One would suppose that many of these items would be placed upon the free list in this bill, because the value of the imports when Germany and the nations of Europe constituted strong industrial nations and were producing chemically and in an industrial way were so inconsequential.

The number so placed in the free list, if my computation was correct, is only 14. Fourteen out of 4,500 items the importation of which was less than $100 have been placed by our Republican friends upon the free list.

But assume, Mr. President, that there are some items in the schedule which ought to be protected which come within the category of infant industries. Why the necessity of penalizing the American people on thousands of items where there is no necessity and where the American production not only is adequate for the domestic consumption but produces an excess and must find markets abroad?

Mr. President, there are hundreds—indeed, thousands—of items in the bill as to which the imports have been and are less than 1 per cent of the domestic production. There are hundreds and hundreds of items as to which there is no importation at all, and yet our Republican friends have been so friendly with the trusts, so considerate of the chemical combines and interests in the United States, that they have placed duties upon those very items, thus enabling the domestic producers to extort such prices from the American consumers as their greed and avarice may dictate.

Protection has been defended upon the ground that an infant industry needed aid, and that imports of like products produced by the domestic industry would enter into such sharp competition as to destroy the American producer. How can these high rates be defended when there is no competition? Is 1 per cent competition? When there are no imports can it be said that there is competition? Of course, that is absurd. It is an abuse of the taxing power of the Government to lay duties upon foreign commodities when there is no importation, or where the importation of such commodities is less than 1 per cent of the domestic product.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask the Senator from Utah to yield to me for a few moments.

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I wish to detain the Senate just a moment. A day or two ago I made some general observations with reference to the War Finance Corporation and certain bills which have been introduced in the Senate, one by myself, providing for larger banking facilities for agriculturists and live-stock raisers in the country than are afforded through the War Finance Corporation.

In the course of my remarks I caused to be read from the desk an interview with Mr. Harvie Jordan, which appeared in the Raleigh News and Observer. In the interview Mr. Jordan stated that the governor of the Federal Reserve Board, Mr. Harding, had made a further ruling against loans to enable farmers and stock raisers to hold their products off the market for the purpose of a more orderly marketing of such products.

I am now in receipt of a letter from Governor Harding, dated May 2, which really was called to my attention only this afternoon, in which he refers to the interview of Mr. Jordan and states that he was incorrectly quoted, that he had made no such ruling, that the board of which he is the head had made no such ruling, and that the board did not hold the opinion with respect to the matter stated in the interview with Mr. Jordan, and requesting that some publicity be given to the denial.

He also discusses in the letter to some extent the question of agricultural credits and clearly indicates that both he himself and the Federal Reserve Board are in favor of some system which will adequately provide credits and banking facilities to farmers and to stock raisers. He also makes it clear that he does not think it would be advisable to attempt to accomplish this through amendments to the Federal reserve act.

The letter, I think, is valuable in itself, and Governor Harding is entitled to have it made public. I shall ask the Secretary to read all of the letter except one paragraph, which the governor makes confidential. I would like very much to have that paragraph read, but by reason of his desire that it shall be treated in confidence I ask that the Secretary eliminate it. I desire to have the letter read, because I think Governor Harding is entitled to have it read and I think the Senate is entitled to know what he says upon this very interesting and very important subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ODDIE in the chair). Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The reading clerk read as follows:

FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD,
Washington, May 2, 1922.

Hon. F. M. SIMMONS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In the course of your remarks which are published on pages 6131 to 6133 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 1, 1922, you referred to and caused to be inserted in the RECORD a statement taken from the Raleigh (N. C.) News and Observer of April 27, 1922, by Mr. Harvie Jordan, national secretary of the American Cotton Association. As this statement is untrue in so far as it refers to me, I am taking the liberty of addressing this letter to you.

I have reference to the particular part of the statement which reads as follows:

"* * * Gov. W. P. G. Harding, of the Federal Reserve Board, recently interpreted the law of the Federal reserve banking system to the effect that agricultural loans based on farm products as collateral can not be rediscounted for the purpose of holding such products off the market, the inference being that for farmers to borrow money for the purpose of holding cotton or other staple products off the market is speculation.

"This interpretation of the Federal reserve law means that when staple farm products are ready for market they must be promptly sold, whether markets are stagnant or not. It means an encouragement or enforcement of the dumping method of marketing, which has always carried the penalty of low prices to the growers. The policy now being generally adopted by farmers to market their products slowly and in an orderly manner to regulate supplies to meet the needs only of legitimate consumption will meet a deathblow if the law as interpreted by Governor Harding is enforced."

I desire to say in the first place that I have never attempted to interpret the law or make rulings for the Federal Reserve Board. Every interpretation or ruling is made and adopted by the board as a whole.

In the second place, I wish to point out that the Federal Reserve Board has never interpreted the Federal reserve act in the manner suggested in the statement in question. On the contrary, the Federal Reserve Board in its rulings, and on every appropriate occasion, has taken the position that such holding of agricultural products as is incident to orderly marketing is a legitimate and necessary part of the business of agriculture, and that a loan made to a producer or farmer for the purpose of financing such holding is clearly an agricultural loan which is eligible for rediscount by Federal reserve banks within six months of maturity. Furthermore, the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal reserve banks have recognized that in determining to what extent the holding of agricultural products is incident to orderly marketing the condition of the market for such products, or the market demand, must be taken into consideration, and that renewal loans made necessary by reason of inability to dispose of products at a reasonable figure and in an orderly manner during the period of the original loan may also be eligible. In other words, in direct contradiction of the published statement of Mr. Jordan, the Federal reserve act has been interpreted by the board so as to permit the gradual and orderly marketing of agricultural products as and when there is a demand for them, instead of requiring the farmers to market their products by the so-called "dumping method."

I have read your remarks as published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD with much interest and I agree entirely with you, as I am sure the other members of the Federal Reserve Board would also, that there is grave need for additional credit facilities available to agriculture, and that it would be inadvisable to attempt to provide such facilities through amendments to the Federal reserve act. Senator HEFLIN, who addressed the Senate after the conclusion of your remarks, inferred that the Federal Reserve Board "will fight" any legislation intended to provide such additional credit facilities. I desire to assure you that such is not the case. You are no doubt familiar with Senate bill 3051, which was recommended by the Joint Commission of Agricultural Inquiry as a means of affording additional credit facilities for agricultural purposes through the enlargement of the powers of the Federal land banks. The chairman of the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency referred this bill to the Federal Reserve Board, and in a letter dated January 26, 1922, the board expressed its approval of the bill in the following terms:

"While the proposed bill deals mainly with the Federal farm-loan system, the administration of which does not, of course, come within the jurisdiction of the Federal Reserve Board, the board is glad of the opportunity to say that the bill has its cordial approval and support. The board believes the bill to be sound and constructive legislation that is well designed to afford much needed relief to agricultural and live-stock interests by adding to their available credit facilities, which at the present time are not adequate for their requirements."

For your information a copy of that letter is inclosed herewith.

The Federal Reserve Board has not had occasion to consider the bill introduced by you, S. 3390, and I am not familiar with its detailed provisions. * * *

In order to correct the erroneous impression that Mr. Jordan's published statement would create, I request you to give the same publicity to this letter that you have given to the article containing that statement.

Yours very truly,

W. P. G. HARDING, Governor.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I have also received from Governor Harding, attached to the letter which has just been read, a letter written by him, dated January 26, 1922, and addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, the Hon. GEORGE B. MCLEAN. I think probably it was sent to me with the expectation that it would be presented in connection with the letter which has just been read. For that reason I ask that, without reading, it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD,
Washington, January 26, 1922.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Receipt is acknowledged of your letter of January 23, 1922, inclosing a copy of Senate bill 3051 and requesting the views of the Federal Reserve Board with regard to it. This is the bill the enactment of which is recommended in the recently published report of the Joint Commission of Agricultural Inquiry. The same bill has also been introduced in the House of Representatives as H. R. 10058.

While the proposed bill deals mainly with the Federal farm loan system, the administration of which does not, of course, come within the jurisdiction of the Federal Reserve Board, the board is glad of the opportunity to say that the bill has its cordial approval and support. The board believes the bill to be sound and constructive legislation; that is well designed to afford much needed relief to agricultural and live-stock interests by adding to their available credit facilities, which at the present time are not adequate for their requirements.

The bill proposes to add to the Federal farm loan act a new title, title 11, consisting of sections 201 to 209. Subdivision (a) of section 201 provides that each Federal land bank, subject to regulation by the Federal Farm Loan Board, may discount for any bank or live-stock loan company, with the indorsement of such bank or company, any note or other such obligation the proceeds of which have been used for an agricultural purpose or for the raising, breeding, fattening, or marketing of live stock, and may make loans to any cooperative association of producers of staple agricultural products upon the security of warehouse receipts covering such products. Subdivision (b) of section 201 provides for the issuance by Federal land banks of debentures or other such obligations with maturities not in excess of three years secured by discounts or loans made under subdivision (a). Section 204 provides that any Federal reserve bank may discount for a Federal land bank, upon the latter's indorsement, discounts or loans made under section 201 which have a maturity at the time of discount by the Federal reserve bank and in excess of six months, and section 206 provides that any Federal reserve bank may buy and sell the debentures and other obligations of a Federal land bank issued under section 201 to the same extent and subject to the same limitations as those upon which they may buy and sell Federal farm loan bonds. The other sections of the new title provide for the creation of a "farm credits department" in each Federal land bank for the purpose of exercising the powers conferred by the title, and provide that the capital of each such department shall be $1,000,000, to be subscribed by the United States, and contain certain other necessary administrative provisions which are not important for the purposes of this general discussion.

At the present time the Federal farm loan act provides the means for supplying the farmers long-time credits upon the security of first mortgages upon agricultural lands; and under the terms of the Federal reserve act agricultural paper with a maturity not in excess of six months is eligible for rediscount by Federal reserve banks after it has been discounted and indorsed by a member bank of the Federal reserve system. As pointed out, however, in the report of the Joint Commission of Agricultural Inquiry, there is need for agricultural credits of an intermediate type, running from six months to three years, for production and marketing purposes. The farmers' turnover in the production of crops, including the planting, harvesting, and gradual marketing through orderly processes designed to avoid flooding the market at any one time, normally requires approximately 12 months; and in the live-stock industry the turnover may require as long as three years. Consequently, in order to make it possible for the farmer and live-stock man to liquidate, out of the ultimate proceeds of his agricultural transactions, his indebtedness incurred for production and marketing purposes, it is necessary that such indebtedness be permitted to run for periods ranging from six months to three years, depending upon the particular commodities being produced and marketed.

Loans with such maturities can not be granted in sufficient amounts to meet the needs of agriculture by ordinary banking institutions the liabilities of which are for the most part payable on demand, unless the banks can rely on being able to rediscount the loans in emergencies. The main purpose of the bill under consideration, as the Federal Reserve Board understands it, is to provide proper and adequate facilities for such rediscounts.

Bills have been introduced in Congress within the past year proposing to amend the Federal reserve act so as to make eligible for discount by Federal reserve banks agricultural paper with maturities up to 12 months, instead of 6 months, as the law now provides. The board has expressed its disapproval of these and similar bills, because the enactment of any such bill would materially lessen both the liquidity of the paper held by the Federal reserve banks and the elasticity of the Federal reserve note currency, which is based upon and secured by the paper so held. The bill recommended by the Joint Commission of Agricultural Inquiry avoids this danger, and at the same time offers far more adequate relief to the agricultural interests of the country than could be obtained through the enactment of such an amendment to the Federal reserve act.

The Federal Reserve Board has carefully examined the bill introduced in the Senate at S. 3051, and in the House of Representatives as H. R. 10058, and approves not only the purpose and substance of the bill but also the form and language that have been adopted in drafting it. The board is of the opinion that the bill is admirably designed to accomplish the purposes which its framers have in mind, and that its various provisions are so coordinated as to provide the most efficient machinery for the performance of the new functions of the Federal land banks without in any way interfering with their present activities.

Very truly yours,

W. P. G. HARDING, Governor.

Hon. GEORGE P. MCLEAN,
Chairman Committee on Banking and Currency,
United States Senate.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I did not hear all of the letter read. A part of it seemed to undertake to make the impression that the governor of the Federal Reserve Board, W. P. G. Harding, desired to aid the farmer and enable him to hold his products for profitable prices.

If that is true; if that is the impression sought to be made, the record of the Federal Reserve Board contradicts the professions which are contained in the letter just read. In 1920 the farmers of the South and West were denied money with which to carry on their business in a profitable manner; the merchants of the South and West, and the bankers of the South and West, were denied money necessary at the crop-moving time to aid the farmers of those sections in obtaining a fair and reasonable price for their products.

I said the other day, and I repeat now, that I do not intend that any statement which may come from the governor of the Federal Reserve Board that is contrary to the facts shall go into the RECORD unchallenged. If I caught the statement correctly, the governor of the Federal Reserve Board believes in permitting farmers to hold their produce until they can obtain a profitable price. Then, I repeat, his record is to the contrary. His conduct speaks louder than any expressions which he may use in writing to this body.

There are not thousands but millions of farmers who have been literally robbed of all they possess because they were denied the money and credit necessary to carry on their business as they were entitled to carry it on.

I said on day before yesterday, Mr. President, that the Federal Reserve Board permitted a progressive interest rate to be applied only to the agricultural sections. I want to add that when authority to invoke that progressive rate was granted it was obtained to some extent under false pretenses. Senators were told and Members of the House of Representatives were told that it was sought for the purpose of preventing big cities from getting more than their share of the money supply; that it was done to prevent speculation on exchanges; that it was done to prevent wild and reckless speculation in the big cities. Of course, those who came from the farming sections of the country thought that that would be a good idea—and it would have been—but when the Federal Reserve Board got the authority, how did they use it? They applied it only to the farming section.

Mr. President, the record bears me out in the statement that the Federal Reserve Board invoked the power in the district served by the Atlanta bank. That is right down in the heart of the cotton-growing region. They invoked it in the district served by the Dallas, Tex., bank, that bank being in the greatest cotton-producing State in the Union. They invoked it at St. Louis and at Kansas City, in the great farming districts served by those two banks. They did not invoke it in Wall Street; and there is where the great bulk of the speculation is carried on.

I repeat that Governor Harding, of the Federal Reserve Board, himself told the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] that it was done for the purpose of keeping the big speculative centers from getting money and to provide money in abundance to the farming sections of the country. I do not intend that the Federal Reserve Board shall now come in and seek a whitewash at the end of a miserable record while in their wake lie the wreck and ruin of thousands and millions of American people.

Again, I charge that the Federal Reserve Board head has been the enemy of every movement to aid the farmer. Section 2 of the joint resolution reviving the War Finance Corporation provided that the Federal Reserve Board should use its influence in having money loaned to farmers at the lowest rate of interest in keeping with sound banking. Could anyone object to a proposition of that sort? We were not asking that any wildcat business be permitted but to let the farmers have money at the lowest rate of interest in keeping with sound banking; but the Federal Reserve Board used its "fine Italian hand" to defeat that legislation in the House. Congress revived the War Finance Corporation, but when the joint resolution came out of the House of Representatives section 2 had been stricken from the measure, so that Congress did not even request the Federal Reserve Board to permit money to be loaned to farmers in distress at the lowest rate of interest in keeping with sound banking.

Mr. President, do we all not know that if the Federal Reserve Board had been in favor of section 2 it would have remained in the joint resolution? Certainly it would; but it was stricken out.

The governor of the Federal Reserve Board appeared before the Committee on Agriculture at a joint session. I then was a member of the Agricultural Committee on the part of the other House. He opposed the revival of the War Finance Corporation. We did revive it and it has done good, but he did all he could to keep it from being revived. Did that look like he was a friend to the farmer?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HEFLIN. I am very glad to yield to my friend from Georgia.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I remind the Senator from Alabama that the governor of the Federal Reserve Bank of Atlanta, Ga., told the Senator and myself out in the reception room of the Senate the other day that he had $100,000,000 of idle gold in his bank in that city. I asked him why he did not put it to work. He said it was because nobody wanted to borrow money. I should be glad if the Senator from Alabama would enlarge upon that subject in the course of his remarks.

Mr. HEFLIN. I will remind my friend from Georgia that I touched upon that subject briefly on day before yesterday. I remember the conversation to which the Senator from Georgia has referred. I remarked then that within a radius of 30 miles of Atlanta there were people in distress who wanted money and who would be glad to get it; and that there were not only people there but there were people in my State and in the other Southern States who would be glad to borrow that money. Can it be that the Federal Reserve Board's deflation policy has hurt and seriously injured so many people that they live in dread and fear of this Federal Reserve Board?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes; I am glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. From all parts of the State of Georgia I have received letters almost every day asking if the Government will not provide some method by which they can borrow money to carry on their business?

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, that is in keeping with the information I have. People are writing me that they can not get money to carry on their business. This year there are farmers in the South and in the West who can not get money to make a crop. Their business is dying upon their hands. Now, I want to know why it is that, although the Federal reserve banks have the money, they say they can not lend it.

Does not that prove what I have charged here for months, that while they were taking this blood money in they were forcing the farmers to dispose of their crops upon the market at destructive prices in order to make them liquidate? Of course it proves that.

Where did the Federal reserve banks get this money. I have said they were compelling the farmers to pay their loans; that the word had gone down the line to call upon them to settle up, and the officers of the Federal Reserve Board denied it; but now they come out and say, "We have more money than we know what to do with." Yet here in the United States, the greatest Government in all the world, with the greatest gold supply of any country upon the earth, with more gold than we know what to do with, there are sixty-odd millions of our people in distress.

Senators, it is a sad picture to look upon. What are we going to do? Who, like Aaron of old, will stretch forth the healing rod to give the land deliverance? I rejoice that the day is not far distant when the head of this board shall pass from the position which he holds and has used to the detriment and injury of millions of American people. His term expires in August.

Mr. President, there has never been a greater crime committed against the public, in my judgment, than that of deflation in 1920. Abraham Lincoln spoke the living truth when he said:

> If you force people to pay with a deflated dollar a debt incurred under an inflated dollar, you are guilty of a crime.

I have heretofore given an illustration of the result of the deflation policy, but I want to repeat it here this afternoon. A farmer in my State who made 10 bales of cotton contracted an indebtedness on it to the extent of $2,000. That 10 bales of cotton would have paid the debt at the time it was incurred, but the price of cotton was beaten down until when the dollar had been deflated the 10 bales paid only $500 of the debt, leaving three-fourths of it still due. At that rate it would take the farmer four years under deflation to make cotton enough to pay a debt incurred under inflation in one year. That is the sort of work that has been done. I am endeavoring to show just what sort of ruin was wrought under that policy. Why did they apply the progressive interest rates to the bank of Atlanta and not apply it to the bank of New York? Why did they apply it to the bank of Dallas and the bank of Atlanta, which serve the great cotton belt of the United States, when they kept their hands off of the bank in New York, in the heart of the gambling district? Let them answer that question.

Mr. President, I have charged here repeatedly, and I charge again, that there was a conspiracy to rob the cotton producers of the United States of the crop of 1920, and they were robbed of it. Here was the farmer coming into the market place in 1920 with a crop of cotton which cost him more than any crop he had ever produced, and here were the gamblers of Wall Street seeking to beat down the price.

The farmer, as he had done in 1918 and 1919, went to the members of the Federal reserve banking system and said, "I want money to hold my cotton back until I can get the cost of production, plus a profit. I got money for this purpose in 1918 and in 1919; I must have it now." But the appeal fell on deaf ears.

The Federal Reserve Board had decreed that the cotton crop of 1920 should be denied the currency and credits necessary to compel a fair price. The Federal reserve banks, under orders from the board, said "no," and they shut the door in the face of the farmer. Then what happened? Cotton went down and down. The farmer came back and said, "We can not sell at this figure; if we do we are ruined; we must have money." He went again to the Federal reserve banks, but under orders from the board the banks said, "If you get it, you will have to pay 15 per cent, or 25 per cent, or 35 per cent," and even 87½ per cent, which was the rate charged in the case of a little bank in my State. What was that doing? That was making it impossible for the farmer to get any money, and when they made it impossible for the farmer to get any money, what happened to him? He stood empty-handed and helpless in the market place, and the gamblers fleeced him and took his crop from him.

Why did they apply the progressive interest rate to the Atlanta, Dallas, St. Louis, and Kansas City Federal Reserve Banks, serving the great agricultural districts, and fail to apply it to Boston, Cleveland, Philadelphia, and New York, and the other four regional banks? Why did they not apply it to the speculating section of New England, one of the great cotton-spinning sections of the country? The spinner could sell all the cotton he wanted on the bear side to beat down the price; he could get all the money he wanted to carry on his speculative transactions; but the farmer of the South could not get it to fight that gambler. They applied the progressive rate to him. They ran it up to 7 per cent first, and he said: "Well, I must have some money." They said: "Do you want to pay 15, 25, 35, 40 per cent?" The farmer, merchant, and banker in the agricultural sections had his business practically destroyed.

There is nothing too strong to say about that criminal conduct. The whole policy grew out of the resolution introduced into this Chamber and passed at the instance of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. McCORMICK]. It opened the way for the deflation policy; and then the Federal Reserve Board, bowing and scraping to the party that it knew would come into power, in order that it might retain its place, carried out the policy.

Why, Mr. President, do you not know that if that board had not been performing entirely in a satisfactory way, the leader from Illinois, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. McCORMICK] would have had every one of its members removed?

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, the Senator flatters me in including me among the world-wide economic causes of the present depression. I am overcome to be classed with reparations and armaments and devastation in northern France as one of the fundamental reasons for the depression throughout the country and the world.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois can not escape with that sort of an excuse. There was no excuse for the depression that was produced here. We had the money, we had the credit, we had the ability to finance the World War, and this board boasted at that time that we could expand and inflate still more and never endanger the gold reserve at all. We stood through the war, and then, when the wolves of Wall Street commenced to howl for their feast, they got ready to deflate so that they could make not only their millions, their hundreds of millions, but their billions out of the South and West, and they made them. The Senator from Illinois may have been entirely innocent as to the effect that this thing was going to have, but he was unfortunately the instrumentality that opened the way for this long train of misery and ruin that we find in the United States; and W. P. G. Harding, the Federal Reserve Board governor, wrote a letter, in response to the Senator's resolution, promising that they would use every power at their command to carry out the purposes of the deflation resolution, and he certainly kept his promise.

They wrought ruin in the South and in the West. The evidence of that ruin is there to speak for itself, Mr. President. The country is in distress; industries are shut down; 7,000,000 laborers have been turned out of employment; farming operations have been made unprofitable; farmers' farms have been taken from them; dire distress is reigning in the country; and every time we defeat one of the Republican reactionaries the Senator from Illinois gets up here and demands that the League of Nations be made the issue.

Mr. McCORMICK. Every time what happens?

Mr. HEFLIN. Every time we defeat one of the reactionaries, such as my good friend Congressman COPLEY, a clever gentleman, but one of the standpatters of the old school.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, the Senator forgets that Mr. COPLEY supported Colonel Roosevelt in three successive campaigns, and even left the Republican Party in doing so.

Mr. HEFLIN. Then, Mr. President, if he had stayed out he might have been renominated. He went back to the old lick log and they slaughtered him. He has been a good reactionary for quite a while in the House. Mr. Roosevelt has been gone for some time. Mr. COPLEY is a very wealthy man, and he was going right along with the reactionary program, and he got defeated for renomination a few days ago; and my friend from Illinois came in here and lifted his voice nearly as loud as he did this afternoon and said that we must make the League of Nations the issue, and on yesterday—he has been quiet now for two or three weeks——

Mr. McCORMICK. That is more than can be said for the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HEFLIN. Why, I have not said anything in over a month except on day before yesterday, when I was compelled to talk about your deflation policy.

Mr. McCORMICK. And the day before that.

Mr. HEFLIN. Not the day before that.

Mr. McCORMICK. The Senator was out of town, perhaps.

Mr. HEFLIN. I have been right here, but the Senator has been away.

And on yesterday, Mr. President, when our genial friend—and we all are exceedingly fond of Senator NEW—was defeated, a strong administration candidate, the Senator from Illinois comes in, and, louder and stronger than ever before, demands that we make the League of Nations the issue.

Mr. President, I do not blame the Senator. It shows how shrewd and cunning he is. He says: "Why, they are whipping us on the record that we are making here in Congress. Let us make the League of Nations the issue."

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, will the Senator let me interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. HEFLIN. I shall be glad to be interrupted by the Senator because I am anxious to help him out of this amusing predicament in which he finds himself.

Mr. McCORMICK. Will the Senator let me call to his attention the absence from the Chamber of any Democratic Senators from north of the Mason and Dixon line who are candidates for reelection, now that the League of Nations is before the Senate? Perhaps the Senator will ask his colleague [Mr. UNDERWOOD] if he will not join Governor Cox in demanding that the Democratic National Committee reaffirm the Democratic faith that we should subscribe to the covenant of the treaty of Versailles, and integrally enforce the treaty of Versailles.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, if my colleague will yield——

Mr. HEFLIN. I shall be glad to yield to my colleague.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I feel sorry, very sorry, for my good friend from Illinois. I realize that the issues under which his party friends are meeting defeat are issues that he would gladly get away from, as has been suggested by my colleague. I have heard him refer once or twice to me on this question of the League of Nations.

Mr. McCORMICK. When?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. This afternoon, specifically; but that is all right.

Of course I can not speak for anyone but myself, and I do not intend to speak for anyone but myself; but I will remind the Senator from Illinois that some weeks ago, when I stood in my place in the Senate advocating the ratification of the four-power pact as presented to the Senate by the President of the United States, I said that I did so because the principle involved was the same principle that made me vote for the ratification of the treaty of Versailles and the League of Nations. I said at that time that I had the proud opportunity, when the treaty of Versailles was before the Senate, to make the motion for the unconditional ratification of that treaty. I was proud to do it then, and I have been proud of it ever since. I have believed that one of the great mistakes this Government has made—one of the greatest mistakes that stands to its record in all its history—was the fact that it failed to ratify the treaty of Versailles and take its place among its allies in settling the shattered conditions of Europe, and take its place at the only table at which these questions could be settled, and assist in saving the world from the disordered political conditions of Europe, the disordered financial conditions of Europe, and the disastrous business conditions of Europe that confront the world to-day and have shattered American finance and American business. That is my viewpoint of the matter, and I have no apologies to make for it.

As to the issues in the campaign, men do not make issues. Conditions make great political issues and men fight for them or against them. I want to say to the Senator that I have known of no apology on the part of the Democratic Party for its position in favor of the League of Nations, and I certainly have no desire to make any; but, notwithstanding the desire of the Senator from Illinois to make that the dominant issue in the next campaign, the dominant issue will be the mistakes of his own party in passing a financial bill increasing the burdens of taxation on the American people, failing to relieve the business interests of this country from undue burdens of taxation, and failing to bring down the expenditures of the Government to a point even approximating those that existed before the war.

Of course you have reduced expenditures somewhat. You took charge of this Government, so far as controlling the House of Representatives was concerned, and the purse strings of the Nation, the week that the armistice was signed, and yet we have war expenditures still appropriated for to-day, and taxes must be raised to meet them. How can you expect the American people to think only of the covenant of the League of Nations when you are burdening them with these immense appropriations and failing to reduce the oppressive taxes that rest upon their backs—taxes and burdens of appropriation that have shattered business—when you have woe in the home and poverty in the street?

That is the reason why the Senator can not make the League of Nations the sole issue in the coming campaign. It is because his party on the live issues of the hour, the issues of to-day, has failed to make good before the American people.

Mr. McCORMICK. The Senator considers the League of Nations a dead issue?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I said the live issues of the hour, which are made by the Senator's party. Of course, the Senator knows, just as I know, that the treaty of Versailles is in the White House, and that there is no chance to make it an issue unless the President of the United States will send it here. He has the power to send it back. He will not send it back, and therefore he prevents any action on the part of this Government with reference to the matter; but even if he sent it back, and if it were ratified now, it would be too late to meet the issue and save the situation, which could have been saved if the treaty had been promptly ratified when it first came before the Senate of the United States.

Mr. McCORMICK. Let me ask the Senator a question to see if I understand him. He agrees, then, with the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] and the former governor of Ohio, that ultimately the United States ought to subscribe to the covenant of the League of Nations?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am not speaking as agreeing with anybody; I am expressing my own views on this subject, and I think I have done so clearly. I do not say, and do not contend, that the treaty of Versailles and the covenant of the League of Nations will be the issue in the coming campaign. I have no apologies for my action in regard to that matter, and nothing to take back. I know it will not be the leading and foremost issue, because the mistakes, within the last year and a half, of the Senator's own party so overshadow everything else in the political arena that you could not make anything else the issue before the American people if you tried.

The administration will go to the country on the test as to whether it has made good in its financial and business promises before the people of the United States, and the verdict is bound to be, the verdict is in every mouth and every home and every office to-day, that you have failed to make good.

Mr. McCORMICK. Having failed in that, will the Senator tell me whether or not he believes, with Governor Cox and the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD], that ultimately we ought to subscribe to the covenant of the League of Nations?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Ultimately? I say now; I do not say ultimately.

Mr. McCORMICK. The Senator from Alabama is not so hasty.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I said to the Senator that I voted for the unconditional ratification of the treaty.

Mr. McCORMICK. That was two years ago.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. And I have never apologized for it. I myself think that our proper place to-day would be in the League of Nations. That is my viewpoint. But I say that even if we went in to-day, it would not relieve any of the disaster which came to the world and this country because of the failure of the United States Senate to ratify that treaty.

Mr. McCORMICK. I thank the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] for his courtesy in yielding.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, my colleague has made a very strong and clear statement. Of course, he could not convince the Senator from Illinois. Every time a reactionary is defeated for election to the House or Senate the Senator from Illinois is going to come in and demand the League of Nations as an issue, because he saw his party triumph upon that issue—that is, it had something to do with it, I suppose. But I want to remind the able and distinguished Senator from Illinois, one of the leaders on the other side, that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW], our clever, good friend, who was defeated on Tuesday, voted against the League of Nations. Where is the saving grace in opposition to the League of Nations, that is such a burning issue now, that it could not save the Senator from Indiana on Tuesday?

Mr. McCORMICK. The Senator from Indiana did not vote against the League of Nations.

Mr. HEFLIN. Certainly he voted against the League of Nations issue.

Mr. McCORMICK. No; he did not.

Mr. HEFLIN. Did he vote for it?

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. Beveridge was against it.

Mr. HEFLIN. Senator NEW, I understand, voted against the League of Nations.

Mr. McCORMICK. No; he did not.

Mr. HEFLIN. Did he vote against the Versailles treaty?

Mr. McCORMICK. He voted to ratify the League of Nations with reservations.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield to my friend from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Illinois says the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] voted for the League of Nations with reservations.

Mr. McCORMICK. He did.

Mr. HARRISON. There were a good many Senators on the other side who voted that way. Are they still of that opinion, that it should be ratified with reservations?

Mr. McCORMICK. I think not.

Mr. HARRISON. Why does the Senator think not?

Mr. McCORMICK. I think the President, speaking from yonder place, defined the position of the party and of a majority of the Senators on this side. He has twice declared, for himself, and, I think, for the majority of the party, upon that issue.

Mr. HARRISON. The President, when he was a Senator, voted for the League of Nations with reservations.

Mr. McCORMICK. I am speaking of the President as President, not as Senator. I ask the Senator from Alabama to excuse me for having interrupted him.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I am glad to yield to the Senator. The Senator is in an awful fix, and I want to help him out of it if I can.

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] voted against the League of Nations. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] offered it without reservations, and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] voted against it. That is his record; that is his position upon it.

Mr. McCORMICK. The Senator does not mean that the Senator from Indiana did not vote for it with reservations?

Mr. HEFLIN. I do not remember how he voted on the death-dealing blow, the Lodge reservations, which finally put it to sleep.

Mr. SHEPPARD. He voted for it with the Lodge reservations.

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes; he voted for it with those reservations.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The Lodge reservations cut the heart out of the league.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If my colleague would like to have the vote that was cast on that occasion, I can give it to him, and he can read it into the RECORD if he wishes.

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes; and the RECORD shows that Senator NEW voted against it.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator, however, that ex-Senator Beveridge, who defeated Senator NEW, was against the League of Nations. He was against it with reservations attached to it, and he opposed it in every possible way.

Mr. HARRISON. Was that an issue out there?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Alabama has brought it up as an issue here.

Mr. HARRISON. I am asking the Senator from Utah if that was an issue between Mr. Beveridge and Mr. NEW?

Mr. SMOOT. I can not say.

Mr. HEFLIN. I never knew of it as an issue out there.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator mentioned it here, and spoke of Senator NEW being defeated.

Mr. HEFLIN. I knew the Senator from Utah would come to the rescue of the other leader, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK].

Mr. SMOOT. I am not a leader.

Mr. HEFLIN. I think he ought to stay out and let the Senator from Illinois get out the best way he can. As I said before, he started this League of Nations discussion. I think the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has all he can do in defending these tariff schedules he has brought in here, which just simply rob the people of this whole country. He is getting off now talking about something else which does not pertain to these people who are having such a hard struggle to live at this time.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator has made an argument based on the fact that the Senator from Indiana was defeated in the primary in Indiana, and he is seeking to connect the result with the League of Nations. But the man who defeated him was not only opposed to the League of Nations as it was submitted, but he was opposed to the League of Nations with any kind of an amendment, and he would not have anything to do with it in any way, shape, or form.

Mr. HEFLIN. That does not enter into this.

Mr. SMOOT. It did enter into the Senator's argument.

Mr. HEFLIN. I ask the Senator from Illinois, whose opposition to the league is so strong and mighty, why did not the position of Senator NEW save him Tuesday in the primary election?

Mr. SMOOT. Because Mr. Beveridge, who beat him, was stronger against it than Mr. NEW was.

Mr. HEFLIN. But they did not mention the league in the campaign, I understand.

Mr. SMOOT. Then why does the Senator bring it up?

Mr. HEFLIN. Why did it help Mr. Beveridge any if they did not mention it?

Mr. SMOOT. I am not saying it did. The Senator is trying to bring in the question here.

Mr. HEFLIN. I am reminded that the vote in the NEWBERRY case had a great deal to do with it.

Mr. SMOOT. Do not try to dodge the question, which is the League of Nations.

Mr. HEFLIN. I am not dodging. I am giving one of the vital issues to the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. Do not dodge the question of the League of Nations. That is what we were discussing.

Mr. HEFLIN. The League of Nations—there he goes! He has gone off after the League of Nations, too. We are going to try you upon the vital issues of the hour.

Mr. SMOOT. That is what we want.

Mr. HEFLIN. Upon the domestic concerns of our long-suffering people.

Mr. SMOOT. That is what we would like.

Mr. HEFLIN. We will accommodate the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. There was nothing in what the Senator from Illinois said that caused me to rise. I was replying to what the Senator from Alabama said.

Mr. HEFLIN. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I never mentioned the League of Nations, with the exception of calling the attention of the Senator from Alabama to the fact that the opposition of the Senator from Indiana to the League of Nations, or his being in favor of it, had nothing whatever to do with his defeat, because of the fact that ex-Senator Beveridge was opposed to the League of Nations in every way.

Mr. HEFLIN. If the league was an issue at all, and if the people were so much aroused over the league and about it, and felt as the Senator from Illinois frequently leads us to believe they feel, would they not have said, "We do not care how Beveridge feels. Senator NEW voted against the thing. We are going to send him back because he did."

Mr. SMOOT. But he voted for it with reservations.

Mr. HEFLIN. He voted just as the Senator from Utah voted. The Senator from Utah voted for it, with reservations, did he not? The Senator from Utah voted against it without reservations, did he not?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I voted against it without reservations.

Mr. HEFLIN. Then the Senator voted against the League of Nations.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly, I did; and I would do it again. But the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] voted for the league with reservations, and ex-Senator Beveridge would not have voted for it even with the reservations.

Mr. MOSES. May I seek a little enlightenment of the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. HEFLIN. I am glad always to enlighten my friend from New Hampshire, because I think he, like the Senator from Illinois, is entitled to a good supply of that material.

Mr. MOSES. The Senator has been referring to recent political events frequently in the course of the afternoon in this language, "Whenever we beat a reactionary." Whom does he mean by "we"? Does he mean that the Democrats beat Senator NEW or Representative COPLEY in a Republican primary?

Mr. HEFLIN. Not at all; but I was speaking about when the administration received a rebuke, when a candidate who is supporting the administration is defeated, and when some man runs in your primary who says that he is opposed to what is going on up here, that he wants to come up here and do this, that, and the other, that is not now being done. When he comes out of the political arena bearing off the laurels of the day, it is repudiation. That is what I am talking about.

Mr. MOSES. Let me ask the Senator, further, if he thinks that Mr. Beveridge and the gentleman who won the nomination from Mr. COPLEY will be antiadministration when they get here?

Mr. HEFLIN. I do not know. Frequently a Republican gets a nomination in the primary and changes his position after he gets here, as my friend from New Hampshire did on the bonus.

Mr. MOSES. I hope they will have the manhood to state their positions.

Mr. HEFLIN. I think they should, and that we should not have to make them acknowledge their positions.

Mr. MOSES. The Senator did not make me state anything. I stated it of my own volition.

Mr. HEFLIN. I remember very well that the Senator did do that voluntarily; that is, the Senator was speaking, and I reminded him of that, and he admitted it.

Mr. MOSES. No; I stated it in the opening sentence of my speech.

Mr. HEFLIN. I believe the Senator is correct about that. If so capable and brave a Senator as my good friend from New Hampshire will tell them one thing in the primary and vote another when he gets here, what may we expect from feeble fellows who happen to get nominated?

Mr. MOSES. In my case, I have always put them on notice.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator put them on notice after he had been nominated and got the election, and had his certificate in his pocket.

Mr. MOSES. In ample time so that they would know before the vote was taken.

Mr. HEFLIN. In ample time before the next election.

Mr. MOSES. The Senator is welcome to come up in my State and raise that question.

Mr. HEFLIN. Oh, Mr. President, I am not seeking to get up in the Senator's State and raise that question against him. I want to raise the questions here, in the forum of the people. Let us go out and fight out the issues on which we are battling now, and not let the Senator from Illinois lead us back down under the hill, where the people can not see and hear. We want to fight this domestic issue out on the mountain top.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield.

Mr. STANLEY. I take this occasion to remark to the Senator from New Hampshire that the fight to which he refers in Illinois is purely a family affair in the Republican Party. I do not see any special significance in that election to either Democrats or Republicans. The best information I can get is that Brother COPLEY dried up and blew away. I do not know whether the Senator will differ with me in that respect or not.

Mr. MOSES. They are not saying on the other side of the Chamber in respect to that matter that "we defeated the reactionaries."

Mr. STANLEY. I did not shed any tears.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, the Republican Party this morning when they got that news from Indiana did not know whether to move forward, step back, stand still, or sit down. They reminded me of the country boy who was doing some stunts with hen eggs one night. He had the audience sitting out in front, with these little Japanese lanterns such as they burn on the porch at night. He said: "I am going to do with eggs what you have seen done with white balls frequently. I will keep seven of them going in the air at once." He performed that remarkable stunt, and they sat in wide-eyed astonishment as the little fellow pulled off the stunt. Then he said, laying the eggs all down upon the table, "Now, I am going to do another thing. I am going to pitch one of them into my mouth at arm's length, never striking my teeth or breaking the egg."

Just as he whirled the egg old Uncle Johnny, sitting there holding his whiskers in front of him and chewing his cud, turned his chair over and fell. The boy slipped a cog, his mind being distracted from his business, and he swallowed the egg. A friend rushed to him and said, "Jimmy, shall I send for the doctor?" Jimmy said, "Don't touch me. I don't know what to do. If I move it will break, and if I stand still it will hatch." [Laughter.]

So it is with our Republican friends. They are in an awful predicament, but most of them smile and enjoy it and take it good-naturedly, like my friend the Senator from New Hampshire, but it is going to hurt the Senator from Illinois, and he is not going to be able to survive more than two or three more jolts of this character. Every time the news comes in that one of them has been beaten he walks down the aisle to the altar place in front of the Vice President, whirls viciously toward the Democratic side and says, "I challenge you to make the League of Nations the issue." [Laughter.]

Mr. President, we have issues enough already formed by the present administration upon which to go to the country. I remind the Senator from Illinois and the profiteers who flourish in rank luxuriance to-day with their taxes all taken off. I remind him of the distress wrought by his deflation policy. I remind him of the millions of men yet unemployed. I remind him of the distress to be found in every line of business. I remind him of the unrest that we see all about us, a discontented, unhappy, and yet determined people. Mr. President, they are aroused as they have not been for years. "Weighed in the balance and found wanting." That will be the verdict they will render.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to take just a moment of the time of the Senate. I have not been very much alarmed at what the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] has stated, and has repeated every day or two in this Chamber for weeks past. I am not alarmed over what the issues will be in the coming campaign. I am not alarmed over what is going to happen to the Republican Party for what are denominated the mistakes of the party and this administration. Before the campaign is over the American people will know just exactly the condition in which the Republican Party found the country when they took charge of the administration of the Government.

Talk about burdensome taxes? Of course, they are burdensome. In 1918 I stood at my desk here and told the American people that the taxes for the next quarter of a century would never be less than $3,000,000,000. On retiring from office in what condition did the Democratic Party leave the country? How did they leave it? In what financial condition was the country left in by them? The interest upon our obligations, the amount that is absolutely necessary to take care of the wounded soldiers, and the sinking fund required by a law passed by the last administration, of which law I approved, constitute nearly $2,000,000,000 every year. This amount must be raised by taxation without providing a cent for running expenses of the Government.

The attention of the American people will be called to this. The attention of the American people will be called to the conditions which exist in the world to-day. The American people know, so far as the business of their own country is concerned, that it is generally struggling to make ends meet, and successful concerns making little money on which to pay taxes and necessarily rates of taxation could be reduced but little. Burdensome? Of course the taxes are burdensome, but when the American people know the amount that this administration has saved in cutting down the appropriations which have been so carelessly and wickedly made in the past I think there will be no question as to what the verdict of the American people will be.

I am not alarmed in the least, and, so far as I am concerned, I do not believe it will be the League of Nations that will be the great issue. I believe that the dominating question in the campaign will be the expenditures of public money, and how the money is to be raised to meet the same.

Mr. President, I think if the Democrats will allow the tariff bill to be passed in time that it can operate before the day of election, there is no question as to what the verdict of the people will be. The result will be a revival of business, slowly, I will admit, with the existing tariff law in force much longer. We would have to be looking around for different kinds of taxation, taxes that have never been thought of in the past, to lay upon the backs of the people. The rates in the tariff bill are only such as will fairly protect the American business man, and if they do not protect him I know just what will happen. It will result in exactly what the pending law resulted in before the breaking out of the war. I say now that if it had not been for the war the existing tariff law would never have been on the statute books longer than it was possible for the American people to render a verdict upon it, and the Republican Party to have time to make a new tariff bill. When the war broke out the balance of trade against the United States was increasing rapidly, taking importations and exportations into consideration. I called the attention of the Senate to the fact that, before the breaking out of the war, month after month we were running behind at the rate of $62,000,000 a month. It would not have taken very long until the country would have been in a worse condition than it was in the nineties, and I think that the American people realize it, and that the only thing which saved them was the declaration of war.

Mr. President, so far as the Republican Party is concerned, we are perfectly willing to meet the issue, and I feel confident and assured that the American people before the campaign is over will understand the situation, and I have no fear whatever as to the result.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, a gentleman sitting in the Chamber yesterday, who is a considerable mathematician, sent me a little note. This note read as follows:

Listening to these heroic efforts on the part of some Senators to do everything in their power to expedite the consideration and passage of this bill, I have evolved the following algebraic problem to ascertain at the present rate of progress just when the committee amendments will be disposed of.

Given these facts: The bill has been under consideration for 13 days. Three amendments have been acted upon. There are 2,000 committee amendments reported.

Then, making his calculation, he proceeds:

Not counting Sundays or legal holidays, the last amendment should be agreed to on September 29, 1946.

I think, Mr. President, after listening to the debate to-day he would have to revise his figures and add 30 or 40 more years to the date he gave for final action upon the committee amendments.

Now, Mr. President, ever since I was old enough to read any of the debates of Congress, and I began perhaps in the early seventies to take an interest in them, I have found that whenever a tariff bill was up for consideration which had for its purpose protection to American industries we had the same expression that we have to-day, "monstrosity." We had the same expressions of condemnation and denunciation. They all come back to me through the years, echoing the same sentiments, and connected with them was always the same threat, that the Republican Party was going to be wiped off the face of the earth. Notwithstanding the threats, notwithstanding the adjectives which were used, the Republican Party and the protective policy have held for about five-sixths of the time since 1860.

Now, I do not know whether its life will continue or not. I do know this, however, that braggadocio, blowing what we are going to do or what we would do, is not going to change the minds of the American people very much. If the bill is satisfactory to them, if it will bring about any revival of business, I have no doubt that the American people will continue in power those who have sponsored the bill and this character of legislation. If it fails to produce that result there may be a reversal.

All I know is that the platform of the last Republican national convention declared strongly for the reinstatement of the American protective policy. I know that President Harding was elected by a very great majority. I am not one of those who claim, or will admit, that the principal issue which caused the defeat of the Democratic Party and of Governor Cox was the League of Nations or any other single issue, for in our own platform we came out strongly for an association of nations to preserve the peace of the world. Nothing was said as to how such an association should or should not be constituted. I have no doubt in the world that there was a very strong feeling against Mr. Wilson's League of Nations, and that it did materially affect the result in that election, although I favored the League of Nations, with proper reservations; but there were other questions involved.

I do not think that in the beginning the American people wanted to become involved in the World War, and the cry of those who favored Mr. Wilson's election in 1916 that "he had kept us out of war" had a great deal to do with his return to power at that time. Then we entered the war, and there was something of a revulsion of feeling on the part of a great many of the American people on account of the fact that, having been returned to power on that assumption, the then administration immediately went into war.

There were many other considerations which influenced the election. There were a great many considerations outside of the tariff question and the League of Nations question and the keeping us out of war question which had their due and proper weight in bringing about a change of administration. However, there prevailed throughout the sentiment, "Now that we are out of the war we want to get back to a protective policy."

I believe the American people as a rule are in favor of a protective policy. If any item of the pending bill goes beyond what is reasonably protective, then it should be discussed and be changed if Senators on the other side can convince us we are wrong. Then, let us put the bill through; let us get rid of this tariff legislation and go home and let the American people pass judgment upon whether or not the Republican Party should be retained in power. If we have made a mistake, let us go ahead and at least submit the matter to the judgment of the people after we have put our bill upon the statute books.

I want to get through with this bill. I think it is a disgrace to the American Senate that after a bill has been brought into the body there is no power in the Senate to compel Senators to discuss the bill under consideration, but that any Senator may enter upon the discussion of any question he may see fit to discuss.

The pending bill has not been discussed during the last 14 days one-fifth of the time it has been before the Senate. The discussion has continually branched off on some extraneous matters. I hope Senators will consider the bill now and will make it in reality the unfinished business.

If we do not pass the bill in due time, I will tell Senators what is going to happen. They may consume hours and days in discussion and keep that up for a month or two, and then suddenly they will get tired of hearing their own voices; suddenly the Senate itself will demand immediate action, and before we shall have considered more than one-third of the bill Senators will be ready to swallow all the remainder of it in order to get away.

I had rather Senators would discuss every one of the items of the bill and get through with them. I think that is the logical and the only legitimate way to discuss a tariff bill. Mr. President, we can not handle the bill by holding only day sessions if the discussion is to continue for weeks.

Mr. CURTIS rose.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will yield in a moment. I do not want to ask for night sessions. I think if we do our morning work and then meet at 11 o'clock and remain in session until 6 o'clock in the afternoon we shall have done a good, honest day's work, and that we ought to have a little time for rest; but if Senators are going to insist upon discussing every subject on earth except the tariff bill, there is but one method by which we can meet the situation, and that is to insist that we shall have not only day sessions but that we shall also hold night sessions.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CURTIS. I rose before the Senator from North Dakota said that he did not care to resort to night sessions to suggest that we hold night sessions beginning on next Monday night. I think a few night sessions would get the bill through.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I will say in answer to that suggestion that I think, if we give our attention to the bill, it will not be necessary to hold night sessions at all; and I certainly should not consider it necessary to ask for evening sessions unless such a course seemed imperative in order to make progress with the consideration of the bill.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I merely wish to say that I have taken up very little time during the discussion of the tariff bill. I spoke for about 20 minutes the other day on a matter of very grave importance to the farmers of the entire United States; and I spoke to-day briefly about a matter which affects the whole American people, and that is the control of the money supply and the credits of the country. If Senators can not speak upon such matters when they are presented for consideration there is no use to wait for two or three weeks and then speak on them.

I wish to say further to the Senator from North Dakota——

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me say that I am making no complaint against the Senator from Alabama. On the contrary, I think the first injection of extraneous matters into the debate this afternoon was from this side of the Chamber. We have, however, nevertheless, discussed nearly all matters except the bill which is nominally under consideration.

I know how deeply the Senator from Alabama is interested in questions affecting the mode of operation of the Federal reserve banks, but inasmuch as the tariff bill is now the real matter before the Senate, I am simply pleading that from now we may proceed with the consideration of that measure.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I am in hearty agreement with the Senator about that. I do not think that there is any disposition over here to filibuster at all; certainly there is none on my part. I should like to see the tariff bill passed on within a month's time, and probably that may be done; but I submit that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], and the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] have been discussing the tariff measure hour after hour and pointing out the provisions of the bill which they think are very objectionable. The American people are entitled to know what is in this bill. They can not pass on it intelligently unless its provisions are explained to them. Here is a bill containing very many items and provisions, and unless it is very thoroughly discussed the people will not know what is in it until after the election. I think the time the Senate has devoted to discussing the measure as it has been discussed by the Senators to whom I have referred is time well spent, for certainly those who represent the people here are entitled to take all the time they think necessary to show Congress and then to the people the obnoxious provisions contained in the bill.

I wish to say for the benefit of the senior Senator from North Dakota that some Republican newspapers in the West have denounced this bill as the worst tariff bill that has ever been submitted to Congress, and many Republicans in the country, I understand, feel the same way about it. If they do, they are entitled to have the matter fairly and thoroughly discussed.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, I agree with him as to that. I want the measure discussed, but the complaint that I am urging is that it has not been discussed; that other subjects have taken nearly all of the time.

Mr. HEFLIN. I differ from my good friend from North Dakota as to that. I have heard the discussion, and it seems to me that two-thirds of the time day after day have been consumed in the discussion of the tariff bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, no; the Senator is mistaken. I do not think that one hour out of five has been spent in the discussion of the tariff bill.

Mr. HEFLIN. I can not agree with the Senator as to that. I know that it has long been the custom for the Senator having the floor to discuss a pending measure to yield for the transaction of some other business that must be transacted. That has been done, of course, during the discussion of the tariff bill, but I think that this measure has been discussed as consistently, if not more so, than any measure which has been before the body since I have been here.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, it is my intention to ask the Senate to continue in session until 6 o'clock this evening, but I have some assurance that to-morrow we will really consider the tariff bill. There are Senators who desire to get away. So I ask that when the Senate concludes its business on this calendar day it shall take a recess until to-morrow at 11 o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Dakota? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

NAT GOLDSTEIN.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, there is a very interesting article in the New York Times of this morning. It is found in the third column on the front page, and I should like to have it read from the Secretary's desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

WASHINGTON, May 3.—President Harding sent to the Senate to-day the nomination of Nat Goldstein to be collector of internal revenue for the first (St. Louis) district of Missouri. In doing so the President laid the foundation for political trouble, for Goldstein is one of two men whose acceptance of money to further the campaign of Frank O. Lowden, then governor of Illinois, for the Republican nomination for President had most to do with losing Lowden this honor.

Some Republican Senators were plainly disconcerted when they learned that Goldstein had been nominated. With the incident of the 1920 campaign in mind, they felt that a party error had been made in this selection.

"Good Lord, can it be true?" exclaimed one Senator when told of the nomination. That the naming of Goldstein will furnish Democrats with some high explosive ammunition goes without saying. In a measure the nomination seems likely to become a second Newberry case, and the expectation is that some Republican Senators will join with the Democrats in opposing confirmation.

The nomination will be referred to the Committee on Finance, the Republican members of which are McCUMBER, SMOOT, LA FOLLETTE, DILLINGHAM, McLEAN, CURTIS, WATSON, CALDER, SUTHERLAND, and FRELINGHUYSEN. Among the Democratic Senators is Senator REED, who is having strong opposition in his effort to be renominated. If he should be named to run again, the Goldstein case will give him a new campaign issue. The other Democratic members of the committee are HITCHCOCK, WILLIAMS, SWANSON, POMERENE, PITTMAN, and SHIELDS.

Called before a Senate committee of investigation on June 2, 1920, Robert E. Moore, of St. Louis, and Goldstein admitted that each had received a check for $2,500 from Jacob Babler, national committeeman from Missouri, before the election of delegates to the Republican National Convention, and that each understood that it was Lowden money. Moore testified that Babler handed him the check "to take it and use it for whatever I (Moore) saw fit," but that he had not used it. The money was still to his credit in a bank, he said, but in view of the unpleasant notoriety which the matter had caused he would return it.

Goldstein, then a circuit court clerk in St. Louis, testified that Babler handed him a check for $2,500; that he had put it to his credit in bank; that his intention was to turn it over to the Lowden organization "when we got into the campaign," if Lowden were nominated, or return the money if Lowden were not nominated. Goldstein said that when the money was given to him he was a candidate for delegate to the national convention, and subsequently was elected without instructions. He added that he "was friendly to Governor Lowden's interests."

Other testimony was to the effect that Louis L. Emmerson, secretary of state of Illinois and Governor Lowden's campaign manager, sent to E. L. Morse, the Lowden campaign manager in Missouri, $32,000 to pay expenses in his attempt to carry Missouri. Morse testified that he gave $17,000 of this amount to Babler "to create Lowden sentiment." All the testimony showed that Governor Lowden had no knowledge of those transactions. He issued a statement in which he repudiated the support of Moore and Goldstein. "My injunctions to Mr. Emmerson were to use no money except for legitimate purposes of the campaign and to make no expenditure that could not be made public," he said.

The whole affair created such a furor that the Republican leaders at the Chicago convention were afraid to throw the presidential nomination to Lowden. Of the leading contestants for the nomination, General Wood, Senator Harding, Senator JOHNSON, and Governor Lowden, the favorite with the leaders was Lowden.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, in view of that statement from that very reputable paper, if there is such a nomination here, there will be a motion made to have the nomination considered in open executive session.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, I do not wish to detain the Senate at this late hour. I was out of the Senate Chamber, in a committee meeting, when the article from some paper was read concerning Mr. Nat Goldstein.

I merely want to say at this time that I have known Mr. Goldstein for 25 years. He is now, and has been for some years, the clerk of the circuit court of the city of St. Louis. He is a man of the highest integrity, a man whom judges and lawyers and business men of the community would vouch for, I am sure, as they have to me, in large numbers. When the time comes I shall be very glad to give to the Senate any information that any Senator may desire to hear about him.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield before he takes his seat, let me say that in view of what the Senator has said I am sure he will cooperate with me and others who may desire to have this matter discussed in open executive session, and, when the motion is made to have it discussed in open executive session, that he will vote for it.

Mr. SPENCER. I am inclined to think that nominations had better be discussed, as they always have been, in executive session. I know how often the Senator from Mississippi has desired to have many nominations discussed in open session; but my judgment has rather been with the majority of the Senate, that it is better to conform ourselves to what has been the custom ever since I have been here.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator would not like to make this an exception to that rule? If this article and these rumors that are current have done Mr. Goldstein so much injury, then he should have a right to have his case discussed in the open. It would seem fair to him that we should do it, so I am sure that the Senator will cooperate with me in making an exception in this instance.

Mr. SPENCER. In other words, the distinguished Senator from Mississippi first makes some charge which he thinks needs an answer, and then, upon the basis of the charge which he himself has made, he says that because of the right of the man himself we ought to have an open executive session to discuss the matter. That does not appeal to me as being a very strong argument.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not make any charge. This article was from the New York Times, and they say that Mr. Goldstein himself said that he got the $2,500 and placed it in the bank to his credit in order to create Lowden sentiment in Missouri.

Mr. SPENCER. I was under the impression that the article was put in at the instance of the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; for the information of the Senator, and the Senate, and the country.

PROHIBITION ENFORCEMENT.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, I have no disposition to discuss the reasons for the defeat of any candidate in the recent elections, because that has been done before by other Senators. I wish to observe, however, that in my opinion one of the elements which are making it difficult for some people to come back to Congress is the Volstead law, and especially that feature of it which permits a man to invade the sanctity of a home at night without a search warrant.

In order to bear out this statement, I wish now to offer a copy of a joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Louisiana in the year 1921, addressed to the Vice President and by him referred to me, and ask that it be inserted in the RECORD in 8-point type.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Senate Concurrent Resolution 5.

Whereas the Congress of the United States is at the present time considering a modification of the so-called Volstead Act prohibiting the manufacture and sale of liquors for beverage purposes containing more than one-half of 1 per cent alcohol;

Whereas it is the desire of all that the Volstead Act should be amended and modified so as to permit the sale of light wines and beer in wholesale quantities under proper Government restrictions: Be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Louisiana and the House of Representatives concurring, That the Congress of the United States be requested to modify and amend the so-called Volstead Act so as to permit the sale and manufacture of light wines and beer in wholesale quantities under proper Government restrictions.

HEWITT BOUANCHAUD,
Lieutenant Governor and President of the Senate.
R. F. WALKER,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I also wish to offer a letter addressed to me by the Grain Trade Association of the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce, inclosing a copy of a letter to the President of the United States, and making a similar plea. I ask that this be printed in the RECORD in 8-point type.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

GRAIN TRADE ASSOCIATION OF SAN FRANCISCO
CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
San Francisco, April 20, 1922.

Hon. EDWIN S. BROUSSARD,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR BROUSSARD: Inclosed herewith we hand you reprint from the San Francisco Daily Commercial News, dated April 15, from which you will see that 5,044 separate landowners, owning in the aggregate 5,297,821 acres of land, have petitioned our association to use its best efforts to bring about legislation so as to allow the manufacture and sale of light wines and beer.

Yours very truly,

GRAIN TRADE ASSOCIATION OF THE
SAN FRANCISCO CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
By W. BELKNAP, Secretary.

[Reprinted from Daily Commercial News, April 15, 1922.]

GRAIN TRADE ASSOCIATION ADDRESSES LETTER TO PRESIDENT HARDING.

The Grain Trade Association of the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce yesterday sent the following letter to President Harding:

SAN FRANCISCO, April 14, 1922.

Hon. WARREN G. HARDING,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: We take the liberty of advising you that during the past few weeks we have been requested over the separate signatures of 5,044 landowners, owning in the aggregate 5,297,821 acres land, devoted to all sorts of agriculture, etc., in California, to use our best efforts in helping to bring about an amendment to the Volstead Act, so as to legalize the manufacture and sale of light wines and beer.

Recently the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce, California State convention of organized labor, San Francisco Stock and Bond Exchange, Sacramento Chamber of Commerce, and various other organizations, either voted unanimously, or almost unanimously, in favor of the same amendatory legislation.

Your interest and support of such proposed legislation is therefore respectfully requested by us.

Faithfully yours,

GRAIN TRADE ASSOCIATION OF THE
SAN FRANCISCO CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
F. A. SOMERS, Chairman.
D. BELKNAP, Secretary.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I also wish to insert in the RECORD a recent editorial in order to prove the correctness of the predictions we made during the consideration of the antisearch legislation finally adopted by this Congress, that the prohibition agents would invade the homes and disregard the constitutional privileges of citizens. In order to bear out those predictions I offer also, to be printed in 8-point type, an editorial from the Baltimore Sun, reproduced in the Washington Post of April 27, 1922, describing how prohibition agents in the early hours of the morning forced their way into the residence of a citizen of Maryland and shot up the place while the occupant of that residence was sleeping.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

ASK FOR THE WHOLE TRUTH.
[From the Baltimore Sun.]

The prohibition authorities at Washington owe it to themselves, as well as to the people of this State, to investigate thoroughly the so-called "raid" of "dry" agents from the Capital against the home of Frank A. Lutz, near Knoxville, Frederick County. Mr. Lutz's version of the affair is that he was aroused from sleep at an early hour of the morning by some one knocking loudly on his front door. When he asked who was there, the answer was the imperative demand, "Let us in." When he refused, one of the men attempted to force an entrance, whereupon Mr. Lutz shot through the door to frighten the intruders off and was answered by a fusillade from the assailants. He then telephoned to a neighbor, Mr. Meyer, and on his arrival the men without began firing into the house again, shattering the glass transom and slightly wounding Mr. Meyer. Mr. Lutz returned their fire and they retreated. He then telephoned the sheriff, who, with two deputies, hurried to the scene. They were admitted and the "raiders" entered the house with them, disclosing themselves as prohibition officers and attempting to search the premises. According to our dispatch it was then revealed that they had no search warrant and were not allowed by the officers to proceed.

If this is an accurate description of what occurred, nothing more lawless or high-handed has been staged by enforcement officers under the present régime. It can not be minimized or overlooked, and if the prohibition authorities do not probe it to the bottom the Department of Justice should take it up. If these "dry" agents made this night attack on the home of a citizen in the country, presumably without protection, and with no legal warrant to justify their attempted invasion, they were as much criminals, to all legal intents and purposes, as if they had been bandits or burglars. They have committed an act of criminal violence and should be punished, not merely reprimanded or discharged.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I wish also to have inserted in the RECORD, in 8-point type, extracts from speeches made yesterday in the city of New York by James Speyer, banker; Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor; and James P. Holland, president of the State Federation of Labor of New York, Mr. Holland's speech containing a quotation from a letter written by our good friend the senior Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH]; also an extract from the annual report of Bishop Lawrence, of the Episcopal diocese of Massachusetts, to the diocesan convention on May 3, 1922.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the Washington Post of May 4, 1922.]

CAPITAL AND LABOR UNITE AGAINST DRYS—SPEYER, BANKER, AND GOMPERS DEMAND MODIFICATION AT BIG "WET" RALLY—INSIST CONGRESS MUST HEED—"TERRIBLE MISTAKE MADE," SAYS WADSWORTH—MAXIM CALLS DRYS "MERCILESS PRIESTHOOD."

(By the Associated Press.)

NEW YORK, May 3.—Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, speaking to-night to a crowd that jammed Madison Square Garden in a mass meeting called by the New York branch of the Association Against the Prohibition Amendment, declared that labor "must make the fight now, and we will never stop fighting until the rights of the people have been restored to them."

He was cheered by crowds both inside and outside the big pavilion, for those who could not get into the hall heard the various speakers through voice amplifiers. The meeting was largely attended by members of union labor, representatives of more than 30 labor organizations being present. There also were many men prominent in the city's business and financial circles, who occupied places on the stage. A large part of the audience was composed of women.

"I and the federation I represent," Mr. Gompers said, "are in favor of beer and light wines and against any attempt to enforce sumptuary laws aimed at the personal liberties of our people.

LAYS LOWER MORALITY TO DRYS.

"I have always had faith in the future of my country, but with prohibition I am apprehensive of that future. Temperance was the rule of the great mass of organized labor, but the prohibitionists and the so-called Anti-Saloon League have done more to undermine the morality and temperance of the workingman than any other agency I know.

"I have traveled all over the United States before prohibition, including its so-called dry territories, and to-day as I pass through these sections I find more drunkenness than ever before."

"There are no stronger or more powerful supporters of the Volstead Act than the distillers and bootleggers," Mr. Gompers declared to the accompaniment of vociferous applause. "With the Volstead Act and prohibition replaced by a light wine and beer bill the bootleggers would go out of business."

CALLS SPONSORS VIOLATORS.

Mr. Gompers, declaring that there are "no greater violators of the Volstead Act and the prohibition amendment than those who voted for their enactment," brought his talk down to local issues, saying that of New York's 25 Members of the House of Representatives, more than 20 were absent "from their posts of duty" on the day that the eighteenth amendment was voted on.

Labor's dissatisfaction with the liquor laws was also expressed by James P. Holland, president of the State federation of labor, who also spoke.

Mr. Holland declared that if the Representatives in Congress from New York did not listen to the demands of the people, "others will be put in who would."

"The Congressmen of this State," he said, "must listen to the demand of the citizens of New York, who insist on a modification of the Volstead Act."

"I have here a letter from one New York Senator which shows he still believes in the Constitution of the United States—JAMES W. WADSWORTH."

WADSWORTH SEES "TERRIBLE MISTAKE."

Senator WADSWORTH's letter said, in part:

"Frankly, I think we made a terrible mistake when we inserted a sumptuary law of this kind in the Constitution of the United States. This was a fundamental error. Then we made another mistake when we passed an enforcement act so severe in its provisions that it is proving impossible of enforcement."

James Speyer, banker, who opened the meeting, said what he personally disliked more than anything else about the Volstead Act was that "it is fast degenerating into class legislation, favoring the well to do as against the less fortunate ones of our citizens." He was opposed, he said, to any kind of class legislation.

Hudson Maxim, another speaker, said that "the blue-law fanatics of prohibition are a new priesthood, intolerant and merciless."

BISHOP LAWRENCE DEMANDS FREE SPEECH ON PROHIBITION.

BOSTON, May 3.—Bishop William Lawrence, of the Episcopal diocese of Massachusetts, in his annual report to the diocesan convention to-day asked whether it was not time to recognize the right of every citizen who did not believe in constitutional prohibition to say so, and in public.

"Hundreds of thousands of workingmen who found solace and comradeship after the day's work in what they felt to be their innocent glass of beer had it snatched from them," the bishop said, "and thousands of thousands of reputable citizens found their personal liberties and domestic habits broken in upon.

"Surely it is competent for every citizen to speak, work, and do everything consistent with the law to have a law either amended or rescinded."

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, May 4, 1922.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Unto Thee, O Lord, do we offer our tribute of praise and thanksgiving. Our trust and our hope are in the infinite mercy and goodness of God. In a world so varied, quivering with uncertainty and veiled with mystery, we are so grateful that we have a Father in heaven and in earth who claims us as his own. The days are so packed with thought and so full of purpose. O set us to our high tasks. Do Thou quicken the living, breathing, budding divinity within us. May the hand that holds the earth, the seas, and the stars in their places direct us and establish our work. In Thy holy name we pray. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CONTINUANCE OF CERTAIN GOVERNMENT PUBLICATIONS.

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate Joint Resolution 132, and to insist on the amendments of the House and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate Joint Resolution 132 and to insist on the House amendments and to agree to the conference asked by the Senate. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read the title of Senate Joint Resolution 132, to provide for continuance of certain Government publications.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, has the gentleman from Pennsylvania conferred with the minority member of the Printing Committee about this resolution?

Mr. KIESS. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Is it satisfactory?

Mr. KIESS. Absolutely.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection; and the Speaker appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. KIESS, Mr. JOHNSON of Washington, and Mr. STEVENSON.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. J. Res. 191. Joint resolution favoring the establishment in Palestine of the national home for the Jewish people.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the amendments of the Senate numbered 51 and 58 to the bill (H. R. 10730) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. RICKETTS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bills:

H. R. 10240. An act to extend the time for the construction of a bridge across the Savannah River near Haileys Ferry and between the counties of Anderson, S. C., and Hart, Ga.; and

H. R. 10407. An act authorizing the counties of Jasper, S. C., and Chatham, Ga., to construct a bridge across the Savannah River at or near Savannah, Ga.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate joint resolution of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. J. Res. 191. Joint resolution favoring the establishment in Palestine of the national home for the Jewish people; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

TRIP TO QUANTICO.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, it is with great regret that I have to announce to the Membership of the House that the trip arranged to Quantico for to-morrow has been postponed owing to the condition of the weather. General Lejeune, who is now on the field, reports that the parade ground is a mass of mud, and that the trenches where we were to witness the mimic battle are also a mass of mud, as well as the aviation field, and he feels that the Members would not enjoy the trip if they should take it to-morrow. Therefore, the trip has been postponed, but not canceled, and in a very few days we will make an announcement as to the date when the trip will be made. I wish to make this announcement now, so that no one will go down to-morrow morning expecting to go to Quantico, because the vessel will not be there; but the trip is only postponed.

COMMITTEE ELECTIONS.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of a resolution electing Members of the House to committees.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 343.

Resolved, That JOHN E. NELSON, Member of Congress from the third district of Maine, be, and he is hereby, elected a member of standing committees of the House, as follows: Labor; Flood Control; and Expenditures in the Department of Commerce.

That LEWIS HENRY, Member of Congress from the thirty-seventh district of New York, be, and he is hereby, elected a member of standing committees of the House, as follows: Claims; Insular Affairs; and Expenditures in the Department of Agriculture.

That HENRY A. BALDWIN, Delegate from Hawaii, be, and he is hereby, elected as an additional member of standing committees of the House, as follows: Agriculture; Coinage, Weights, and Measures; Military Affairs; and Territories.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

BUSINESS OF CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

The SPEAKER. Calendar Wednesday business is in order to-day. The Clerk will call the committees.

The Clerk called the Committee on Printing.

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Printing has nothing to present.

The Clerk called the Committee on Ways and Means.

NARCOTICS.

Mr. HADLEY. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Ways and Means, I call up H. R. 2193, to amend section 6 of an act approved January 17, 1914, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to prohibit the importation and use of opium for other than medicinal purposes,' approved February 9, 1909."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make the point of order that this bill was reported as a privileged bill. It affects the revenue, and amends an act pertaining to the revenue, and has a privileged status, and is not in order under the Calendar Wednesday call. I think the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HADLEY] reported the bill from the floor on the 27th of March, and points of order were reserved against it at that time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that he investigated that subject, and was conferred with by members of the Ways and Means Committee as to whether it was privileged or not. Of course, if it is privileged, that committee can call it up some other day. The Chair concludes that it is not privileged; that while, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] says, it relates to the revenue, yet that that is incidental; that the main purpose of the bill is not to raise revenue; and that therefore it is not privileged. Of course, the fact that it was reported from the floor simply indicated what the gentleman reporting it thought at that time.

Mr. WALSH. If the revenue question were only an incidental matter, clearly it would not have been referred to the Committee on Ways and Means. If the principal purpose of the bill was a regulation of commerce, it would have gone where the principal purpose of the bill might seem to indicate.

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Ways and Means reported the Harrison Act. That bill did not come from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. If the Chair should hold that the bill is not in order to-day, he would be in an embarrassing position, because the Chair refused to recognize the Committee on Ways and Means to call up the bill as a privileged matter, on the ground that in his opinion it was not privileged, and that the only way in which the committee could bring it up would be either to get a rule or to bring it up on Calendar Wednesday. So the Chair not only by his individual opinion but by his conduct is bound to rule that the bill is in order to-day. Of course, the House can decide differently if it desires to do so. The Chair overrules the point of order.

This bill is on the Union Calendar, and the House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union; and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] will please take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. WALSH in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 2193) to amend section 6 of an act approved January 17, 1914, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to prohibit the importations and use of opium for other than medicinal purposes,' approved February 9, 1909."

Mr. HADLEY. Mr. Chairman, the committee struck out all of the original bill after the enacting clause and proposes an amendment. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be read in lieu of the original bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent that the committee amendment be read in lieu of the original bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

That sections 1 and 2 of the act entitled "An act to prohibit the importation and the use of opium for other than medicinal purposes," approved February 9, 1909, as amended, are amended to read as follows:

"That when used in this act—

"(a) The term 'narcotic drug' means opium, coca leaves, cocaine, or any salt, derivative, or preparation of opium, coca leaves, or cocaine;

"(b) The term 'United States,' when used in a geographical sense, includes the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia;

"(c) The term 'board' means the Federal narcotics control board established by section 2 of this act; and

"(d) The term 'person' means individual, partnership, corporation, or association.

"SEC. 2. (a) That there is hereby established a board to be known as the 'Federal narcotics control board' and to be composed of the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of Commerce. Except as otherwise provided in this act or by other law, the administration of this act is vested in the Department of the Treasury.

"(b) That it is unlawful to import or bring any narcotic drug into the United States or any territory under its control or jurisdiction, except that such amounts of crude opium and coca leaves as the board finds to be necessary to provide for medical and legitimate uses only may be imported and brought into the United States or such territory under such regulations as the board shall prescribe. All narcotic drugs imported under such regulations shall be subject to the duties which are now or may hereafter be imposed upon such drugs when imported.

"(c) That if any person fraudulently or knowingly imports or brings any narcotic drug into the United States or any territory under its control or jurisdiction, contrary to law, or assists in so doing, or receives, conceals, buys, sells, or in any manner facilitates the transportation, concealment, or sale of any such narcotic drug after being imported or brought in, knowing the same to have been imported contrary to law, such person shall upon conviction be fined not more than $5,000 and imprisoned for not more than 10 years.

"(d) Any narcotic drug imported or brought into the United States or any territory under its control or jurisdiction, contrary to law, shall (1), if smoking opium or opium prepared for smoking, be seized and summarily forfeited to the United States Government without the necessity of instituting forfeiture proceedings of any character; or (2), if any other narcotic drug, be seized and forfeited to the United States Government, without regard to its value, in the manner provided by sections 3075 and 3076 of the Revised Statutes, or the provisions of law hereafter enacted which are amendatory of, or in substitution for, such sections. Any narcotic drug which is forfeited in a proceeding for condemnation or not claimed under such sections, or which is summarily forfeited as provided in this subdivision, shall be placed in the custody of the board and in its discretion be destroyed or delivered to some agency of the United States Government for use for medical or scientific purposes.

"(e) Any alien who at any time after his entry is convicted under subdivision (c) shall, upon the termination of the imprisonment imposed by the court upon such conviction and upon warrant issued by the Secretary of Labor, be taken into custody and deported in accordance with the provisions of sections 19 and 20 of the act of February 5, 1917, entitled 'An act to regulate the immigration of aliens to, and the residence of aliens in, the United States' or provisions of law hereafter enacted which are amendatory of or in substitution for such sections.

"(f) Whenever on trial for a violation of subdivision (c) the defendant is shown to have or to have had possession of the narcotic drug, such possession shall be deemed sufficient evidence to authorize conviction, unless the defendant explains the possession to the satisfaction of the jury.

"(g) The master of any vessel or other water craft, or a person in charge of a railroad car or other vehicle, shall not be liable under subdivision (c) if he satisfies the jury that he had no knowledge of and used due diligence to prevent the presence of the narcotic drug in or on such vessel, water craft, railroad car, or other vehicle; but the narcotic drug shall be seized, forfeited, and disposed of as provided in subdivision (d)."

SEC. 2. That sections 5 and 6 of such act of February 9, 1909, as amended, are amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 5. That no smoking opium or opium prepared for smoking shall be admitted into the United States or into any territory under its control or jurisdiction for transportation to another country, or be transferred or transshipped from one vessel to another vessel within any waters of the United States for immediate exportation or for any other purpose; and except with the approval of the board, no other narcotic drug may be so admitted, transferred, or transshipped.

"SEC. 6. (a) That it shall be unlawful for any person subject to the jurisdiction of the United States Government to export or cause to be exported from the United States, or from territory under its control or jurisdiction, or from countries in which the United States exercises extraterritorial jurisdiction, any narcotic drug to any other country: Provided, That narcotic drugs (except smoking opium and opium prepared for smoking, the exportation of which is hereby absolutely prohibited) may be exported to a country only which has ratified and become a party to the convention and final protocol between the United States Government and other powers for the suppression of the abuses of opium and other drugs, commonly known as the International Opium Convention of 1912, and then only if (1) such country has instituted and maintains, in conformity with that convention, a system, which the board deems adequate, of permits or licenses for the control of imports of such narcotic drugs; (2) the narcotic drug is consigned to an authorized permittee; and (3) there is furnished to the board proof deemed adequate by it that the narcotic drug is to be applied exclusively to medical and legitimate uses within the country to which exported, that it will not be reexported from such country, and that there is an actual shortage of and a demand for the narcotic drug for medical and legitimate uses within such country.

"(b) The Secretary of State shall request all foreign governments to communicate through the diplomatic channels copies of the laws and regulations promulgated in their respective countries which prohibit or regulate the importation and shipment in transit of any narcotic drug and, when received, advise the board thereof.

"(c) The board shall make and publish all proper regulations to carry into effect the authority vested in it by this act."

SEC. 3. That section 8 of such act of February 9, 1909, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 8. (a) That a narcotic drug that is found upon a vessel arriving at a port of the United States or territory under its control or jurisdiction and is not shown upon the vessel's manifest, or that is landed from any such vessel without a permit first obtained from the collector of customs for that purpose, shall be seized, forfeited, and disposed of in the manner provided in subdivision (d) of section 2, and the master of the vessel shall be liable to a penalty equal to the value of the narcotic drug.

"(b) Such penalty shall constitute a lien upon the vessel which may be enforced by proceedings by libel in rem. Clearance of the vessel from a port of the United States may be withheld until the penalty is paid, or until there is deposited with the collector of customs at the port, a bond in a penal sum double the amount of the penalty, with sureties approved by the collector, and conditioned on the payment of the penalty (or so much thereof as is not remitted by the Secretary of the Treasury) and of all costs and other expenses to the Government in proceedings for the recovery of the penalty, in case the master's application for remission of the penalty is denied in whole or in part by the Secretary of the Treasury.

"(c) The provisions of law for the mitigation and remission of penalties and forfeitures incurred for violations of the customs laws shall apply to penalties incurred for a violation of the provisions of this section."

SEC. 4. That such act of February 9, 1909, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof a new section to read as follows:

"SEC. 9. That this act may be cited as the 'narcotic drugs import and export act.'"

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill to amend the act entitled 'An act to prohibit the importation and use of opium for other than medicinal purposes,' approved February 9, 1909, as amended."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington is recognized for one hour.

Mr. HADLEY. Mr. Chairman, this legislation contemplates the further amendment of the existing narcotic laws in three principal respects. There are many incidental points, but the three grand divisions, so to speak, under which the provisions of this bill would classify are, first, the provision for further restraint upon the importation of narcotic drugs as defined in the bill; second, upon their exportation; and third, with respect to the in-transit shipments.

In 1909 Congress passed an act prohibiting the importation of smoking opium but permitting the importation of other classes of opium and their preparations and derivatives for medicinal purposes only and providing penalties, but made no restriction upon the exportation of these commmodities. In 1912 the international opium convention was held at The Hague, in which we assumed certain obligations with respect to the opium traffic.

That convention having been ratified by this Government in 1913, it was followed in 1914 by further legislation on the part of Congress, putting limitations upon imports and exports and perpetuating in effect the importation provision of the law of 1909. But the restrictions placed on the exports, if intended to bring the Government fully within the terms of the international opium convention, failed in some important particulars. To remedy that failure is one of the main purposes of the bill.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HADLEY. I will.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman tell us how this differs from the existing narcotic laws—in what essential?

Mr. HADLEY. Under the existing narcotic laws prepared opium may be imported into this country. The proposal now is to limit the importation to crude opium and coca leaves from which cocaine is derived. This country manufactures all and more than it requires of narcotic drugs for domestic medical and legitimate uses, and it is thought desirable on the part of the committee, in view of the character of the commodities and the well-known illicit traffic in the business and the deleterious effects, that we restrict the importation to crude material in furtherance of our obligation to keep the traffic within the legitimate uses, the medical use in particular. That is one of the outstanding features of the bill.

The exports and imports of narcotic drugs are governed by the act of 1909 as amended by the act of January 17, 1914. The exportation may be made under the present law to any country which regulates the entry of narcotic drugs under such regulations as are prescribed by such country, however ineffectual the regulations or the administration of the regulations may be in that country. In fact, the testimony in the hearings held on the subject in the Sixty-sixth Congress tended to disclose an alarming state of facts as to the diversion of exports from this country into China, and the subsequent return of many exports into our own country.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HADLEY. I will.

Mr. HILL. The effect of this bill should be to greatly decrease the amount of illicit drugs used and the importation.

Mr. HADLEY. It is hoped that that will be the effect.

Mr. HILL. It has always been difficult to prevent the smuggling of opium in a prepared form.

Mr. LAZARO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HADLEY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LAZARO. Did not the hearings bring out the fact that the use of opium has increased among the addicts?

Mr. HADLEY. Undoubtedly; alarmingly so.

Mr. LAZARO. While we all agree that laws of this kind should be enacted in order to decrease the habit, does not the gentleman think that the National Government and the States should make better provision for the cure of these addicts while we are enforcing these laws?

Mr. HADLEY. That may be true; I have not considered that phase of it, as it was not germane to this legislation.

Mr. LAZARO. I know, but I thought I would bring out the fact at this time. The gentleman is aware of the fact that those who use opium as a rule are the poor people who are unable to take treatment.

Mr. HADLEY. The gentleman in his profession is better acquainted with those facts than am I.

Mr. LAZARO. That is true, and the majority of addicts are poor people. They are unable to secure private treatment, and I bring this point out to encourage the National Government in cooperating with the States to make provision to take care of these charitable cases, so that they may be cured.

Mr. HADLEY. I thank the gentleman for that statement.

Mr. BOND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HADLEY. Yes.

Mr. BOND. Did the gentleman find in the hearings that this was a social habit as well as a habit owing to the use of drugs for medicinal purposes?

Mr. HADLEY. The hearings were held in the Sixty-sixth Congress. I am not certain that that point was particularly stressed.

Mr. BOND. Did the gentleman not find that the habit prevails among all classes of people—the wealthy as well as among the poor?

Mr. HADLEY. There was little testimony on that point. There was much testimony upon what we might call the underground peddling of the commodity and the use by addicts through that channel.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HADLEY. Yes.

Mr. LAZARO. I did not mean to say that there were more poor people using it than wealthy people, although I believe there are, because there are more poor people than wealthy people anyway; but the point I wanted to bring out is that as a rule the people who use opium can not hold their jobs, and as a result they become paupers and they can not pay for the treatment. Therefore, if they continue to use it, and they do, they have to violate the law in order to get it, whereas the wealthy addicts can pay for treatment and get cured and become law-abiding citizens.

Mr. BOND. I think that is a very fair statement.

Mr. LAZARO. And I think the Federal Government and the States ought to work hand in hand so that we can cure these people as we go ahead with the enforcement of the law, because a person in the habit of using opium, unless he is cured, will violate the law.

Mr. HADLEY. Mr. Chairman, if I may now proceed with the feature that I had indicated as one of the outstanding purposes of the law, the regulation of the export trade in particular, I wish to incorporate in the RECORD for the information of the committee a statement included in the report on the bill by a representative who appeared at the hearings on the part of the Department of State. He said:

> As the law now stands, it provides that the goods may be exported to countries regulating their entry under such regulations as are prescribed by such country for the importation thereof into said country. Where the country regulates it in any way, whether effectively or not, under this act of Congress I think the officials of the Government would be bound to permit the exportation; yet we know that some countries, while they have regulations and laws on the subject, administer them very loosely, and in order that this illicit traffic might be controlled to a greater extent it was thought that the administrative officials should have greater discretion with respect to the exportation, and if they should find that the regulations of a particular country were not being properly administered, so as to carry out the spirit of The Hague convention, they should be authorized to refuse a permit to export.

Referring to The Hague convention I wish to call attention to a few of the obligations which we assumed as parties to the convention which have not been wholly fulfilled. I shall not refer to others which were fulfilled, I think completely, under the Harrison Narcotic Act and the smoking opium act, neither of which acts are involved here. In passing let me say that this is an amendment of the import and export narcotic drugs act of 1909 as amended by the act of January 17, 1914, and does not touch the Harrison Narcotic Act, the smoking opium act, nor the American pharmacists in China act.

One of the articles of the convention required, in substance, without reading it in detail, that the contracting powers shall enact laws and regulations in such a way as to limit the sale and use of morphine, cocaine, and their respective salts to medical and legitimate uses only, unless they have existing laws already so providing. And that they shall also cooperate among themselves in order to prevent the use of these drugs for any purpose other than a legitimate purpose. Another provision is to the effect that the contracting powers shall use their best efforts to control or cause to be controlled all those who import or export morphine, cocaine, or their respective salts. Another, that they shall proceed to the end that those who manufacture, import, sell, distribute, and export morphine, cocaine, and their respective salts shall be provided with authorization of licenses to carry on these operations or shall make an efficient declaration thereof to the competent authorities. Another provision in article 12 is to the effect that the powers shall use their best efforts to limit the importation of morphine, cocaine, and their respective salts to authorized persons. Further in article 13, to the effect that they shall use their best efforts to adopt or cause to be adopted measures to the end that the exportation of cocaine, morphine, and their respective salts from their countries to the countries of the other contracting powers shall be to those who have received authorizations or permits granted in conformity with the laws or regulations of the importing country.

These provisions have not been adequately met by the terms of existing law. The bill provides in the committee amendment that in the exportation to countries which are parties to the international opium treaty there shall more appear than the mere fact of having become parties to that convention; there shall more appear than the mere fact that the country has also adopted regulations with respect to the exportation. First, it shall further appear that such country has instituted and maintains in conformity with that convention a system which the board deems adequate of permits or licenses for the control of imports of such narcotic drugs. In the second place, it shall further appear that the narcotic drug is consigned to an authorized permittee, and third, that there must be furnished to the board proof deemed adequate by it that the narcotic drug is to be applied exclusively to medical and legitimate uses within the country to which it is exported, that it will not be reexported from such country, and that there is an actual shortage of and a demand for the narcotic drug for medical and legitimate uses within such country.

Those provisions will carry out the spirit and purpose and terms of the obligations assumed in these respects under the international opium convention, but until some such legislation is enacted we are in the position of having assumed these obligations and of not having fulfilled them, and, on the contrary, of having permitted exportation in violation of the spirit of the convention; although in fairness to the present situation it should be said that while some six years elapsed after the ratification of that convention before regulations contemplated by the law of 1914 were approved and put in force by the executive departments charged with that duty, the war intervened, and after the war on the 1st day of May, 1920, such regulations were promulgated and given effect. Since then the difficulties which were complained of upon the hearings when the bill was introduced in the preceding Congress and the conditions which existed at that time have been very much minimized, and the regulations have had a very salutary effect.

But it is the view of the committee that a matter of this gravity, involving the obligation of this Government deliberately assumed, should not rest upon administrative regulation alone, but that the policy to be enforced should be given a firmer legal basis and be expressly incorporated in the law of the land. A third purpose to which I briefly alluded is to regulate in-transit shipments and transshipments. In the present law there is a provision which prohibits the transshipments and in-transit shipments of smoking opium. It does not extend to the other drugs which we define in this bill. The drugs covered in the bill under the terms of the definition are opium, coca leaves, cocaine, or any salt, derivative, or preparation of opium, coca leaves, or cocaine, so when the words "narcotic drugs" appear in the bill that is what they embrace. Under the terms of this amendment the in-transit provisions of the present law are extended so as to include all these narcotic drugs but making in-transit shipments of narcotic drugs other than smoking opium subject to the approval of the board. Great Britain has recently enacted regulatory provisions, among others, governing in-transit shipments and shipments from a foreign country can not be made through Canada or by Canadian roads or by British vessels. We are in the unenviable position of leaving our ports open to the unregulated transshipment through our country of commodities marked pharmaceutical in character, thus making us in a measure parties to the illicit use of so much of these transshipped commodities as may find their way illicitly into other countries than the port of destination.

In this connection I submit the following statement from a paragraph of an article by the China Club of Seattle in reference to in-transit shipments. The China Club of Seattle has been thoroughly informed on this entire subject, and is composed of public-spirited men, who have the best interests not only of our own country but of China at heart. They say:

> The British conscience has already imposed restrictions whereby the drugs can no longer be shipped in British ships nor carried over British or Canadian rails. Hence the value to manufacturers of the privilege of shipping "in bond" across the American Continent over American railroads. This gives them their easiest path into China. Curiously enough their easiest path to their victims in America is via this same route to the Orient. Thanks to our present Harrison law it is well-nigh impossible to procure the drugs in the United States by any lawful means when wanted for unlawful purposes. There is an army of underworld peddlers, who are sucking the lifeblood out of helpless drug addicts, who are already numbered by millions, and out of other millions who are being systematically trained as future victims. These peddlers can get their stock in trade only from supplies which have first been shipped abroad under our present law and then brought back by smuggling into the very seaports from which they originally went out. That is to say, of every shipment abroad of British or American drugs, half goes to poison China and half comes back to poison America. Every steamer that pushes its way into our ports from the Orient brings its hidden quota. Every train and auto that crosses the line from Canada or Mexico is a potential drug carrier.

The committee amendment carries an amendment to section 8 of the existing law, which arises by virtue of a suggestion of the Treasury Department and a court decision. On appeal to the Circuit Court of Appeals of the Ninth Circuit, in the case of United States against Sischo, it was in effect held that the penalty which the Government sought to impose under section 8 on a vessel which brought in unmanifested opium could not be enforced. It is believed that the committee amendment will avoid the results of this decision. The amendment places in the section the penalty for failure to manifest the narcotic drug. The Treasury Department asked that this amendment be made. It suggested a number of amendments, and they have been incorporated in the bill. Every suggestion as to amendments made in the letter from the Secretary of the Treasury found in the report has been incorporated in the committee amendment with one exception, and that is in respect to the disposal of opium that has been seized, other than smoking opium, and in an informal conference with representatives of the Treasury Department the provision of the bill in that respect has been approved.

Extensive hearings were held in subcommittee near the end of the last Congress on the subject of this bill. A bill was reported at that time somewhat similar to this. It carried the basic features of this bill, and the principal material amendments which have been added since were those suggested by the Treasury Department upon reference of the bill to the department for report. In this Congress we held no hearings because of the very recent full hearings which had been held upon the subject. But a subcommittee was appointed to consider the bill. It received some communications and briefs, and all that it received it considered in detail. After a thorough and full review of the entire subject, including the recommendations of the Treasury Department, and considering the approval which the bill has of the State Department, in the particulars wherein it is charged with any responsibility, and of the Department of Commerce as well, the committee has recommended this substitute as drawn, in lieu of the original bill, in the form in which it appears and which it now recommends to the House for enactment.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HADLEY. I will yield briefly.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Does this bill contemplate the seizure of opium without search warrant or must a search warrant be sworn out before seizure can be made?

Mr. HADLEY. The seizure of opium will be had under the provisions of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as in the case of the seizure of any other dutiable articles coming in, and the committee has applied the provisions of certain sections of the Revised Statutes, to which the gentleman can make reference. Those provisions contemplate condemnation. A party who has any right, title, or interest in the article, if it be legitimate, and he desires to show his title, may make claim, after publication on the part of the Government is made, with a view to establishing his right. Meantime, he puts up a bond, the amount of which is forfeited in the case condemnation succeeds.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. That is the information I wanted.

Mr. HADLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. OLDFIELD].

Mr. OLDFIELD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I do not know that I will be able to add anything to what the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HADLEY] has said on this bill. It comes from the committee as a unanimous report. As is well known, the Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee do not oppose good legislation proposed by the committee. We feel this is good legislation. I was not a member of the subcommittee when the hearings were held in 1920 and 1921. The distinguished Democratic member of the committee at that time was the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. Henry T. Rainey, one of the ablest men who ever served in this House. But I have given this bill a good deal of thought and study, and I feel that there ought not to be any votes against it.

The main feature of the bill to me is the fact that we have established a board to control the narcotic traffic in America. That board is composed of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of State, and the Secretary of Commerce. They keep their hands upon this traffic from the time it comes into this country. It can not legally come into the country unless they say so; narcotics can not get out of the country unless this board says so, and that board is composed of the executive officers of the Government who ought to know and who will know as much as can be known about this traffic.

Now, gentlemen, the main idea, of course, is to prohibit as far as it is humanly possible the illegitimate traffic in narcotic drugs, and in some parts of the country, and especially, it seems, on the Pacific coast, it is a very serious menace. There, it seems, the bootleggers in narcotics are even more prevalent than bootleggers in liquor, and, of course, it is much more detrimental to the health of the people, because it has been said by distinguished gentlemen that when a person has one or two hypodermic shots of these narcotics he almost invariably becomes an addict. Therefore it is a serious question.

Now, the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. WILLIAMSON], I think it was, asked the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HADLEY] a question just now about the confiscation of these narcotics when they are illegitimately possessed. The Government takes charge and confiscates them, just as they ought to do. However, there are provisions in the bill permitting the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Secretary of State—and I know of no greater board that could be established in this country than one composed of those three Secretaries, either under this administration or under future administrations—to have charge of it. I certainly think that those great executive officers ought to be able to control the situation, and it ought to be controlled.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. OLDFIELD. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. I would like to know whether any figures were produced before your committee showing whether there had been an increase in this surreptitious introduction of drugs into this country since the Volstead Act went into effect?

Mr. OLDFIELD. I will state to the gentleman that if there was it was not when I was present. I was not a member of the subcommittee when the hearings were had. I came in after the 4th of March, 1921, after Mr. Henry T. Rainey, of Illinois, went out. I did not hear the testimony. I have read as much as I have had the opportunity and time to read. I was present at several private hearings when officers representing the Secretary of State and the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of Commerce were present, and I do not think that question was raised. I will say that I would not be surprised if that was true, because I can well imagine that if an addict of the liquor habit could not get liquor he would get narcotics if he could. I stand here in the position of wanting to suppress both illegitimate propositions. I would suppress the one and also suppress the other. I think the gentleman would promptly agree with me. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. HADLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WATSON].

Mr. WATSON. Mr. Chairman, opium was known to the ancients and the poppy cultivated for a narcotic long before the Christian era. Half a century, United States has cooperated with other countries to suppress the abuse and sale of opium save for medicinal purposes. It is creditably stated that one named Clendenyn, as late as 1868, was the first white man to smoke opium in the United States. The habit of opium smoking since then has spread to every part of our country. An estimate from official reports indicates that 1,000,000 people, perhaps 4,000,000, within our realm are opium addicts, bringing to themselves physical and mental degeneracy. They are numbered among the rich as well as the poor; those who move in the highest social sphere, and those who play their part in the dark dens of iniquity. The opium habit is easy to acquire. The lost-to-the-world charm holds the novice until he falls a victim to its power. The opium smoker may stop and be cured of the evil without deleterious effect, but the opium eater becomes a lifelong slave to the drug. The enchanting sensation, combined with the weird and fascinating mental delight, where nerves are mesmerized into an ecstacy of physical insensibility and the mind ravished with beautiful and placid memories—no wonder that one in moments of agonizing pain or deep sorrow seeks its bewitching and captivating influences. The addict not only impoverishes his family but becomes a useless citizen, and thus it behooves Congress to enact more effective laws regulating the importation and uses of narcotics, thereby hastening the abatement of the opium habit, which left to its course might place the continuity of our Nation in jeopardy. [Applause.]

The importation of opium greatly increased until 1894, when 726,000 pounds reached our country, far more than needed for the apothecary. The several treaties between the United States and other countries and the act of February 9, 1909, which prohibited its importation and uses except for medical purposes, were not broad enough. Therefore, the act of January 17, 1914, in order to prevent smuggling, attempted to reach all persons on board of any vessel or railroad car to or from the United States having in possession any smoking opium or opium prepared for smoking.

It further provides that it shall be unlawful to export opium, cocaine, or salts, or preparations thereof, to any other country, except under such regulations prescribed by the country admitting the drug. Another act of the same date provided for the regulation of the manufacture of smoking opium within the United States. The act of December 17, 1914, effective March 1, 1915, was far-reaching, but it failed to provide for the illicit use of drugs and no limitation as to the amount sold.

The international opium convention held at The Hague in 1911, represented by all nations of the world, met for the purpose to suppress the abuses of opium. Its proceedings were ratified January 23, 1912. The conference provided for international regulations concerning the abuses of opium and its derivatives.

The measure under consideration provides regulations wherein the law is deficient. It creates a board, to be known as the "Federal narcotic board," to be composed of the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of Commerce, who control the importation of the amount of crude opium and coca leaves for medicinal purposes. Any person importing narcotic drugs contrary to law shall be fined $5,000 and no more than 10 years' imprisonment; that no smoking opium or opium prepared for smoking shall be admitted; that it is unlawful for any person subject to the jurisdiction of the United States to export from the United States any narcotic drug to any country which has ratified and become a party to the convention for the suppression of drugs.

In order to show the effect of the laws passed, the Federal reports indicate that in 1911, 613,899 pounds of opium, containing 9 per cent and over of morphine, were imported, and in 1921 only 101,660 pounds. The exports increased until 1921. In 1912 only 648 pounds of opium were exported, but in 1920, 127,248 pounds, and in 1921 the exports were reduced to 3,480 pounds, and only 253 pounds the six months ended December 31, 1921.

I insert a table showing the importation and exportation of opium from 1911 to 1921, inclusive; also a letter from the Director of the Department of Commerce concerning the same:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
BUREAU OF FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC COMMERCE.
Washington, March 11, 1922.

Hon. HENRY W. WATSON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Supplementing my letter of March 9 on the subject of narcotics, you will be interested to note that the matter of control in international traffic in narcotics has been aided by the joint regulations agreed upon April 26, 1920, by the Secretaries of State, Treasury, and Commerce (under sec. 6, act approved January 7, 1914). These regulations limit the exportation of opium and cocaine and any salts, derivatives or preparation of either, to those countries which have laws regulating the handling of narcotic drugs. Exportation is permitted only upon proper certification as to the qualifications of the purchaser. Whether or not these regulations have alone been responsible for the decrease in exportation of narcotics it is not possible to say, but you will note from the table already furnished you that there has been a notable decrease in exportation during the last year. Opium exports during the whole year 1921 amounted to 3,480 pounds, but only 253 pounds were exported during the last six months of the year. These facts are significant in view of the often-repeated assertion that the United States is in some way to blame for allowing exports of narcotics to reach China.

Very truly yours,

JULIUS KLEIN, Director.

That the drug habit has increased since the abolition of alcohol as a beverage is generally denied. The statement, however, of Mr. Bird S. Coler, commissioner of public welfare of New York, calls to the attention of the public that since the eighteenth amendment the number of drug addicts treated in New York hospitals has greatly increased. I insert a statement published by the Associated Press:

DRUG ADDICTS INCREASE IN DRY ERA, SAYS COLER—ALCOHOLISM, LIKEWISE, IS SHOWN MORE PREVALENT BY FIGURES OF BROOKLYN COMMISSIONER.

NEW YORK, March 3 (by the Associated Press).—A tremendous increase in drug addiction in Brooklyn since prohibition became a law was shown in figures given out to-day by Bird S. Coler, commissioner of public welfare. He set the blame primarily upon the dry laws and the manner of their enforcement. Alcoholism also has increased since the eighteenth amendment was adopted, the figures disclosed.

Bootleggers, the commissioner asserted, have worked under semiprotection, inasmuch as Government officials have "at no time been sincere in the enforcement of the law and in treating spirituous liquors as drugs and medicines.

"When the Government," he said, "instead of using legitimate dispensaries of drugs to dispense whisky, gave licenses to former saloon keepers to sell whisky for medicinal purposes the world knew we were not sincere, and the bootleggers got on the job and high society was safe."

The commissioner's figures gave the number of drug addicts discharged from the Kings County Hospital in 1918 as 116, while in 1921 a total of 961 persons were treated. Alcoholism cases grew from 1,145 to 1,168 in the same period.

Commissioner Coler said the only remedy for the spread of drug addiction seemed to him to be modification of the Volstead law to permit use of light wines and beer. He said that for the first few months under prohibition it seemed the millenium had come, as there was an almost perpendicular drop in every kind of dependency, but that "condition began to change as soon as the public decided that the law was not to be obeyed."

And quote therefrom:

The commissioner's figures gave the number of drug addicts discharged from the Kings County hospital in 1918 as 116, while in 1921 a total of 961 persons were treated.

Showing an increase of nearly 900 per cent. Whether or not this increase can be attributed to prohibition, I leave to individual judgment.

A recent statement reveals that in India alone 654,920 acres are under poppy culture, the harvest far in excess of the needs for medical uses. The value of the drug tempts the sinister to smuggle it around the world. The police force of our country can not prevent its illegal entry into the United States, especially from Canada, Mexico, and Cuba. Seven millions of dollars were appropriated last year to enforce the eighteenth amendment, yet this vast amount does not accomplish the purpose. Two hundred thousand dollars is the only fund available to prevent smuggling and other frauds perpetrated against the Government. It becomes Congress so far as laws can provide, to regulate the legitimate importation and exportation of narcotics in order to prevent the increase of addicts and assist other countries to control its use except for medicinal purposes.

I quote from a publication which appeared some days ago in the Washington Star:

GET $50,000 DRUGS—HOLD TWO—OFFICERS BELIEVE PART OF BIG "RING" WAS LOCATED IN BALTIMORE.

BALTIMORE, March 15.—Narcotic drugs estimated to be worth $50,000 were seized, and two arrests of alleged narcotic sellers were made to-day by agents of the narcotic bureau of the Internal Revenue Department and local police. Cimino and Joseph Pappa were placed under arrest.

Most of the drugs were found in the grocery store of Charles Cimino. Federal agents declare that with the arrest of the two men one of the branches of an international narcotic ring was uncovered.

Also one from the Washington Evening Star of April 20, 1922:

$200,000 OPIUM SEIZED.

SAN FRANCISCO, April 20.—A contraband shipment of 14,000 tins of opium and other drugs valued at $200,000 was seized to-day on the China Mail Co. liner Nanking. The Nanking arrived from the Far East April 16.

The seizure was one of the biggest in the history of the port of San Francisco.

Thousands of pounds of opium are yearly smuggled into the United States, and I am informed by physicians that addicts have no trouble in obtaining narcotic drugs from underground passages.

I hope the bill will be favorably considered in order that it will be more difficult for addicts to obtain narcotics, and thus prevent the spread of drug addiction, not only in the United States, but throughout the world. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD as part of my remarks the statement of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue covering his observations and the work of the Internal Revenue Bureau on narcotics. It is rather long, but the information therein is of great interest and valuable as a record.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks as indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the statement referred to:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF COMMISSIONER OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, March 22, 1922.

Hon. HENRY W. WATSON,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. WATSON: Further reference is made to your letter of March 10, 1922, in which you state that you are preparing a bill regulating the importation of opium and its derivatives and desire information concerning the quantities of narcotics smuggled into this country, the number of addicts in the United States and foreign countries, and such detailed information which this office may have as will be of value in presenting the bill to the House.

The importation and exportation of opium, cocaine, etc., are primarily governed by the act of February 9, 1909, as amended by an act of January 17, 1914, and the regulations issued thereunder, the administration of which comes within the jurisdiction of customs officers. However, the officers of this bureau in enforcing the provisions of the internal revenue narcotic laws have had occasion to observe the general results obtaining under all the Federal laws designed to control the traffic in narcotic drugs and preparations. In response to your request it therefore seems proper for this office to present to you a statement covering its observations and the work of internal revenue narcotic officers.

The following statistics relative to the enforcement of the Harrison narcotic law are presented for your information.

Statistics relative to the enforcement of the Harrison narcotic law.

Cases against unregistered persons which are reported dropped were cases in which insufficient evidence was secured in order to obtain convictions. The cases against registered persons reported dropped include those where violation consisted in failure to register and pay special tax within the required time. Such cases are usually considered dropped when the tax and specific penalty have been paid.

Violations of the law by unregistered persons are invariably of criminal character. Cases against registered persons which are not dropped also involve criminal liabilities.

The following are the latest comparative statistics showing by semi-annual periods the number of violations of criminal nature reported by internal-revenue narcotic agents:

The following statement is submitted showing the collections under the Harrison narcotic law since 1916 with the annual cost of its enforcement:

Fiscal year.	Collections under the Harrison narcotic law.	Cost of enforcing the Harrison narcotic law.
1916	$244,897.07	$288,552.32
1917	276,910.53	289,397.60
1918	185,358.93	279,033.42
1919	726,136.79	270,921.53
1920	1,513,919.50	460,827.24
1921	1,170,291.32	598,826.32

You will recall that the Harrison narcotic law was amended by the revenue act of 1918, effective February 25, 1919, imposing additional special taxes upon persons required to register and a stamp tax of 1 cent per ounce upon all taxable narcotic products imported into or produced in the United States and sold. This amendment of the law accounts principally for the increase in collections for the years 1919, 1920, and 1921. The appropriations for the latter two years were also increased to an annual limit of $750,000.

This office is unable to advise you as to the quantity of narcotic drugs smuggled into the United States, but it is certain that the quantity of drugs smuggled within recent years has increased. A few years ago narcotic drugs which came into the possession of the Government through the enforcement of the narcotic laws were largely of domestic manufacture. At the present time a large percentage of the drugs seized have been smuggled into the country. The increase in smuggling has no doubt been caused by the scarcity of domestic products in illegitimate channels. The added control over the production and sale of domestic products obtained through the monthly returns rendered by manufacturers and wholesale dealers under the Harrison narcotic law as amended is chiefly responsible for this scarcity. Through examination of these returns this bureau has been enabled not only to secure complete accountability for all narcotic drugs and preparations imported, manufactured, or sold, but also to keep all purchases made by every person dispensing or dealing therein under close surveillance.

A complete system of abstracting from these returns all purchases has been recently completed in this office with a view to inspection or investigation of all cases where unduly large quantities are being secured. During the past three months 153 investigations of registered retail dealers and physicians have been directed by this office. Of these reports have been received in 21 cases, 16 of which charged violation of the law, 3 involved registered persons who were addicts and agreed to a discontinuance of their narcotic businesses, while only 2 reports showed no violations. The remaining 132 cases have not been investigated to date, due to insufficient field force. The economy of the system afforded is readily recognized. It makes possible inspection and investigation when necessary and avoids it when unnecessary.

Up to the present time the internal revenue narcotic field force has been concerned chiefly with the traffic in narcotics by persons not qualified under the Harrison law. You will note that the number of violations of the law by unregistered persons for the last six months of the past calendar year is practically twice the number of violations reported for the same six months of 1920, and that the number of convictions obtained thereunder during the last six months of the calendar year 1921 was practically three times as great as the number obtained during the same six months of 1920. As above stated, these violations in a large number of cases involved smuggled drugs. In this connection your attention is invited to section 1 of the act of February 9, 1909, as amended by an act of January 17, 1914, which provides in effect that it shall be unlawful to import into the United States opium in any form or any preparations or derivatives thereof except for medicinal purposes under regulations which the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to prescribe and which were promulgated in T. D. 34221.

Your attention is also invited to section 6 of said act, as amended, which provides in effect that it shall be unlawful to export narcotic drugs, except to countries regulating their entry thereinto, and provides for the promulgation of regulations governing exports by the Secretaries of State, the Treasury, and Commerce. These regulations were promulgated under date of April 26, 1920, and were made effective May 1, 1920 (T. D. 38381). The system thereby established for the control of exportations of narcotic drugs and preparations is in conformity with existing international agreements, exportation now being made only to those countries which have proper laws and regulations governing the importation thereof. You will note a marked decrease in both imports and exports of opium in 1921 as compared with the immediate preceding years. This decrease, in the opinion of this office, is due to the operation of the export regulations and to the effect of the accountability required through the monthly returns to which reference has already been made.

Although it is conceded that the smuggling of narcotic drugs into the United States is a serious menace, it is the opinion of this office that present Federal laws are sufficient under which administrative action may be taken, and is now being taken in so far as possible, looking toward the complete control of the traffic and the elimination of smuggling. It obviously would not prevent smuggling, which is under existing statutes illegal, to enact additional legislation in effect further holding it to be unlawful. It will, of course, be necessary under existing laws or others which may be passed to increase both internal revenue and customs forces in order to eliminate smuggling, illegitimate selling, and illegal exportation of narcotic drugs and preparations. Present customs and internal revenue forces provided for the narcotic work are inadequate. The ultimate result will depend entirely upon the resources made available for this purpose.

With reference to the number of addicts in the United States and foreign countries, you are advised that no authoritative statistics are available showing this number, although the number, as estimated by various observers, has ranged from 200,000 to 4,000,000. This office does not believe that at the present time there are any means available upon which a very accurate estimation could be based. The special committee of investigation appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury, in its report dated April 15, 1919, concluded that at that time the number of addicts in this country probably exceeded 1,000,000.

A copy of the annual report for 1921 has been forwarded to you under separate cover as requested.

It is hoped that the information herein presented may be of assistance to you in considering any proposed legislation relative to the traffic in narcotic drugs.

Sincerely yours,

D. H. BLAIR, Commissioner.

Mr. HADLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the author of the bill, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. MILLER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it is not my purpose unduly to detain the House in the consideration of this measure, which I consider to be a very, very important one. I take it that the House is in a mood to vote, and I shall not undertake to delay it. I feel, however, that just a few words from me may be appropriate.

Prior to the International Opium Convention of 1912 the civilized world became alarmed at the spread of the use of narcotics. A convention was called at The Hague in 1911, to which this country was a party, undertaking to devise ways and means by which this peril to our civilization could be averted and humanity saved from it. The leading nations of the earth took part, as every one of them recognized that the remedy could only come through a world-wide movement. In the meantime that great country of China, which was living under a curse from the use of opium by its people, was undertaking to heal itself of this vice.

The other nations, recognizing the fact that they introduced the habit into China and encouraged it for the profit there was in it to them, set about to aid the people of China and incidentally to save themselves. So the International Opium Convention met. This country was a party to it. In so far as it could, that convention made opium prepared for smoking an outlaw of commerce throughout the world. But opium prepared for smoking is not the only narcotic curse of mankind. In late years the use of morphine and cocaine has spread until it is now equally alarming to the civilized world as opium was in its day.

Mr. GENSMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. GENSMAN. Realizing the fact that the gentleman from Washington, the author of this bill, is probably one of the best-informed men on this subject, I want to ask the gentleman whether or not in his opinion the provisions of The Hague treaty entered into by the countries represented at The Hague convention are fulfilled in the entire spirit of the treaty—that is to say, so far as is possible for legislation to do? I want to say to the gentleman that I am in full accord with the gentleman's bill, and I appreciate the fact that I have an opportunity to vote on the bill and to vote for it.

Mr. MILLER. It is my judgment that the bill as perfected by the committee, which is now before the House, conforms in rounded measure to the final protocol of The Hague convention. It goes even further. The salutary feature of this bill is the exporting clause.

The bill organizes the Federal narcotic control board, composed of three principal Cabinet officers, under whose supervision the importation and exportation features of the narcotic program are to be enforced. There are ample provisions in the authority of that board for the supply to the medical profession not only of this country but the other countries of the world, but we want it understood that when morphine, cocaine, or opium are exported they shall be for medical use only, and we want to announce to the world that no nation shall have one ounce of American manufactured narcotics except for medical use, and that American law shall follow these drugs to the farthermost points of the earth. [Applause.]

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MILLER. I certainly yield to my friend from Missouri.

Mr. DYER. As I understand it, the great trouble about this matter heretofore has been the importation of those drugs into this country not for use here but for the purpose of sending them on to Japan and to China. I attended a conference in Peking two years ago when this very question was up and considered, and the danger was pointed out there at that time that the use of opium in China was largely due to the fact that it was first brought to this country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. HADLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to my colleague.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington is recognized for 10 minutes more.

Mr. DYER. The Chinese and others claim over there that they are trying to put an end to this terrible abuse—and the situation has not been entirely remedied in China by any means, although it is much better—claim that opium was coming into this country from European countries and only passed through the United States, and finally reached those who were selling it to the Chinese. Can the gentleman state if, in his judgment, this legislation is enacted into law, it will prevent that?

Mr. MILLER. It will prevent it so far as possible by the laws of this country.

Mr. DYER. The gentleman knows that there are two or three concerns in this country that do or have been doing this very thing. One of them is said to be located in Philadelphia.

Mr. MILLER. I think that condition will be effectively blocked by the enactment of this legislation.

Mr. DYER. If the gentleman's bill will put an end to that surreptitious transfer of this stuff from European countries through the United States to China and Japan for sale in China he will be doing the world one of the greatest benefits that has been done in many years with reference to this matter. The Chinese people are anxious to be rid of the thing which has done them more harm than anything else.

The better element over there—the intelligent element and all those who understand the situation—are doing everything they can to keep these drugs from the class of Chinese who are being imposed upon. I am glad the legislation is here, and I am sure from the gentleman's statement that it will do much good.

Mr. MILLER. As I said, the entire narcotic program from the importation and exportation angles is placed in the hands of the Federal Narcotic Control Board. No narcotic drugs can be exported from this country except to a country that has approved the final protocol of The Hague Convention, commonly known as the International Opium Convention of 1912, and then only where, in the opinion of our Federal Narcotic Control Board, that country has an adequate and efficient system of control which limits the use of these narcotic drugs to medical purposes, and they can not be exported except where there is a shortage in that foreign country for medical uses.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WATSON] has given you some very interesting figures showing the amount of opium and its derivatives, of which morphine is the principal one, that have been exported and imported. The amount is astounding. Whether or not it be true, as stated by some, that the drug habit has increased since we have had national prohibition of liquors, I do not know; but I do know that every man and woman, whether a wet, a dry, or a "don't care," will welcome any law, any regulation, anything which will lessen the drug habit, and, what is more, lessen the number of peddlers and traffickers.

Now, gentlemen, let me point out some of the provisions of this bill. Opium and its principal derivative, morphine, are not the only narcotic drugs which are threatening the world. Cocaine, that violent substance becoming so common in its use as to promise the outclassing of morphine in popularity among the addicts, is manufactured from coca leaves.

The act defines narcotic drugs to be "opium, coca leaves, cocaine, or any salt derivative or preparation of opium, coca leaves, or cocaine." Thus the two principal narcotic drugs now becoming so common in use are placed under the ban. The Federal Narcotics Control Board, composed of the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of Commerce, is created. Thus we bring into being in one body three of the great administrative departments of the Government. The stamping out of the illicit traffic is well worthy of the efforts of our highest and best men. This board regulates what amount of crude opium and coca leaves are necessary to be imported in order that enough of the raw material be manufactured into drugs to supply the needs of the medical profession.

This raw material is to be imported under such rules as the board shall prescribe. Thus the amount may be increased or diminished from time to time as the medical necessities require. No imports are permitted except as the board directs. Any person who fraudulently or knowingly imports or brings any of these narcotic drugs into the United States or any Territory under its control or jurisdiction contrary to law or facilitates the unlawful bringing in or who receives, buys, sells, or assists in so doing, knowing the same to have been brought in contrary to law, is subject to a fine of not more than $5,000 and imprisonment not to exceed 10 years. The present penalty is doubled, and carries with it imprisonment in every case of conviction for a length of time not more than 10 years. Right here comes in an important addition to the existing law so far as it relates to aliens. Every alien who is convicted is to be deported as an undesirable citizen at the termination of his imprisonment. This provision I look upon as especially salutary. Now, there is another important feature in the nature of a rule of evidence which provides that if the defendant is shown to have or to have had possession of the drug such fact shall be sufficient evidence to authorize conviction. In other words, the defendant must prove his possession to be lawful; he can not stand silent and get the benefit of the presumption of innocence. We have had quite enough of these illicit peddlers and traffickers standing with silent tongues in our courts, and we likewise have had quite enough of aliens charged and convicted repeatedly only to resume their detestable business when the prison doors swing open. One thing Mr. Alien must understand and understand now, and that is he must keep out of trafficking in illicit drugs if he expects to remain in the United States. America will not longer burden itself with this miserable class of scalawags and blacklegs.

The bill provides that opium prepared for smoking shall not under any circumstances be received into the United States or into any territory under its control or jurisdiction for the purpose of being transported to another country nor shall this special drug be transferred or transshipped from one vessel to another in American waters. Other narcotic drugs may be so transported or transshipped under such regulations as the board shall establish.

This closes out the transshipment of opium for smoking purposes but permits the board to regulate transshipments of other narcotic drugs which are useful in the medical profession in order that these so-called "medical drugs" may be hastened to any country where emergency exists for medical use.

Now, gentlemen, we come to the export feature of the bill, which was the subject covered in the original bill. As the law now stands Americans can and do export these narcotic drugs, except opium prepared for smoking, to foreign countries, provided those countries have any regulations governing these imported drugs. These regulations of the foreign country may be lax or strict, may be loose, vague, and indefinite, or they may be rigorous and severe. If they have any regulations of whatever character, the present law permits such exportation. To illustrate, Japan has regulations, but under Japanese laws narcotic drugs imported into Japan for transshipment into other countries are not construed as "imports" within either its customs laws or regulations. The results of existing conditions are that vast quantities of narcotics, except smoking opium, are exported from this country into Japan, and from Japan sent on into China or else smuggled back into the United States and peddled to our own people. By this means the people of China are being degraded by the use of these drugs and the business exploited by unscrupulous dealers and traffickers to such a degree as to shock the world. The people of China have long suffered from the habit of smoking opium. Within late years that nation has made one of the most noble efforts in the world's history to shake its people from this vicious and degrading habit. The nation is striving by every means to cleanse itself, but what permanent progress can it make when a trafficker in other drugs, equally loathsome and degrading in their effects, stands ready at hand able to not only supply but to encourage its people in their use? The use of morphine and cocaine is simply taking the place of the old vice of smoking opium. Another angle, if you please: When these drugs arrive in Japan they become instantly the subject of a very profitable traffic back into the United States. God knows this traffic is becoming alarming, and its real basis is the unrestrained imports into Japan and other countries where the regulations are loose and ineffective, making them practically no regulations at all.

Now, gentlemen, give me your attention and I shall attempt to explain how this measure will cure this condition as far as our country is concerned. The bill prohibits any narcotic drug to be exported from this country into any country which has not become a party to and abides by the final protocol of the International Opium Convention of 1912, known as The Hague Convention. But this is not all. This law provides that even if the receiving country is a party to The Hague Convention it must have instituted and must maintain in conformity with that convention a system which our own Federal Narcotics Control Board deems adequate, of permits and licenses for the control of drugs so imported. Thus this board—this American institution created by this act—is to say under what conditions these drugs are to go abroad and what the importing nation is going to do with them; not that these dangerous drugs shall be sent to a country and then that country can do with them as it pleases, but the importing country must satisfy this American board that it has a system of control adequate to absolutely stop the world-wide existing abuse. Nor is this all. Before any narcotic drug can be exported from this country into another the importing country must furnish our American board proof which it deems adequate that the drugs will be used for medicinal purposes only within such country; that they will not be reexported from such country, and that there is an actual shortage of and a demand for the narcotic drug for medical and legitimate uses within such country.

Could any law in any country be better calculated to stop the illicit traffic of narcotic drugs into China and the alarming and detestable smuggling back into our own country and unto our own people?

England and the United States furnish practically the world's supply of narcotic drugs. England, by its dangerous-drugs act of 1920, controls in drastic manner its institutions and its nationals engaged in the manufacture and sale of narcotic drugs. This act will unite the two leading nations of the world in an undertaking to effecutally stamp out the nefarious traffic by nationals of countries less interested in the world's progress and welfare. In my judgment this act will accomplish untold benefits not only to our people but to people of other countries as well. It is world wide in its effect.

This act has attracted attention, not only throughout this country but in China, of those interested in the welfare of the Chinese. In this latter connection please permit me to read at least two cablegrams bearing out this statement:

SHANGHAI, CHINA, February 7, 1922.

Hon. WESLEY L. JONES, Senate,
Hon. JOHN F. MILLER, House,
Washington:

We wish to express to you the deep appreciation of the Chinese people for the bill now pending in Congress under your name for the prohibition of the unlawful use of narcotics and to request that you will energetically push the bill through, with a view to the ultimate and complete extinction of the traffic and manufacture.

CHINESE GENERAL CHAMBER OF COMMERCE, Shanghai.

PEKING, CHINA, March 11, 1921.

Congressman JOHN F. MILLER,
Washington, D. C.:

Since Miller-Jones bill dealing with exportation and transportation of opium and derivatives is of greatest importance to China, International Opium Association, Peking, and Peking Missionary Association respectfully urge acceptance by Congress.

The Honolulu Ad Club in a most energetic communication commended the legislation, while in this country hundreds, indeed thousands, of societies and citizens have signified their interest in the measure by expressions of uniform and unbroken approval.

This act has no relation to the Harrison Drug Act. That deals solely with the distribution and prevents the unrestrained dispensing of narcotic drugs to addicts in the United States. It in nowise covers the field of exportation, transshipments, and in-transit shipments, nor does it deal with importation.

In conclusion let me pay my profound respects to my colleague the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HADLEY], the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WATSON], and the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. OLDFIELD], the members of the subcommittee of the Ways and Means Committee who with infinite care and singular ability have covered in their research every phase of our import and export laws.

The original bill which dealt with the one subject of remedial export legislation has been broadened, strengthened, and vitalized into a rounded, completed measure well calculated to stand out as one of the most effective, far-reaching constructive acts of its kind in the legislative history of our country.

The CHAIRMAN. There being no Member desiring recognition in opposition to the bill, the Clerk will read the bill for amendment under the rule.

The Clerk read the committee amendment as above set forth.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of making an inquiry with regard to section (e) on page 6, the deportation provision. I notice that it calls for the deportation of violators of this narcotic act as amended under the provisions of sections 19 and 20 of the act of February 5, 1917, entitled "An act to regulate the immigration of aliens to, and the residence of aliens in, the United States" or provisions of law hereafter enacted which are amendatory of, or in substitution for, such sections.

Mr. HADLEY. The construction of that language, as the committee understands it, is that the act of February 5, 1917, would have application until it was subsequently modified by amendatory legislation, and that then in that case the amending legislation would apply.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Would the gentleman object to changing the word "hereafter" in line 16 to "thereafter"?

Mr. HADLEY. That would destroy the purpose and effect of the language as framed. I think the interpretation of the language would not be clear if that word were used. This provides that the deportation shall be in accordance with the provisions of certain sections of the existing law, or in accordance with the provisions of the law hereafter enacted.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. So anything that might be enacted hereafter but prior to the enactment of this particular legislation would not be covered and there would be a hiatus if this was enacted hereafter?

Mr. HADLEY. If that situation should arise, that could be taken care of as between the two bills in the course of the legislation.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I shall not press the matter. I would, however, call attention to the fact that it seems to be becoming quite popular to introduce incidental clauses pertaining to immigration matters in bills covering other matters.

Mr. HADLEY. Let me say to my colleague that this provision was prepared and, I think, reported before the partially analogous provision in the immigration bill which the House considered some time ago. This has also been suggested by the Treasury Department.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Of course, I indorse this provision and this attempt to deport certain lines of violators of the narcotic laws of the United States.

Mr. HADLEY. In this case we are dealing with an amendment to an importation and exportation statute, and not dealing with our internal affairs, whereas the gentleman in his bill is dealing both with internal and external questions.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I did not refer to any particular legislation on this subject or to my bill, but I note that matters of immigration and naturalization and deportation are creeping into other legislation. I have reference to the matter of immigration legislation proposed as a side line in the shipping bill, and I desire to call attention that such proposed immigration legislation has been and is still being considered in the Committee on Immigration, and that the Committee on the Merchant Marine can save time probably by studying the printed hearings of the committee which properly has jurisdiction of the subject.

Mr. HADLEY. The gentleman will concede that this is a very important provision in this bill in contemplation of dealing with cases of aliens who have violated our narcotic drugs import laws?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I agree thoroughly with my colleague. I want this provision carried in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking a question of the Committee on Ways and Means, who have had this matter under consideration.

There is a resolution pending before the Committee on Rules asking for an investigation into the administration of the narcotic law. It is claimed by the proponents of that resolution that the administration of the law has entirely departed from the law itself, that regulations have been made that are entirely foreign to the original purposes of the law, and that these regulations control in the administration of the law. Have these matters been called to the attention of the Committee on Ways and Means during the hearings on this bill or at any other time?

Mr. HADLEY. Not in the way that the gentleman states the matter. I did not know that there had been any complaint of that character at all.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Three or four physicians called upon me day before yesterday and made a complaint of that character, and the resolution pending, introduced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. VOLK], is to the effect that the law is not being administered under the letter or the spirit of its enactment.

Mr. HADLEY. The regulations under the act of January 17, 1914, which are involved here and are the only ones which would be involved in connection with the pending bill, are set out in the hearings on this bill or the one in the Sixty-sixth Congress which preceded it. These regulations are full and complete. I have never thoroughly analyzed them with respect to their conforming to the authority of the existing law, and the attention of the committee has not been called to any discrepancy.

In a general way, not perhaps in all the details, these regulations lay down a policy with respect to imports and exports of narcotic drugs that we recommend be incorporated by way of permanent law through the enactment of this bill. There is another set of regulations with which I am not familiar, as it was not involved here, being the regulations employed in the administration of the Harrison narcotic act. Possibly those may be the regulations to which the complaint in question applies.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The complaint is made that reputable physicians in the practice of their profession are under the constant surveillance of agents of the department. If they administer morphine to a patient with an incurable disease, with a cancer that can not be operated on—if morphine, which is apparently the only relief for that patient, is administered, the physician makes himself liable to a fine or imprisonment.

Mr. HADLEY. May I add this statement: These regulations, if in any way involved in the manner suggested in the last remark of the gentleman from Kansas, would no doubt be the regulations under the Harrison narcotic law, and they relate to the administration of our domestic law in this country, whereas the regulations that we have considered relate to the statute dealing with the importation and exportation of narcotic drugs.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. You are not dealing with the use of the drug in this country?

Mr. HADLEY. No; otherwise than as connected with the exportation and importation of the drug.

Mr. OSBORNE. Will the gentleman from Washington yield for a question?

Mr. HADLEY. I will.

Mr. OSBORNE. I have not had an opportunity to read the bill, but I want to ask the gentleman whether it makes any provision in regard to the exportation of narcotics?

Mr. HADLEY. It deals thoroughly with that subject.

Mr. OSBORNE. I will say that two years ago, with other Members of the House, I was in China and at Pekin, where a committee of eminent Chinese, Americans, and British waited upon and showed us the evils of the use of opium in China, and the fact was stated by them to be that the importation of opium into China was conducted on a very extensive scale and came usually through Japan; that three or four, perhaps a half dozen, very large wholesale drug firms in the United States were the instruments through which this opium was introduced first into Japan and then into China. I wanted to know whether there was anything in the way of curtailment of that practice?

Mr. HADLEY. It is believed that some of the basic features of the bill will aid in correcting such a situation as the gentleman from California mentions.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HADLEY. I will.

Mr. LAYTON. As a matter of fact we have been holding the Chinese people unconsciously in our minds in a sort of contempt, not really knowing the cause, while Europe, and possibly the United States, have for the purpose of selfish revenue, selfish profits, been guilty of exporting the narcotic drugs into China. That is the real truth.

Mr. OSBORNE. The statement was made by this committee, and one of them—the chairman—was Admiral Wu, who was here on the disarmament conference, that there were about half a dozen firms in the United States engaged in this business and profiting by it.

Mr. HADLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the committee amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee arose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WALSH, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 2193) amending the act prohibiting the importation and use of opium for other than medicinal purposes, and had directed him to report the same back with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. HADLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendment to final passage.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. STAFFORD) there were 56 ayes and no noes.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended.

On motion of Mr. HADLEY, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent in the extension of my remarks to include two or three short cablegrams from Hongkong, Shanghai, and other Chinese cities.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by printing several cablegrams. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

INCREASE IN NUMBER OF INTERNAL-REVENUE COLLECTION DISTRICTS.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, on April 26, 1922, I reported the bill (H. R. 10877) to permit an increase in the number of internal-revenue collection districts and in the number of collectors of internal revenue. It was reported under the impression that it was not a privileged bill. It now develops that it is a privileged bill, and I therefore ask unanimous consent to call it up for immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to call up the bill (H. R. 10877) to permit an increase in collection districts. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Reserving the right to object, the gentleman states that this is a privileged bill?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. It develops that it is.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Then it ought not to take up the business of Calendar Wednesday, and I object.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Ways and Means I report the bill (H. R. 10877) to permit an increase in the number of internal-revenue collection districts and in the number of collectors of internal revenue.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reports the bill which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10877) to permit an increase in the number of internal-revenue collection districts and in the number of collectors of internal revenue.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. What is the gentleman doing now?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Reporting a privileged bill.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman can not report a privileged bill on Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. WALSH. Under what rule are reports prevented from being made on Calendar Wednesday?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Under rules which the gentleman well understands.

Mr. WALSH. I do not know of any rule that prevents a report being made on Calendar Wednesday.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it has often been done, but the question in the Chair's mind is—this bill having been reported not from the floor but through the basket and put on the calendar—whether it is now in control of the committee to report from the floor. The Chair is not sure about that. It is on the Union Calendar, and the question is whether it ought not to be referred back to the Committee on Ways and Means and rereported. The Chair will not volunteer any further suggestions in regard to the matter.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the committees.

The Clerk called the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the Committee on Ways and Means.

The Clerk called the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. Has the Committee on Ways and Means any further business?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, how does it happen that the Committee on Appropriations was called and then the Committee on Ways and Means is called again?

The SPEAKER. The Chair instructed the Clerk to call the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, what did the Speaker hold in respect to the bill H. R. 10877?

The SPEAKER. In what particular?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. As to whether the bill should be rereferred.

The SPEAKER. The Chair volunteered the suggestion, and the Chair is not quite clear as to the condition it is in. The bill was reported by the gentleman through the basket. It has now been concluded, and the Chair thinks correctly, that it is a privileged bill. The question arises whether it is still in the hands of the committee to rereport, inasmuch as it has already been once reported through the basket and is now on the Union Calendar. At first blush the Chair is inclined to believe that the committee would not have the right to rereport it without its first having been referred back to the committee.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, would it be in order to request that the bill H. R. 10877 shall be considered as having been reported as a privileged bill and all points of order reserved thereon?

The SPEAKER. Of course, it will be in order to do that by unanimous consent.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. It is quite clear that there is not.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were closed and the Sergeant at Arms was directed to notify absentees.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and seventy-six Members have answered to their names; a quorum.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were opened.

The SPEAKER. In respect to the report which was made by the gentleman from Oklahoma of the bill H. R. 10877, the Chair stated he was in doubt whether the gentleman had the right to make that report. It seems now to the Chair logically that the bill is not now in the possession of the committee, but the Chair finds an express decision by Mr. Speaker Reed on that point, holding that it can be immediately reported where it has been once reported through the basket. The Chair therefore refers the bill to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee reserves all points of order.

TAX-EXEMPT SECURITIES.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Joint Resolution 314, proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk proceeded to read the resolution.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee (interrupting the reading). Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the Committee on Ways and Means has not authorized the gentleman from Iowa or any other gentleman to call up this resolution on Calendar Wednesday.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is not necessary to call it up on Calendar Wednesday. If the gentleman is authorized to call it up, he can call it up at any time.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I make the point of order that the committee has not authorized the calling of it up and that it is not privileged.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Iowa whether the committee has authorized him to call this up?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman from Tennessee is not advised as to the condition of the record with reference to the report on this resolution. The committee has not only authorized a report by myself, but also authorized me to use all parliamentary means to bring it before the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, this morning we were advised, and Members generally were advised, that the business from the Ways and Means Committee would be considered to-day, and the business which was to be considered was specifically mentioned, to wit, the narcotic bill and the bill increasing the number of revenue districts. I myself regarded the bill creating the revenue districts as a privileged bill, but I made no point of order on it, and no one on this side made a point of order on it. The point of order was made from the Republican side of the House, and it was sustained. Mr. Speaker, it is a breaking of faith with this side of the House and with the Members who have been advised as to what was coming up to now call up other matters on this day. I submit it to the honor of the Republican side of the House.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. An attempt was made to secure unanimous consent to call up the tax-collection district bill and the gentleman from Tennessee objected.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I did, because if it is privileged it ought not to interfere with Calendar Wednesday business.

The gentleman himself made the point of order that it was privileged, and that point of order was sustained. I did not make the point of order.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to address the House. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] seems to have fallen into the habit of late on the slightest provocation, or without any provocation at all, I think, of talking about questions of honor. He will have to admit what everyone knows, that there has never been a time in the history of the Congress when the minority has been advised so far in advance or with such great particularity as to what is likely to come before the House as in this Congress. [Applause.] It is true that I said to the gentleman from Tennessee, as is my habit to do, that we expected to bring up two certain bills to-day. My belief was that neither of those two bills were privileged, and I expected that the day would be occupied in the consideration of those bills. A gentleman on this side, without consultation with me or anyone else as far as I know, on his own responsibility raised the question as to the privileged character of one of the bills, and the Chair held it was privileged and therefore could not be considered under the Calendar Wednesday call. Whereupon the gentleman from Tennessee himself prevented the consideration of that bill by opposing a unanimous-consent request for the consideration of the measure. In this state of affairs, in order to hold for this important committee its privilege of Calendar Wednesday, it was necessary to bring up another bill because the gentleman objected to the consideration of one of the two bills we had informed him were to be considered. Now, if there is any question of breaking faith, it certainly does not rest with this side. We have endeavored to do exactly what we proposed to do, what we said to the gentleman we intended to do, but he has personally made it impossible to carry out the program, and he certainly has no ground for complaint if under those circumstances we take up another bill.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, it is quite true I objected to unanimous consent for the consideration of a bill on Calendar Wednesday which the Speaker had held to be a privileged bill, and I think correctly. The calendar call could not be proceeded with, and other committees could be called, but there has been no notice as to this legislation you are calling up now. You are calling up an amendment to the Constitution of the United States without notice, with no expectation that it was going to come up.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman from Tennessee now object if I again ask unanimous consent to call up and consider the bill to which he has heretofore objected?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes; I will. I reckon that is a frank answer.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, we will go to the limit in endeavoring to carry out our agreement. We will go further than perhaps we are justified in doing in keeping faith absolutely to the letter with gentlemen on that side. There is another bill, the Liberia bill, we should like to call up. We shall not call it up simply because certain gentlemen on that side have promised us a filibuster if we do, so that in one case the gentleman from Tennessee has prevented us from going on with the program, and in the other case other gentlemen on that side have promised a filibuster. Now, Mr. Speaker, I shall try to keep faith with everybody by moving to dispense with Calendar Wednesday business in order that we may take up a bill from the Committee on Ways and Means that the Chair has held is privileged. I am going to do that in order to accommodate the gentleman from Tennessee, notwithstanding the fact that he himself has gotten in the way of the program we had in mind, and other gentlemen on that side have suggested a filibuster if we vary the program somewhat.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I wonder if the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] is not willing to share some of that responsibility with me?

Mr. WALSH. I had nothing to do with the gentleman from Oklahoma himself arising and admitting the bill was found to be privileged.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. He yielded to the gentleman's superior intelligence.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman can not get away with that kind of bribery.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further business on the Calendar Wednesday Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming moves to dispense with further business on the Calendar Wednesday Calendar.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that in his opinion two-thirds——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The House again divided; and there were—ayes 113, noes 47.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote, because there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. It is clear that there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 183, nays 84, not voting 163, as follows:

INTERNAL-REVENUE COLLECTION DISTRICTS.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 10877, and pending that motion I would like to get an agreement, if possible, with the gentlemen of the minority as to time for general debate.

Mr. COLLIER. How about 40 minutes to a side? I can get along with that.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that debate be limited to 40 minutes on a side, one-half to be controlled by myself and one-half by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that the debate be limited to 40 minutes on a side, half of the time to be controlled by himself and half by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER]. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Oklahoma that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10877) to permit an increase in the number of internal-revenue collection districts and in the number of collectors of internal revenue, with Mr. WALSH in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10877) to permit an increase in the number of internal-revenue collection districts and in the number of collectors of internal revenue.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 3141 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 3141. (a) For the purpose of assessing, levying, and collecting the taxes provided by the internal revenue laws the President may establish convenient collection districts, and for that purpose he may subdivide any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, or may unite any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia with any State or Territory, and may from time to time alter such districts.

"(b) On and after July 1, 1922, the whole number of collection districts and the whole number of collectors of internal revenue shall not exceed 74."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CHANDLER] is recognized for 40 minutes.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this is for the purpose of giving authority to the President to establish not to exceed 74 revenue districts in the United States. The necessity for this bill is in order that the revenue department may better function, and it is for the benefit not only of the revenue department but for the taxpayers as well.

Heretofore there have been 64 districts. Up to a few years ago the districts in the United States ranged from 126 to 241. At no time up to 1911 was there collected more than $350,000,000 in internal revenue. Now the collections run something around $6,000,000,000, or have for the last few years. Up until 1911 the number of taxpayers doing business with the Internal Revenue Department never exceeded as many as 600,000 per year. Since then—that is, for the year 1921—the revenue department had business with something like 11,000,000 taxpayers, and in that year they handled something over 20,000,000 transactions. So you gentleman can readily see the necessity for this additional legislation.

Another reason is that in a great many communities the revenue collection offices are very remote from the taxpayers. In some cases, for instance, in the eastern portion of the State of Washington, it is necessary for the taxpayers to go as far as four or five hundred miles in order to transact business with the revenue collector. The returns of less than $5,000 income now are made direct to and audited by the district collector, and he passes finally upon those returns. Hence it is very important that districts be created in proximity to the taxpayers. Take the city of New York, for instance; the business is so great that it is practically impossible for one district to take care of it. At the present time the people of New York living in the Bronx are connected with the Albany district.

Mr. QUIN. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Yes, sir.

Mr. QUIN. Where are the districts to be created?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. This simply gives the President authority to create them wherever it is necessary to do so. The bill does not create any districts at all.

It is necessary for the citizens of the Bronx to go to Albany to transact business, as it is impossible to take care of them at the customhouse district in Manhattan. It would be a great deal better if they would create a district in the Bronx to take care of the large number of people living in that vicinity, as well as dividing a portion of the district of Manhattan and giving it to the Bronx district.

I am simply mentioning the necessity for it. I do not know that a district will be created in the Bronx or in any other place. This bill does not provide for the creation of any districts, but simply gives the President authority to do so.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. I note that the collections, according to an official statement, or what purports to be an official statement, of internal revenue have fallen off $875,000,000 for the first three-quarters of this fiscal year, as compared with the first three-quarters of the former fiscal year. Now, in view of the fact that the existing districts were able to collect all that amount of revenue, much larger than now exists and much larger than will be collected in the next year, what is the real economic necessity for creating these new places?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. The gentleman is correct about the falling off of the revenue. That is caused by the general slump in business, but it does not decrease the number of transactions with the revenue department. Again, the business of the preceding years has not been disposed of. In fact, a great many of the income-tax returns and excess-profits returns for the year 1917 have not been disposed of at the present time, and it is necessary to have the machinery with which to take care of this business. The very fact that the settlements have not been made up to the present time has kept probably a billion dollars of revenue out of the hands of the Government. The estimate is made at the present time that they could collect a billion dollars if we had the proper machinery with which to handle it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman probably does not mean for us to understand that has anything to do with the number of revenue collections, as that may be due to a lack of sufficient force in the districts already existing, but how can it possibly be due to the number of revenue districts themselves?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Each district finally audits the greater portion of these income-tax returns. A greater portion of them does not exceed $5,000. And it is necessary for the force in those districts to audit those returns annually. Unless we have the machinery to do that, and unless we have the collection districts established in such a way that the taxpayers can conduct business with various districts, it is impossible to expedite the auditing of those returns.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. But is not that a question of the force in the office?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Not altogether. Frequently it is a question of waiting to get in proximity with the taxpayer himself. He asks that the matter be set on a certain day on which he can come before the revenue department.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it not a fact that under the practice of the Treasury Department the collectors of the respective districts are vested with full authority to determine the returns, as to the amount of taxes to be paid on those returns, up to $3,000 or less?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Five thousand dollars.

Mr. STAFFORD. And by creating an additional number of collectors the department will be enabled to administer the work more expeditiously for that reason?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I wonder why.

Mr. CHALMERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. CHALMERS. I wanted to ask if the gentleman thinks an increase of 10 more districts would bring these centers within the proximity of the several taxpayers? As I understand it, there are now 64 districts, collection districts, in the United States, and you propose to increase it to 74, adding 10 districts. Do you have two of the States or more in one district?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. I do not believe so.

Mr. CHALMERS. That is, Nevada constitutes a district by itself?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. CHALMERS. It seems to me the point that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] made is good—that by the increase of 10 more districts you can not serve the several taxpayers of the country. You do not claim that, do you, and put a collection district in their immediate neighborhood? So that this is simply increasing the general machinery. You are appointing 10 more collectors——

Mr. LAYTON. New officers——

Mr. CHALMERS. Yes; new officers, carrying salaries of $6,000 or more.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. No. No collector receives more than $6,000.

Mr. CHALMERS. Do some of them receive less than that?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Only a limited number receive as much as $6,000.

Mr. CHALMERS. So it seems to me the point that the gentleman from Tennessee makes is good, inasmuch as if you appointed a greater clerical force you could serve your constituents in the district without increasing the overhead.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. BURTNESS. Is it not a fact that there is less need of districts now than there was before because of the lessening of the number of sales taxes and various forms of taxes?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. No; because you have more transactions now, and other matters, than you had in the former period.

Mr. BURTNESS. Why so?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Because you will have a greater number of income taxes, whether they made more money or not.

Mr. BURTNESS. Many of the reports have been entirely eliminated with the enactment of the 1921 law; the various sales taxes of different kinds, and the nuisance tax, and so on. That has eliminated a great deal of work.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Some of the merchant taxes have been eliminated; that is true. But other matters take their place.

Mr. BURTNESS. And some of the returns have been eliminated because of the increase of the exemption. That is also correct, is it not?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. That is partially correct.

Mr. BURTNESS. Well, some.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Possibly a very few.

Mr. BURTNESS. What is there under the 1921 law that was not there before?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. There are more returns this year than last on incomes.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. I understood the gentleman to say that the committee had not decided where the collectors were to be located.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. No; they have not.

Mr. SNELL. How do you decide?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. That will be decided by the Treasury Department.

Mr. SNELL. Have they decided where these districts should go?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. I do not think they have decided that.

Mr. SNELL. How, then, can they decide that they need 10?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. They probably need more.

Mr. SNELL. This is a very important matter, and I think it should be explained very fully.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. I find in this report this statement, and I want to ask the gentleman about it:

> The geographical location of some of the collectors' offices seriously inconveniences the taxpayer because of the distance he is required to travel in order to have his return properly adjusted.

Now, will the gentleman tell the committee what territory was referred to before his committee, where the taxpayers were inconvenienced, as specified in this report?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. One place that our attention was called to was the city of Council Bluffs, Iowa. There it was necessary for the citizens to travel over 300 miles to transact business with the collector of their district and numerous other localities which it would be superfluous for me to mention.

Mr. COLLIER. The gentleman will recall though that the witnesses from the Treasury Department, after repeated questioning on the part of the committee, refused to say, except in one or two instances, where these new places would be made. The gentleman recalls that, does he not?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. I do; and not only that, but I am of opinion that they did not desire to state where the new districts would be created. The people might think they needed a district at that particular place and it would not be feasible to do it under this law.

Mr. RAKER. Just one more question. Then there was no testimony before the committee as to the particular territory where these districts were to be created?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. No, sir.

Mr. RAKER. Did the committee consider the further fact found in the report of A. W. Mellon, Secretary of the Treasury, of date April 18, 1922, that in these 10 districts it would cost at least $500,000 to maintain the personnel of the districts?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Yes; but the Treasury Department felt that the increased collections would more than offset that difference by a great deal.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. LAYTON. There is an "embarrassment." I am going to make this suggestion, that there will be considerable embarrassment if we keep on creating new offices. [Laughter.]

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Can the gentleman tell us how many employees are now in the offices that are in operation?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. As to the district offices, I have not the information.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. In any one of the offices?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. I think not.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Five hundred thousand dollars divided among 10 offices would be only $50,000 to an office. It certainly would not pay for quarters and support a very large personnel. It seems to me that any office now in operation in the United States probably costs from two to five times the amount that it would be possible for each of these offices to have under this bill.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. No. We have now 64 districts, and we do not appropriate nearly that amount to take care of each of those districts.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Do you not appropriate as much as $50,000 for each district?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. No, sir.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SNELL. How many additional employees will be created for these additional districts?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. The Treasury Department did not state specifically. They will certainly need some additional employees according to the best information at hand.

Mr. SNELL. I did not know but the object of this bill was to decrease the number of employees. [Laughter.]

Mr. LAYTON. You do not think for a moment, do you, that a new collection district would be created without having an increased personnel?

Mr. SNELL. I did not know but that was the object of this bill.

Mr. BURTNESS. As I understand the gentleman, the department did not divulge as to where the new offices would be created, but I think before the bill was reported they did divulge the places where there was need of some additional collection districts. Can the gentleman tell us where the facts disclosed at the hearings showed that there was actual need for the creation of additional districts?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. New York was one of the places that was called to our attention. It was also stated that in the eastern portion of the State of Washington it is necessary for the taxpayers to go from 300 to 500 miles in order to transact business; but it was not said that new districts would be created in either of those places.

Mr. BURTNESS. I take it that in almost every State there are distances of 300 or 400 miles from the corners of the States to the office of the collector of internal revenue. I know it is so in my State. Yet I do not anticipate that the creation of these new districts will remedy that situation. But I wish to ask in that connection, Is it the contention of the committee that there is a great deal of business that must be transacted in person between the taxpayer and the local internal-revenue office?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. There certainly is.

Mr. BURTNESS. What kind of business?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. All kinds of appeals and all kinds of transactions where there is any difference between the revenue department and the taxpayers.

Mr. BURTNESS. I have had a number of just such cases, and I live very near to the office, but I have usually done that business by mail.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma has used 20 minutes.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. I reserve the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER] is recognized for 40 minutes.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, I have promised to other Members so much of the limited time at my disposal that I will ask the Chair to notify me when I have used five minutes.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, there is absolutely no necessity for this legislation. In the first place, there is no necessity for it because, as it was brought out by the questions of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] and as every Member of this House knows, the income-tax returns are becoming smaller and smaller, and therefore on account of this great falling off in income-tax collections there is no need at this time for additional collectors. The report states that in 1921 the total number of transactions was in the vicinity of 20,000,000, and it is estimated, as stated in the same majority report, that the total number of transactions in 1922 will be something in excess of 16,000,000 only. But even if the income-tax collections were growing there is no necessity for this law, because under the law as it stands to-day the President of the United States has the power, and he has exercised it frequently within the last three or four years, to alter and change the limits or confines of any collection district in the United States. Acting under that law, within the last two or three years five districts in Kentucky were placed in one collection district; and if it should appear—which I do not for a moment admit—that other collection districts were needed, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the President, could so alter and change the limits and boundaries of the other districts as to get the new ones without creating the additional expense which this bill seeks to create. This bill seeks to create 10 big offices and a number of small offices which will be incidental.

The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CHANDLER], in response to a question about the salaries, stated that several of these salaries amount to $6,000, and that the others are less, which is correct, as far as I know. There are a number of the 64 collectors who receive $6,000. There is one who receives $4,500. There is one who receives $5,000, and I think all the others get from $5,400 to $5,500 and up to $6,000.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. COLLIER. I will yield for a brief question.

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman is a distinguished member of the Committee on Ways and Means. Will he inform the House whether he was present when this bill was considered by the Ways and Means Committee?

Mr. COLLIER. I certainly was present.

Mr. RAKER. Now, what I want to know is whether there was any evidence offered to show what districts needed another collector of internal revenue?

Mr. COLLIER. I am glad the gentleman has brought that out, because I tried to get from the witnesses a statement of where they were going to put these additional districts. The representative of the department said something about New York, that the citizens in the Bronx had to send their returns to Albany. Then he spoke of some other place. I believe the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CHANDLER] stated that there was one out in Iowa; but we could not get anyone to state where these districts would be put in, because they said that it might be embarrassing.

Gentlemen of the House, there is absolutely no need for this legislation, because we do not need these additional offices. But if, on the other hand, the business of the Internal Revenue Department were increasing to such an extent that we should employ more machinery to collect these taxes, I asked the witnesses at the hearing and they never would reply in a manner satisfactory to me; I asked the witnesses, the Treasury officials, if there was more business in any one of these collection districts than that office could expeditiously handle, why was it that the force of that office could not be increased instead of going to the expense of putting in a new collection district, securing headquarters for that district, paying the collector a salary of from $5,500 to $6,000, and the salaries of all the clerks besides which would be needed to operate a new district.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi has used five minutes.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. I wish to correct the gentleman on the salaries of the collectors.

Mr. COLLIER. I stand corrected, because there are so many I could not state them accurately.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. There are eight with a salary of less than $5,000.

Mr. COLLIER. I am obliged to the gentleman, but I think you will find that the average salary is about $5,500.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLIER. I will.

Mr. GRIFFIN. If one of these increases is for the Bronx, I will say, coming from the Bronx, which has a population of 800,000, that the Bronx does not want any increase in the present personnel; that they are able to accomplish all their business with a 2-cent postage stamp. [Applause.]

Mr. COLLIER. I would not go so far as that. I want to be perfectly fair; that was only one instance given as an illustration. We could not find out where they wanted these changes, but briefly, in conclusion, the situation is this: There is no need for these additional collectors, because the President has the power to change, alter, define, or limit any one of these collection districts, and if any change is necessary these districts can be merged or cut up or divided under existing law.

Mr. Chairman, I yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. OLDFIELD].

Mr. OLDFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry my friend took two of my minutes. However, I think I can get through in eight minutes. Now, gentlemen, it used to be said by the Republicans that the Democrats always acted a fool at the right time. If you pass this legislation, if you even seriously consider the passage of this legislation, you have got to turn that around and say that the Republicans always act like fools at the proper time. [Laughter.] There is no sense in this legislation, and I believe I can convince you of it. They say that they need 74 instead of 64 collection districts. Why, the Senate agreed to 69 and said that was all that was needed, instead of 74. The scheme is to add new offices, to spend a half million dollars more of the people's money on these officers and employees. That is the situation here. You are not getting as much taxes as you did last year. The papers say taxes will fall off a billion dollars this year. You repealed the excess-profits tax and you do not need anybody to collect the excess profits. You repealed the surtaxes. You lose $90,000,000 there. You lose $450,000,000 of excess-profits tax, making $540,000,000 that you will not have to collect. Why increase the number of collection districts?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLDFIELD. For a brief question.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. The gentleman will not contend that the excess-profits taxes was collected the same as the surtaxes?

Mr. OLDFIELD. We are not going to collect as much tax this year as we did the last year, and less next year, on account of the loss of the excess-profits tax and the high surtaxes. This is only an opportunity to give some one a chance of appointing more officeholders. Every time you appoint a new officeholder you put your foot in your mouth. I notice in the New York Times, in big headlines, as follows:

HARDING'S NAMING OF LOWDEN AGENT STIRS WASHINGTON—NAT GOLDSTEIN, INVOLVED IN MISSOURI FUND INCIDENT IN 1920, NOMINATED FOR COLLECTOR—SHARP OPPOSITION LIKELY—REPUBLICAN SENATORS ARE DISCONCERTED—DEMOCRATS WILL MAKE CAPITAL OF IT—LOWDEN DEFEAT RECALLED—REVELATION OF USE OF MUCH MONEY BY AGENTS KILLED PRESIDENTIAL CHANCES.

(Special to the New York Times.)

WASHINGTON, May 3.—President Harding sent to the Senate to-day the nomination of Nat Goldstein to be collector of internal revenue for the first (St. Louis) district of Missouri. In doing so the President laid the foundation for political trouble, for Goldstein is one of two men whose acceptance of money to further the campaign of Frank O. Lowden, then Governor of Illinois, for the Republican nomination for President had most to do with losing Lowden this honor.

Some Republican Senators were plainly disconcerted when they learned that Goldstein had been nominated. With the incident of the 1920 campaign in mind, they felt that a party error had been made in this selection.

"Good Lord, can it be true?" exclaimed one Senator when told of the nomination. * * *

* * * * * * * *

Called before a Senate committee of investigation on June 2, 1920, Robert E. Moore, of St. Louis, and Goldstein admitted that each had received a check for $2,500 from Jacob Babler, national committeeman from Missouri, before the election of delegates to the Republican National Convention, and that each understood that it was Lowden money. Moore testified that Babler handed him the check "to take it and use it for whatever I (Moore) saw fit," but that he had not used it. The money was still to his credit in a bank, he said; but in view of the unpleasant notoriety which the matter had caused he would return it.

Goldstein, then a circuit court clerk in St. Louis, testified that Babler handed him a check for $2,500, that he had put it to his credit in bank, that his intention was to turn it over to the Lowden organization "when we got into the campaign" if Lowden were nominated or return the money if Lowden were not nominated. Goldstein said that when the money was given to him he was a candidate for delegate to the national convention, and subsequently was elected without instructions. He added that he "was friendly to Governor Lowden's interests."

Other testimony was to the effect that Louis L. Emmerson, secretary of state of Illinois, and Governor Lowden's campaign manager, sent to E. L. Morse, the Lowden campaign manager in Missouri, $32,000 to pay expenses in his attempt to carry Missouri. Morse testified that he gave $17,000 of this amount to Babler "to create Lowden sentiment." All the testimony showed that Governor Lowden had no knowledge of those transactions. He issued a statement in which he repudiated the support of Moore and Goldstein. "My injunctions to Mr. Emmerson were to use no money except for legitimate purposes of the campaign and to make no expenditure that could not be made public," he said.

The whole affair created such a furore that the Republican leaders at the Chicago convention were afraid to throw the presidential nomination to Lowden. Of the leading contestants for the nomination—General Wood, Senator Harding, Senator Johnson, and Governor Lowden—the favorite with the leaders was Lowden.

When the deadlock came in the convention and leading men of the party met in a "smoke-filled room" at the Blackstone Hotel "at 2.11 a. m." to endeavor to agree on a compromise candidate, Lowden would have been the choice if it had not been for the transactions involving Moore and Goldstein. The feeling was that Lowden's chances would be injured by continued rehearsal of the Moore-Goldstein incident. So Harding was selected instead.

The selection of Goldstein was due primarily to Senator Spencer.

The more fellows like that you appoint to offices the better it is for us. [Laughter.] So go on and appoint all you want. But, gentlemen, there is no sense in passing this bill. The only illustration the Treasury Department gave was that they needed another district in New York. Why, we asked. Because it is so inconvenient for the people. For whom? People in the Bronx. That is a part of Greater New York. Why is it inconvenient? Because they have to go to Albany. The next question was, Have you not authority under the law to take in the Bronx and let them pay their taxes in the city? They said yes. Well, then, why do you not do it? Well, they said, there were other situations like that. Well, there may be other situations like that, gentlemen, but they have the authority under the law to do all on earth that they need. Secretary Mellon has authority to-day to limit these districts, to extend or narrow the limits.

Now, you need not think that you will hear the last of this if you pass this bill. When you add half a million dollars every year to the burden of the taxpayers in order to appoint a few thousand officeholders, you are not going to hear the last of it. You can do it, of course, and you will do it, but I want you to understand that there is no necessity for the legislation, and

I believe every man who will look into it will realize that taxes are falling off instead of increasing, and you will not need so many men to collect the taxes in the future as you have in the past.

Mr. CHALMERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLDFIELD. Yes; briefly.

Mr. CHALMERS. How does the gentleman figure out that the increased cost will be half a million dollars?

Mr. OLDFIELD. Well, some one who appeared before the committee admitted that; I do not know whether it is in the record.

We had these men up here from the Treasury Department, and the suggestion was made, and if anybody can disprove that it will cost $500,000 additional I would like to have him prove it. If there is added 10 collection districts, you know that that means collectors, assistant collectors, office rent, civil-service employees, and every other kind of an employee that you see around the internal revenue office. Hundreds of them in many places, and it will cost probably a million dollars a year instead of $500,000. I do not know, but I know it will cost a great deal of money.

Mr. SANDLIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLDFIELD. Yes.

Mr. SANDLIN. I suggest to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CHALMERS] that he look at Secretary Mellon's report upon this bill.

Mr. OLDFEILD. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Can the gentleman tell me how much it costs in the average office at the present time?

Mr. OLDFIELD. I have not that information.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Could not this work be accomplished by the employment of expert accountants to handle this business in the offices that now exist?

Mr. OLDFIELD. Certainly. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Is it not a question of systematic arrangement of business and seeing to it that everybody does an honest day's work for an honest wage? [Applause.]

Mr. OLDFIELD. I do not think there is any doubt about that either. Whatever inconvenience there is to the taxpayers of America is caused by the department itself, not by anyone else. Of course, you could have one of these officers in every community in America, and that would be of some convenience to some individual taxpayer, but you ought not to do that, and you ought not to add these 10 more, at a cost of half a million or a million dollars a year. [Applause.]

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. LAYTON].

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, what I have to say the Democratic side of the House does not need to pay any attention to. This is a little advice that I am going to give to the Republican side. When you go back and demand to be returned to this House, after putting over an increased number of offices with a decreased amount of Federal taxation—for that is what our slogan is—all I have got to say is that you will have some explaining to do. [Applause.]

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK].

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. LAYTON] used only one minute. I shall use what little time I have in undertaking to amplify what he said. The gentleman from Delaware is exactly right. The people in all political parties are demanding that the number of offices be decreased rather than increased, and unless some offices are abolished and the number of Government employees reduced there are going to be some officials abolished, as our Republican friends will find out to their chagrin. If I remember correctly, there are now 64 internal-revenue districts in the United States, and this bill proposes to increase the number to 74. As Secretary Mellon states in his own report on the bill, such an increase will involve an additional expenditure of $500,000. Why the increase?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Would it not be helpful to us if Commissioner Blair would tell us exactly what the 1,789 people receiving more than $2,000 a year each in a bureau here in Washington are now doing?

Mr. BLACK. I think that would be a very interesting story, because from the long delay that I have experienced in getting settlements of claims for refunds due to constituents who have asked my assistance, I have wondered myself what they are doing.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. May I trouble the gentleman once more at that point?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. The commissioner said in a letter to me that they were practically up to date. Again he said that they were 20,000 behind. Then they wrote another letter and admitted that they had made a mistake of 20,000 in the number of claims for refund.

Mr. BLACK. I think that was a very conservative statement. [Laughter.]

Every Member of the House knows that we reached the peak of taxation in 1921 under the revenue act of 1918. It was in that year that the Internal Revenue Department handled what were termed 20,000,000 transactions, and by the term "transaction" was meant the filing of a return, either income-tax return or excess-profits tax return or a sales-tax return, or a payment, or a quarterly payment, of income tax, excess profits, and other taxes. It is estimated for this year there will be something more than 16,000,000 transactions, a decrease of 20 per cent in the routine business of the office from 1921, and yet, after we have passed the peak of taxation, after the department has carried the heaviest load of detailed transactions, it is proposed to increase the number of internal-revenue offices by 10. Gentlemen, you forget that the Republican Party in 1920 promised the people economy in your platform, and not only that, but some of your most vigorous and extravagant orators said, "Put us in power and we will abolish half of the Federal offices." Now that you have been intrusted with power, what are you doing?

Why, you promised the people bread, and now you are giving them a stone by such bills as this and the one you recently passed to increase the number of Federal judges. The people are already concluding that there is too much rattling of the dishes among you Republicans for the fewness of the victuals, and they are going to express their disapproval in no uncertain terms next November.

Mr. McSWAIN. The gentleman thinks that sort of rations would give the people indigestion?

Mr. BLACK. Yes; much worse than indigestion. Two years of Republican administration has given the country a bad case of "stomach ache."

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Perhaps that is attributable to the fact that they had to swallow a Beveridge yesterday.

Mr. BLACK. Very likely that accounts for it. Anyway, we Democrats will do our best to show these Republicans the remedy, even if they won't take it. I am against this bill and think it should be defeated. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Sixty-seven Members are present; not a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll.

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WALSH, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 10877, finding itself without a quorum, under the rule he caused the roll to be called, whereupon 258 Members responded to their names, and he presented the list of the absentees for printing in the RECORD and Journal.

The SPEAKER. The committee will resume its sitting.

The committee resumed its sitting.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN]. [Applause.]

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, I am much obliged to the gentleman for having a roll call and getting this audience here. It occurs to me the Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee in bringing this bill out have put themselves in an anomalous situation. [Laughter.] You have a decrease of $1,000,000,000 of actual money that is paid into the Treasury for the fiscal year, as compared to the previous year, according to the estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury, and yet you come forward with a bill, already having in all the United States 64 revenue collectors, to increase the number by 10, making 74, thereby increasing the expense of collecting 16⅔ per cent less money than you had collected heretofore, costing the taxpayers of this country 15⅔ per cent more to collect this smaller sum than it did to collect the larger sum. I want to say, gentlemen of the Republican Party, that you have done some foolish things within the last 18 months. Keep on with this type of legislation and this kind of policy and the people will certainly clean your plow at the election next November. You heard the rumblings out in the State of Indiana yesterday when the right bower of the President, one of the old standpat guard, who had been at the other end of the Capitol upholding the hand of plutocracy, riding roughshod over the people when he got a chance, went down to defeat in the vote in the Republican primary, notwithstanding the administration and all its henchmen, all the appointees, both of the State and National administrations in that State, and all the machinery of the Republican organization were working overtime to renominate the Senator, but the whole bunch was repudiated by Republicans in a primary in the good State of Indiana, so much so that that fact is heralded all over the United States in headlines to-day. It is because of this type of legislation that has disgruntled the people of your own party. You can not come along and feed hungry Republican politicians at an expense to the people by such measures as this and get by with it. Do not you know that the man on the street knows what this bill is for? My friend from Oklahoma [Mr. CHANDLER] could not even tell the districts where these collectors were to be created. Who is it that is going to get these jobs? The hungry, worthy Republicans are to be put in jobs to pull down $5,000 plums a year.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUIN. I have not the time. [Laughter.] And in addition they are renting expensive offices and having a great corps of clerks who have to be paid. If you do this monstrous thing just to give some favorite Republicans jobs, it will cost at least a million dollars a year. Already you have gone out with the legislation you have passed taking the taxes off the rich and putting them on the backs of the poor. Notwithstanding that, you want to put a tax grabber on every man's doorstep. [Laughter.] In my judgment the people ought to pay less taxes in the way of public officials, and here you are increasing the number of the tax collectors for which you have to go down into the pockets of the people. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HILL. I want to ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have one minute in order to answer a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not recognize the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I can not say much in two minutes, but I want to enter my protest against this bill. [Applause.] There is neither sense, reason, nor justice in it. We do not need it. A short time ago we were collecting $6,000,000,000 a year with the present number of collectors. We have reduced the necessity for them by two, and to-day we are collecting about $3,000,000,000 internal revenue taxes. Why do you need 10 more collectors? The passage of this bill will cost a million dollars a year. Why should we put that additional burden on the backs of the American people? There is no necessity for it, not a bit. The bill ought not to be here and never should have been introduced. [Applause.] It ought not to have been reported, and I hope that every man who has the interest of the American people at heart will enter his protest against it when his name is called and will vote against the bill. [Applause.]

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to know how much time the minority has remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi has 14 minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Oklahoma has 20 minutes remaining.

Mr. COLLIER. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL].

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the fact that there are a very few districts in the United States that do need additional machinery, and one of those districts is in my district, but if it is necessary for me to vote 10 additional districts in order to get the condition remedied in that one district I absolutely refuse to do so.

If the gentlemen of the Ways and Means Committee had brought in a bill here and definitely stated, say, one, two, three, or four districts that actually need help, and had presented districts on the conditions that existed there, it would be a fair proposition. But to bring in a blanket bill to create 10 districts at this time, it seems to me, is the most inopportune thing in the world to do. The campaign cry of the Republican Party was decreased taxation. Is it Republican efficiency to create more tax collectors to collect increased taxation? I want to know that. If it is, I do not want any more Republican efficiency. I want some other kind. [Applause.]

As the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] said, during the war these same officers collected three times as much taxes as are necessary to collect at the present time, and, speaking personally, I did not escape, and I do not think there are a great many others who did. I feel it would be the worst kind of legislation for this House to pass this measure at this time, and I hope it will not do so. [Applause.]

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD].

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, there are several bills pending in Congress designed to authorize the sale of beer and wine, and there are more than two dozen wet organizations that are making the nomination of candidates pledged to support a beer and wine amendment to the national prohibition act an issue in the primaries. In view of this, it is evident that this question will be an issue in several districts in the coming election.

As a great many false and misleading claims are made by these organizations and their friends, I desire to call attention to why Congress, in passing the national prohibition act, forbade the manufacture and sale of such liquor. When the Sixty-fifth Congress faced the obligation to provide appropriate legislation to carry out the prohibition amendment to the Constitution it had to consider what was sought to be accomplished by that amendment, and what legislation was necessary to carry it out in good faith. The prohibition amendment forbids the manufacture and sale of all intoxicating liquors.

It is a part of the history of this country that for many years a bitter and persistent struggle has been carried on against the liquor traffic. The prohibition amendment was the culmination of that struggle. Before its adoption many States had adopted amendments to their constitutions prohibiting the traffic. These amendments are substantially in the same language as the Federal prohibition amendment. The legislatures in these States, more than 30 in number, passed statutes to carry these amendments into effect. Not one of these statutes permitted the sale of beer or wine that contained more than 1 per cent of alcohol by volume; and with the possible exception of one or two, in which the language of the statutes might possibly be construed to permit the sale of a liquor containing 1 per cent, they all forbade the sale of any beer or wine that contained more than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol.

In taxing liquor under the license system it has for a great many years been the general, it might almost be said the universal, rule that beer and wine that contained as much as one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol was treated and taxed as intoxicating. The Federal Government had for many years followed the same rule. It taxed and dealt with as intoxicating liquor all beer and wine that contained more than that amount of alcohol. So general and universal had this practice been that no one could have had the slightest doubt as to what was meant by the prohibition amendment when it was adopted. Everybody understood that this amendment prohibited the sale of beer and wine, and it became the duty of Congress to carry out what was the intention of those who proposed and those who ratified the amendment. It meant to Congress, as it meant to the public everywhere, that all liquor that had been treated, taxed, and known as intoxicating liquor should forever be banished.

Those who seek to destroy prohibition recognize that the public can not be persuaded knowingly to restore the saloon or the sale of whisky. They are camouflaging their demands by asking for what they call light beer and wine. No one, so far as I know, has had the courage to openly defend the saloon or the sale of whisky in this House since the amendment was adopted. What is it that these people demand? Is it in fact light beer and wine? Why, no. They are demanding beer that contains 4 per cent of alcohol and wine that contains 14 per cent. Four per cent beer is a stronger beer than that which was usually sold in the licensed saloons and 14 per cent wine covers nearly every wine that was ordinarily drunk.

That this is what is demanded can be abundantly established by reference to the thousands of letters and petitions on file with the Judiciary Committee of the House, where requests of that kind are sent. The ordinary beer sold by the saloons usually contained only from 3 to 3½ per cent of alcohol. So what is asked for is the old beer, which is light only in the sense that a stronger beer was occasionally sold. It is not necessary to argue that this beer was intoxicating. Twelve glasses of it will contain as much alcohol as a beer glass full of whisky. Any number of persons will become intoxicated on much less than half that quantity. Everybody knows that the so-called war beer, which was limited in alcoholic content to 2¾ per cent of alcohol by weight, was intoxicating. That contained about the usual amount of alcohol, 3.4 per cent by volume. Two beer glasses of that beer is about equal in alcoholic content to one ordinary glass of whisky.

The smallest percentage of alcohol in beer that anyone has so far proposed is 2.75 per cent of alcohol by volume. To get as much alcohol from drinking this beer as from the ordinary beer sold before prohibition, which contained from 3 to 3½ per cent of alcohol, it would only be necessary to have a glass one-fourth larger.

Dr. De Lancy Carter, president of the American Medical Society for the Study of Alcohol and other Narcotics, stated to the international congress against alcoholism, Septemer, 1920:

> You might compare beer and light wines with spirituous liquors as the local train with a rapid express, both of which reach the ultimate point of the journey at last, although at different rates of speed.

Dr. A Holitscher, of Karlsbad, Germany, said to the congress against alcoholism:

> Some old-fashioned people believe that in encouraging the consumption of beer as a substitute for spirits one contributes to the fight against alcoholism. This notion is erroneous because beer, being an alcoholic liquor, is responsible for a great part of the alcoholism under which the European nations are suffering.

Dr. Harvey Wiley, the eminent food and drug specialist, said:

> When a person gets drunk, the first glass he drinks is just as much responsible for his condition as the last one. Intoxication has a beginning, and that beginning is as much intoxication as the final death struggle of the man who dies from alcoholic intoxication. Every step is essential to the whole journey. The man who doesn't take the first step doesn't die of the last one.

Prohibition has been tried out in a great many villages, cities, counties, and States for more than half a century. At first the prohibition statutes simply made it a crime to sell intoxicating liquor without defining what was meant by the word "intoxicating." These statutes proved a sad disappointment. Only after repeated failures did the friends of prohibition learn that such a law could not be enforced. Then one by one these statutes were amended so as to prohibit by name all liquor, such as beer, wine, whisky, and other known beverages, without reference to the quantity of alcohol they contained. This had been the policy for many years prior to the adoption of the national prohibition amendment. The necessity for this is apparent.

Mr. Justice Brandeis, in speaking for the Supreme Court, said, in regard to this necessity, in Ruppert v. Caffey (251 U. S. 264):

> For the legislation and decisions of the highest courts of nearly all of the States establish that it is deemed impossible to effectively enforce either prohibitory laws or other laws merely regulating the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors, if liability or inclusion within the law is made to depend upon the issuable fact whether or not a particular liquor made or sold as a beverage is intoxicating. In other words, it clearly appears that a liquor law, to be capable of effective enforcement, must, in the opinion of the legislatures and courts of the several States, be made to apply either to all liquors of the species enumerated, like beer, ale, or wine, regardless of the presence or degree of alcoholic content; or, if a more general description is used, such as distilled, rectified, spirituous, fermented, malt, or brewed liquors, to all liquors within that general description, regardless of alcoholic content; and to such of these liquors as contain a named percentage of alcohol; and often several such standards are combined so that certain specific and generic liquors are altogether forbidden and such liquors as contain a given percentage of alcohol.

The question of what percentage of alcohol in beer or other liquor makes it intoxicating can not be answered. There is and can be no decision on that subject. The statement in circulation by wet organizations that the Government has admitted or the Supreme Court has held that the beer containing 2¾ per cent of alcohol is not intoxicating is absolutely false and without the slightest foundation. It is a well-known fact that alcoholic liquor does not affect all persons alike. A quantity of liquor that will make a certain person dead drunk may only slightly affect another; and the same person may at one time become intoxicated on drinking a quantity of liquor that under other conditions would not affect him at all. It is this difficulty that has made it necessary, if prohibition is to be effective, to prohibit all liquor that has any intoxicating effect.

If it was possible to increase the alcoholic contents of near beer without giving it an intoxicating effect nothing would be gained by those who now clamor for such increase. The object, and only object, of increasing such contents is to make it intoxicating. Those who demand the increase do not attempt to conceal the fact that they want a beer that has a kick in it; in other words, a beer that has an intoxicating effect. That is the only thing that the near beer lacks, as it is the ordinary beer with the alcohol removed. Whenever any liquor can be sold that is intoxicating in fact—and, as I have said, that is the beer that is demanded—we might as well repeal the amendment.

Experience has demonstrated that when you permit the sale of any particular kind of intoxicating liquor you can not prevent the sale of any other kind. This is what occurs: Under the present law when a person is found in a state of intoxication it is evident that some one has violated the law, and it at once becomes the duty of the officers charged with enforcement to learn where such person obtained his liquor. The community, if its sentiment is favorable to enforcement, will hold the officer responsible and compel action. If, on the other hand, the law allows the sale of a liquor that is in fact intoxicating even if it is only capable of intoxicating a few, the sight of an intoxicated person does not tend to show any law violation. Under such circumstances the officer will pass the intoxicated person by unless he breaks the peace, and the community is in no position to complain. The intoxicating or stimulating effect of alcohol grows less with use.

A larger and larger dose is necessary to satisfy the craving that it creates. Very soon, if the liquor is a light beer, it will not satisfy this craving, but stronger drink will be demanded. The man that sells the beer will see to it that this stronger drink is furnished. That has always been the case and always will be. The sale of beer eventually makes necessary the sale of whisky. The appetite for alcoholic liquor created by the drinking of beer eventually leads to a demand for stronger drinks. It is the sentiment in the community that in the end enforces law. The community is naturally indifferent as to what liquor makes a person drunk, so long as it legalizes the sale of any liquor that does intoxicate, and the officer naturally follows the course of least resistance by doing nothing in such cases. If the sale of beer and wine is permitted, we shall have the saloon with all its evils.

The principal article sold in every saloon was beer. It was the one thing upon which that institution depended and upon which it lived, so much so that saloons were often called beer saloons. It represented over 90 per cent of the volume of the trade. The brewers in many sections owned most of the saloons, furnished the license money, and practically employed those who conducted the business. It is quite freely admitted by the beer and wine advocates that with the sale of beer and wine the saloon would return. To avoid this, knowing that the public is opposed to the saloons, they propose that no beer or wine shall be consumed at the place of sale, but only for consumption in the homes. Those who propose this show how utterly ignorant they assume the public to be of the nature of the traffic. A law such as that would mean that the consumption of these liquors would have to take place beyond any police supervision or control. It would drive the traffic into all sorts of hidden haunts and debauch the home to an extent never possible under the saloon system. To prevent the very thing now proposed statutes were passed in various States to make it illegal to sell liquor for consumption except in a saloon. If the consumption is not to be under any police supervision or control, no effective measure could be taken to prevent the liquor from reaching minors, drunkards, and others, which it has been the policy to protect under our license laws. The sale of liquor for consumption in a saloon has been condemned by the public pretty much everywhere, but what is now proposed would be infinitely worse.

The advocates of the sale of beer and wine are presuming upon the ignorance of the public as to the effect of their proposed policy. But the public is not as easily deceived as they assume. Many years ago Massachusetts tried a prohibitory law under which beer was permitted to be sold, but it proved such an utter failure that it was repealed after a trial of three years. It was attended with every evil that attends the unrestricted sale of liquor. Not only was beer sold, but so was every other kind of liquor. Michigan adopted prohibition by a majority vote of 68,000. A year later, when this camouflage proposition was presented, it defeated the sale of wine and beer by a majority of 207,000. Ohio adopted prohibition in 1918, and one year later, when a referendum vote was taken on permitting the sale of beer containing 2¾ per cent of alcohol, the majority against it was increased. At the last referendum election in Ohio it adopted an enforcement code which prohibits the sale of beer or wine that contains more than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol by a majority of 290,000 votes. Similar votes have been recorded in Washington, Oregon, Colorado, and Arizona.

The experience of those who have tried to enforce prohibition laws is the same everywhere. The traffic always has and always will refuse to obey any law that it can break or circumvent. The demand for national prohibition grew out of that fact. It was found to be practically impossible to keep liquor away from a prohibition State so long as it could be manufactured or sold anywhere. The proposition is made in some quarters that each State or congressional district should have the option by a referendum to permit the sale of beer or wine. This can not be done without first changing the Constitution. Even if it was legal, it is indefensible because it would open the breweries and wineries in the localities where such sale might be made, and the liquor would not only be sold there but in other States and localities.

Not only have States found it necessary for the purpose of suppressing this traffic to define as intoxicating all beer that contains more than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol but many States have forbidden the sale of all beer and all wine regardless of its alcoholic contents. The Ohio Supreme Court, Eighty-third Ohio, page 68, in sustaining such a statute, pointed out the lawlessness of this traffic and used this language:

> The legislature may have heard of Bishop's beer, Friedon beer, and later of near beer, and concluded that the enforcement of the will of the majority should not be defeated by subterfuge or the juggling in percentages of alcohol, and has said that for the purpose of carrying out the intention of the people to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors certain beverages shall be legally considered intoxicating, although not so in fact; and malt liquor is one of those so designated. "Near beer" being a malt liquor, the statute pronounces it an intoxicating liquor and made proof of its real intoxicating qualities unnecessary. It is no more protected than "altogether" beer, and the attempt to evade the law by brewing a "near" or "almost" beer is, by section 3, supra, rendered futile.

The Supreme Court of the United States in Crane v. Campbell (245 U. S. 304), speaking of the character of the liquor traffic, said:

> And considering the notorious difficulties always attendant upon efforts to suppress traffic in liquors, we are unable to say that the challenged inhibition of their possession was arbitrary and unreasonable or without relation to the legitimate purpose.

Hon. John F. Kramer, the first Federal Prohibition Commissioner, a man whose experience in dealing with this traffic entitles him to speak with authority on the subject, has said:

> Prohibition of the beverage use of intoxicating liquor is an onward-looking principle. It can not be made entirely effective to-day because of appetites, habits, customs, and passions formed during the existence of the legalized traffic. But coming generations will know little of intoxicating liquors and care less, provided we cease implanting in them appetites and passions for liquor. We all know that beer always has been the beverage which begat in the young the appetite, passion, etc., for intoxicating liquor, and not whisky and alcohol. If we continue to implant these in the young, our work will never cease. We will give up in despair. The eighteenth amendment will be a farce. If we are going to give the present generation anything intoxicating to drink, let it rather be whisky and alcohol. By thus doing we could possibly save the coming generation and ultimately secure prohibition. No one would dare advocate this, although the proposed course would ultimately lead to it.
> If we start with 2.75 per cent beer, all the forces at the disposal of the Government, Federal, State, and local, could not regulate and control it. It would be light beer to-day, heavy beer and wine to-morrow, and whisky and alcohol the next day. We would have the intolerable situation of having prohibition in theory but a drunken debauch in practice.

Former President William H. Taft, now Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, said in a communication published in the Chicago Tribune on July 26, 1920:

> I am not in favor of amending the Volstead Act in respect to the amount of permissible alcohol in beverages. I am not in favor of allowing light wines and beer to be sold under the eighteenth amendment. I believe it would defeat the purpose of the amendment. No such distinction as that between wines and beer, on the one hand, and spirituous liquors, on the other, is practicable as a police measure. * * * Any such loophole as light wines and beer would make the amendment a laughing stock.

The argument that a law allowing the sale of beer and wine would enable the Government to collect a large tax is delusive. Most of the States have prohibition laws to-day that could not be repealed; public sentiment in those States would not permit it. Without the consent of the State beer and wine could not be sold, despite anything that Congress could do. Without open sale in the States no substantial tax could be collected.

The following 14 States forbid the sale of beer and wine whether they have any alcohol in them or not: Alabama, Arizona, Arkansas, Colorado, Idaho, Iowa, Kansas, Kentucky, Michigan, Mississippi, New Mexico, North Carolina, South Dakota, and Washington. That is also true of the Territory of Alaska and the District of Columbia. The following 22 States forbid the sale of any beer or wine that has more than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol: Delaware, Florida, Georgia, Illinois, Indiana, Massachusetts, Minnesota, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, New Jersey, North Dakota, Ohio, Oklahoma, Oregon, Rhode Island, Tennessee, Utah, Vermont, Virginia, West Virginia, and Wyoming; so do local option laws in Maryland. In Connecticut, Louisiana, Maine, Missouri, New York, Pennsylvania, and Wisconsin the laws provide that the definition in the national prohibition act shall govern. The following States—New Hampshire, South Carolina, and Texas—allow the sale of beer and wine containing 1 per cent of alcohol. California and Maryland are the only States that have no law on the subject.

But aside from the question of revenue the economic value of prohibition is beyond any question. According to official figures England, with a population not half as large as that of the United States, spent last year more than two billion dollars for liquor. Only a comparatively small amount of that was paid for by the rich. Nearly all of that vast sum was a tax on people who could not afford to spend the money. Many rich people are anxious to shift their tax burden back upon the liquor traffic. But for prohibition, State and national, twice or three times that amount would be spent in this country, and spent to create poverty, misery, and debauchery throughout the land. It is surprising that this proposition can be made by people who make any pretense of being law-abiding citizens; and still more surprising that persons can have the effrontery of offering themselves as candidates for election to Congress on a platform pledging themselves to support legislation so clearly in violation of the plain letter of the Constitution. There is not a man in this House who can repeat the absurdity often enough and long enough to even convince himself that beer and wine are not intoxicating. No one pretends that the wine that is asked for is not intoxicating.

The courts take judicial notice that wine is an intoxicating liquor, while beer of the strength proposed would be intoxicating in fact, and any law authorizing its sale would be unconstitutional. The proposal which is now urged is but an invitation to the Representatives of the American people to disregard their country's Constitution. It seeks to have the Members of this House from the States whose laws prohibit the sale of such liquors legislate in direct opposition not only to the Constitution of the United States but also to the will of the people of their own States as expressed in their State statutes. It asks many Members of this body to violate not only the Constitution of the United States but the constitution of their States as well. This insidious propaganda for beer and wine invites disregard of law and is inimical to the peace and good order of society. This is no time to encourage lawlessness. The judges of our country have sounded a timely warning when they said:

> The judicial section of the American Bar Association, venturing to speak for all the judges, wishes to express this warning to the American people: Reverence for law and enforcement of law depend mainly upon the ideals and customs of those who occupy the vantage ground of life in business and society. The people of the United States, by solemn constitutional and statutory enactment, have undertaken to suppress the age-long evil of the liquor traffic. When, for the gratification of their appetites or the promotion of their interests, lawyers, bankers, great merchants and manufacturers, and social leaders, both men and women, disobey and scoff at this law, or any other law, they are aiding the cause of anarchy and promoting mob violence, robbery, and homicide; they are sowing dragon's teeth, and they need not be surprised when they find that no judicial or police authority can save our country or humanity from reaping the harvest.

The highest executive officers of the Government join with the judiciary in pointing out the menace of lawlessness.

President Warren G. Harding said on March 24, 1922:

> It is absolutely essential to the maintenance of a secure society and to the attainment of a proper moral plane that the law should be recognized as sacred and supreme. It should have at its back and enlisted in its support every element of the community that realizes the desirability of sound, secure, and stable institutions. Disregard of one statute inevitably must breed a lack of respect for the law in general.

Attorney General Harry M. Daugherty in his address before the American Bar Association said:

> Respect for law is the one essential fact of our civilization. Without it, life, liberty, and property are insecure. The history of civilization has been a continuous struggle for law and order. The only sound position for those who favor respect for law to take is that those charged with law enforcement must enforce all the laws and all good citizens must obey all the laws. The Government will endure on the rock of law enforcement or it will perish in the quicksand of lawlessness.

Hon. Guy D. Goff, Assistant to the Attorney General, said at the law enforcement convention, in Washington, in December, 1921:

Prohibition is not the only law which is difficult to enforce.

Any new law which interferes with the so-called personal liberty of the community must pass through the stages of open violation, secret violation, passive enforcement, and then universal observance throughout the land.

The man who can not obey the law, the man who can not fearlessly enforce the law, and with the courage of his convictions bring before our judicial tribunals every dastardly and contemptible crook, no matter how high his rank, has no place in our system.

The Federal Prohibition Commissioner, Roy A. Haynes, who is the head of the prohibition department to enforce national prohibition, said recently, in Philadelphia:

Nothing can affront the American people more than the statement that we can not enforce our laws. In this statement lies the death warrant of the Republic, for this Nation can not endure without reverence for law, without the recognized authority of law.

It is in the last analysis Americanism in conflict with Old World customs and concept; it is democracy against avarice, lawlessness, and anarchy. The issue divides men not upon the question of their appetites but upon the question of their loyalty to their country.

Prohibition has not divided the Nation against itself. It has rather ranged the great forces of our Government squarely on one side of a great question, and I am pleased to say that the real forces of Americanism are lined upon the right side of the question of law enforcement.

The time is here when every man and woman who love their country should support its Constitution and obey the laws enacted to enforce it. All liberty and security rest on law. License to sell beer and wine contained in a prohibition law makes it impossible to enforce. It is as indefensible to vote for such a nonenforceable law as it is to vote directly to violate the Constitution. The only defensible position for a Member of Congress is to sustain the law in enforceable form. When he accepts his office, it is made his official duty to sustain the Constitution. He must solemnly promise to do that. There is only one defensible position for a judicial officer, and that is, to construe the law so as to carry out its manifest purpose. There is only one defensible position for the law-abiding citizen, and that is to obey the law and support those in public office who are honestly endeavoring to enforce it.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MILLS].

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I recognize that our Democratic friends, when they are confronted with the proposition of creating new positions, are unable ever to think of those new positions except as jobs. They are absolutely unable apparently to grasp business propositions of this kind, where it may be real economy in the long run to decentralize rather than to centralize.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLS. I can not. I have only five minutes.

But I want to say here, in view of the remarks that they are so troubled over our record of economy that they think the people may return their party to power next fall, the fact is that we will spend this year $1,600,000,000 less than was spent in the last year of the Democratic administration, and that for the fiscal year 1923 we will spend $2,000,000,000 less than you gentlemen spent when you controlled this Government. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, as to the merits of this proposition, I have heard no argument to meet the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury that new districts are needed for efficient administration. He points out to this House that the number of taxpayers has increased from 500,000 or 600,000 to 10,000,000. It must be a matter of common knowledge that you get better tax assessments and more accurate figures as to taxpaying ability through local assessors than you do through a centralized agency.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLS. I can not. I have only five minutes.

Why does every State in this Union cling tenaciously to a system of local assessment? Because the local assessor is more familiar with local conditions and with the business of the taxpayers, and the taxpayer prefers to do business directly with some local officer rather than to correspond. I venture to say that, in so far as income-tax collections are concerned, if you could establish a great many more offices than are contemplated in this bill you would collect more money in the end than you expended for the additional service. In England they have a system of local boards that deal directly with their taxpayers, and do not require 300,000 taxpayers, as we do in one internal-revenue collection district in New York, to deal with an office 150 miles away.

Why, gentlemen, when Members of Congress were filing their income-tax returns some two months ago I noticed a gentleman from the Treasury Department came up to the Capitol for the convenience of Members. These gentlemen here wrote the law, a lot of them are lawyers, and yet they asked expert advice to prepare their returns.

But when it comes to the ordinary taxpayer they say, "Let him travel 200 miles to make his return." [Applause.] To-day you have got anywhere, I think, from $1,000,000,000 to $1,500,000,000 of back taxes outstanding—all claims that have to be litigated or settled. In the revenue act of 1921 you gave authority to your tax department to settle back taxes. How are you more likely to get a satisfactory settlement, by mail with the parties hundreds of miles apart, or through a local office that can deal face to face with the taxpayer? I personally am satisfied that this measure is justified from the standpoint of the convenience of the taxpayers alone who to the fullest possible extent should be given an opportunity to deal directly with the Government agent in order to get the benefit of his advice as to doubtful questions, and not be compelled to travel great distances or do business by mail.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. MILLS. May I have one more minute?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. I yield one more minute to the gentleman.

Mr. MILLS. From the standpoint of the Government——

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLS. I can not.

From the standpoint of the Government the decentralization in this particular case means greater efficiency and a greater opportunity to check up on the taxpaying abilities of those making returns.

Let me point out to you that in the Veterans' Bureau you created 144 local offices to deal with some 300,000 men. Yet here you are satisfied with 64 offices to deal with 10,000,000 men. In the case of the wounded veteran you had a physical injury to pass upon. In this case you have the enormous difficulty which is involved in interpreting as difficult and as complex a law as exists. I want to submit in conclusion, gentlemen, that you simply can not treat this as a proposition simply to create 10 new positions. You have got to treat it from the standpoint of the convenience of 10,000,000 taxpayers, and of Government efficiency in so far as the administration of the law is concerned. [Applause.]

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the Democratic side, of course, feels properly rebuked by the statement of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MILLS]. It is always delightful to be rebuked by gentlemen who maintain the views that the gentleman from New York entertains.

Now, as a matter of fact, no one has suggested here a single reason why it is necessary to create 10 new districts to collect less taxes than have been collected for the last four or five years, and that is the issue here. The facetiousness of it, the politics of it, may all be put aside. There has absolutely not been a reason given by any gentleman supporting this bill why it is necessary to create 10 new districts to collect less taxes than have been collected from the several districts in the last few years. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland is recognized for four minutes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I am absolutely opposed to this bill creating 10 additional internal-revenue districts, at a cost to the taxpayers of between $500,000 and $1,000,000. I had understood that this was to be a Congress for economy. But it does seem to me that more offices are being created than can possibly be found necessary under present conditions, and particularly with an overburdened people and a depleted Treasury. We have just created 23 additional Federal judges, and now you propose to add 10 more internal-revenue districts.

Certainly, as the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] has stated, if we were able to collect the taxes during the peak of taxation we ought to be able to collect them now when they are $800,000,000 less than they were formerly.

Mr. LAYTON. The gentleman [Mr. MILLS] who preceded the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] had this one argument only, and that is, you could collect more money if you had tax collectors closer to the people. If that is a good argument, logically we would have an internal-revenue collector for each of 4,000 counties in the United States.

Mr. LINTHICUM. The conclusion of the gentleman from Delaware is correct and shows the absurdity of this increase. I want to say, in addition, to the gentleman from Delaware that at the beginning the people did not understand how to make out these tax returns, but they are gradually learning and there are fewer of them now who have to be given information, and there is not a city that has a bank in it to-day that has not a man who is expert on these matters and can give the people all the information they want just as well as if they were to go to the internal-revenue office.

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN] has asked the question, Who is to get these places? I want to say I do not know whether one will be given in the vicinity of Baltimore, under the control of the Senators and Representatives of the Republican Party from the State of Maryland, but I do know that the two Republican Senators and the Republican Representatives have asked the President of the United States to give substantial recognition to our negro population in presidential appointments; and I know further that the Senators from New York have indorsed a negro by the name of Andrews as one of the internal-revenue collectors of the Empire State in the city of New York. If we have any splendid places to give out, let us recognize our people who are out of employment to the extent of some five millions.

There is no necessity for this additional number of internal-revenue districts. There is no crying need of it. It is an additional and unwarranted burden upon a people sorely oppressed, who bore the burdens during the war with great fortitude and courage. If the money was collected during all these years of heavy taxes, certainly we do not need these additional collectors at this time of falling receipts and increasing deficiency, and I certainly hope that Congress will adhere to economy. I want to say to you gentlemen on the Republican side that it is not only a reflection on your party if we depart from economy but it is a reflection on the entire Congress, because people do not differ on partisan lines when they are speaking of economy and criticizing the actions and appropriations of this Congress. [Applause.]

Let us rise above mere job hunting and patronage seeking. It is the worst kind of politics and returns to plague the giver. Let us look to economy and rights and welfare of the people. During these dark days of reconstruction simplicity and economy must surely be practiced if we would have our country emerge from its present condition of unemployment. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remaining portion of the time allotted to me to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY]. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] is recognized for four minutes.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the gentleman from New York [Mr. MILLS] with an air of finality presented what to him were reasons why we should create 10 additional internal-revenue offices and provide for the appointment of 10 new collectors of internal revenue. The gentleman from New York [Mr. MILLS] will be recalled as the gentleman who is very much opposed to taxes on excess profits of corporations making large profits, but he is perfectly willing to levy taxes on those who do not make excess profits to pay excess job holders. The gentleman from New York [Mr. MILLS] is opposed to high surtaxes on very large incomes; but he is perfectly willing that the moderate taxpayers with small incomes should have their taxes increased to create more positions to be filled by Republican campaign workers. Now, it has been demonstrated that during the year 1921 there were 20,000,000 transactions between taxpayers and collectors of internal revenue.

The Secretary of the Treasury says that the number of these transactions will decrease during the coming year from 20,000,000 to 16,000,000. Therefore he needs 10 new collectors of internal revenue? It is admitted that in the past during the war there was collected by the present number of collectors twice the amount of revenue that is being collected now, and the Secretary of the Treasury says that the income for the next fiscal year will be still less than it is now. Therefore he says he needs 10 new collectors of internal revenue.

This morning I found among some old musty papers this document, which some gentlemen may perhaps recall:

We pledge ourselves to a carefully planned readjustment to a peace-time basis and to a policy of rigid economy, to the better coordination of departmental activities, to the elimination of unnecessary officials and employees, and to the raising of the standard of individual efficiency.

This pamphlet is labeled—

PLATFORM OF THE REPUBLICAN PARTY, 1920.

We pledge ourselves to the elimination of unnecessary officials and employees.

Gentlemen, have you forgotten what elimination means? It means to reduce employees, and not to increase them. It means to take off the rolls employees instead of adding new ones.

The Republican Party, like the waiter in the restaurant, has lost its eliminator. [Laughter.]

Now, gentlemen, you Republicans promised and we Democrats promised to cut down taxes. You Republicans promised and we Democrats promised to reduce expenditures. If the Democrats were now in power the country would expect them to redeem their pledge. The Republicans were elected, and are now in power. The country, though it may not expect you to do so, wants you to keep that pledge. Democrats in Congress are outnumbered and outvoted. The Democrats can not reduce taxes because we have not the votes to do so. We can not prevent the Republicans from creating new offices, nor can we force them to reduce public expenditures. We can protest, and we solemnly and earnestly do protest.

The people are already heavily burdened with taxes. Farmers, ranchmen, merchants, business men, and others are hard pressed. Under Republican rule conditions are already distressing. Taxes are high. This Republican Congress should keep its promises. It should reduce Government employees. It should cut and cut deep. Economy, economy, and yet more economy should be the password to every committee room of this Congress.

The bill now before the House creates 10 new internal-revenue districts, with 10 new collectors of internal revenue, forces of clerks and appointees, estimated to cost the people $500,000 annually. It should never pass. It should die here, and it should die now.

As a representative of taxpayers, I challenge this Republican Congress to keep its promise to reduce expenses and to reduce taxes. Does the Republican Party believe that it is keeping that pledge when in the face of falling revenues, in the face of decreased transactions with the Internal Revenue Department, you propose by this bill to increase offices and increase expenditures to the extent of $500,000 a year? What do recent elections show unless they show that the people are dissatisfied with Republican rule?

If you are not deaf, do you not hear the rumblings out in Indiana and Illinois? If you are not blind, do you not see the handwriting yonder on the wall? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] is recognized for 15 minutes. [Applause].

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, the gentleman who just took his seat [Mr. CONNALLY of Texas] said that both the Democratic Party and the Republican Party had agreed to reduce the number of people on the Government pay roll. The Republicans have carried out that promise so far, but the Democrats did not. Before the war there were 400,000 Government employees. At the termination of the last administration there were 1,000,000 Government employees. That is the way the Democratic Party reduced the number of employees in office. Before the war there were 1,950,000 employees on the railroads. When the Government turned the roads back to their owners there were about 3,250,000 railroad employees. That is the way the Democrats reduced employees. Before the war freight was carried in this country by the railroads for seventy-two one-hundredths of a cent per ton-mile.

Now the freight rate is 1½ cents per ton-mile, or an increase of 85 per cent.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Not just now. I will yield afterwhile. But I want to say to my good friend from Oklahoma in charge of this bill that he and I seem to be in the same fix as a young fellow in church. He dropped asleep. The minister was preaching for converts. He asked all the good people that wanted to go to Heaven to stand up. Everybody in the church but that boy stood up. He was asleep. "Now," said the preacher, "please be seated"; and everybody sat down, and in sitting down somebody bumped the boy who was asleep, and by that time the minister said, "All who want to go to hell stand up." The boy heard the words "stand up" and that was all. He rose up, looked around, rubbed his eyes, and said: "Your Reverence, I don't believe I fully understood the question, but you and I seem to be in a hopeless minority here." [Laughter.]

When Mr. Roper was Commissioner of Internal Revenue he came before the Ways and Means Committee. With him came the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. McAdoo. They both stated that if we would give them $7,000,000 additional money to employ auditors, they would collect $1,000,000,000 of back taxes due the Government. The House gave them that money. This morning the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury told me that there is yet $1,000,000,000, and possibly a billion and a half dollars, of taxes due and that some of the returns for 1917 have not yet been adjusted.

The gentleman from Illinois, my beloved friend [Mr. MADDEN], who is generally right, but goes wrong sometimes as well as the rest of us do, said there was no necessity for this bill. Gentlemen have stated that it is nonsense, crazy, no sense in it. Well, they took no part in presenting it, and of course they think there is no sense in it.

Gentlemen say the revenues have fallen off and therefore we should get along with less revenue collectors. You forget that there has been no increase in the number of revenue collectors of this country for something like 15 years.

The population of the country is increasing, the number of taxpayers is increasing, and it requires as much time to audit a claim for $500 as it does for $5,000,000. Ninety-five per cent of the back taxes due now are in claims of less than $500 each. The administration, both of the present and the past, gave their attention to the settling of the large claims first and let the minor claims go by.

It has been stated, and I want you to bear it in mind, that in 1911 with the same number of collectors we have to-day there were less than 600,000 claims for tax returns. Now there are 16,000,000 claims, and at that time only one payment a year was made. Now there are four payments a year, and you expect the same collectors of internal revenue to give as prompt service with 60,000,000 reports as against less than 600,000 a short time ago.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. There must be some mistake about that. There is only one return made in a case in a year. The payment may be divided into quarterly payments, but you only send your check during the other quarters, you do not make a report.

Mr. FORDNEY. Good Lord, man, I received notice a few days ago that my tax report for 1917 was 72 cents short, and they directed me to pay up or the Government would fine me. You forget all this, and our Democratic friends always have said that the appointment to new positions is to give some one a job. That is furthest from the minds of the gentlemen that reported this bill. I suppose you are going to vote it down; that is your privilege, and you can do as you please as far as I am concerned. There is nobody here bound by anybody's say so. I want the right to exercise my own judgment and I yield that privilege to every man here and will not quarrel with you if you do.

But, gentlemen, do you forget that this $1,000,000,000 of back-due taxes is costing the Federal Government $40,000,000 a year in interest? That is 4 per cent. Do you stop to think that while you are spending a few million dollars in creating some new offices in order to expedite the collection of money due this Government you will save one hundred times that much money in interest if you would speedily settle the claims and collect the money into the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Has not the gentleman overlooked the fact that we have recently put on 800 new auditors in the department to look after the very work the gentleman speaks of?

Mr. FORDNEY. No; I was not advised of that. That may be true. If so, it is a wise move. But let me say to you Democrats—and you are a bunch of good fellows—during the early part of 1920 auditors employed by the Democratic Party who looked intelligent, although they were Democrats, were sent to my home town to audit the books of a firm that had made its report on income taxes. The first auditor sent came back with the report that the company's tax returns were correct, but the Government was not satisfied and sent another man to audit those books, and he came back and reported that the company owed the Government an additional $1,100 in taxes. The company appealed to have still another man sent. The third auditor went through the books from top to bottom and reported that the company had overpaid the Government $3,200, and those were Democratic auditors! [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to address the committee for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, it is seldom that we have the honor of having as a guest of the House one who is soon to be the chief executive of a great neighboring Commonwealth. We have the honor to-day of having with us as a visitor in the gallery, in the company of the distinguished Speaker of this House, General Pedro Nel Ospina, President-elect of the Republic of Colombia. [Applause, the Members rising.] We are all very happy to have him with us, and we wish for him a successful administration of the affairs of our great neighboring Republic. He, I am sure, joins with us in the hope that the friendly relations which have always been maintained between that splendid Republic and ours will continue under his administration and for all the years to come. We wish him and his nation well. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman withhold that for a moment before he makes the motion?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The general debate has been concluded?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Why not go ahead and consider this bill under the five-minute rule?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. A number of gentlemen were told that the matter would not come to a vote to-night.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The matter has been very thoroughly discussed, and it seems to me we might very well dispose of it. Why not let us read the bill under the five-minute rule?

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, as a matter of maintaining good faith, which we always try to do, it is important to keep faith with gentlemen who were told that the bill would not be voted on this afternoon.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Oklahoma that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee) there were—ayes 103, noes 44.

So the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas having assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. WALSH, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 10877, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make an announcement relative to the program. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], chairman of the Committee on Rules, will, I understand, to-morrow present a rule sending the so-called judges bill to conference, after which the House will consider the so-called Philippine bill, which is now under consideration as unfinished business. We hope to conclude both of those measures to-morrow.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. May we hope that the bill which has just been under consideration will be further considered to-morrow?

Mr. MONDELL. I fear that we are so busy with other matters that it will not be possible to take the bill up to-morrow. Following our usual custom of meeting the desires of the gentleman from Tennessee, however, we may some day take it up.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield? Is not the gentleman from Wyoming now willing to thank me for trying to help him out of the hole he got into this morning?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, we are progressing very nicely.

CONFERENCE REPORT—APPLICATION OF RECLAMATION LAWS TO IRRIGATION DISTRICTS.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. KINKAID. To present a conference report for printing under the rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4382) to provide for the application of the reclamation laws to irrigation districts.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Ordered to be printed under the rule.

CONFERENCE REPORT—CONTINUANCE OF CERTAIN GOVERNMENT PUBLICATIONS.

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report for printing.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report it by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate Joint Resolution 132, to provide for the continuance of certain Government publications.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Ordered printed under the rule.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to—

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee, for 10 days, on account of official business.

Mr. TUCKER, for two days, on account of important business.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks on the bill recently under consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the bill recently under consideration. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, how recently?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Well, just a few moments ago. It is now embalmed; I do not know how much chloroform has been used.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Is that the bill to create 10 new districts?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I think that is the title and purpose of the bill; that is the one.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman from New York [Mr. MILLS] agrees that is the title?

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled joint resolution and bill of the following titles:

S. J. Res. 186. Joint resolution authorizing the transfer to the jurisdiction of the Joint Committee on the Library certain reservations in the District of Columbia for use in connection with the Botanic Garden; and

S. 2440. An act extending the period for homestead entries on the south half of the diminished Colville Indian Reservation.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, May 5, 1922, at 12 o'clock noon.

CREDIT FACILITIES FOR AGRICULTURE.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I am in receipt of a letter from Des Moines, Iowa, dated May 2, 1922, and signed by L. A. Andrew, president of the Iowa Farm Credit Corporation, with reference to the establishment by the Government of adequate credit and banking facilities to meet the requirements and needs of agriculture and the live-stock raisers in the country. The letter is so very interesting that I ask that the Secretary may read it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read the communication.

The reading clerk read as follows:

IOWA FARM CREDIT CORPORATION,
Des Moines, Iowa, May 2, 1922.

Hon. F. M. SIMMONS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C,

DEAR SIR: We have been much interested in your Senate file 3390, a bill to provide credit facilities for agriculture, and we would like to know the prospects of its becoming a law, as there is great need for such a measure. We notice that three or four bills of this kind have been introduced in Congress the past month, and it is evident that the sentiment is crystallizing quite rapidly that an organization like you propose must be put in force.

The bankers all over the country, particularly in agricultural districts, have found that credit for farmers has not been adequate and could not be furnished for as long a period as the farmer must have to successfully conduct his business. In this State, which claims the honor of being the richest agricultural State in the Union, we have had a very severe time the past 16 months, and most of our troubles have come from trying to finance the farmer entirely through our commercial banks. Our bankers have found that they have had large amounts of good farm paper on which they have not been able to realize at maturity, as farmers had nothing to sell at that time which would pay their notes. Farmers of the Corn Belt must have longer and more credit to conduct their business successfully—credit which will run for from one year to three without causing ruinous liquidation.

In this State we have organized this Iowa Farm Credit Corporation with a capital of $5,000,000, of which the first million is about paid up, so that we have the machinery all ready to take advantage of the measure which you have introduced. Some bankers have raised the plan that this should be financed through the Federal reserve bank. Those who have given the matter much thought realize that it has no place in the Federal reserve system, as that should be kept in very liquid shape to take care of the commercial banking business of the country. It has no place in the Federal land bank system, as that has a field all its own which should not be disturbed with other projects. After giving considerable study to this subject, we are sure that your plan is the best one presented and is very necessary to the success of the country bank and the farmer in financing agriculture.

I would be pleased to be advised as to what you think the prospects are of getting legislation of this kind through at this session. I was talking to our superintendent of banking yesterday, and he agrees with me that such a measure as you propose would be of great help in taking care of long-time credits, which it has been almost impossible for country banks to carry at present.

Respectfully yours,

L. A. ANDREW, President.

POTOMAC ELECTRIC POWER CO. RATES.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, a few days ago the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] presented a statement with reference to the Potomac Electric Power Co. and its rates. Commissioner Keller, of the District of Columbia, has sent me a copy of the letter which he wrote to the Senator from Arizona, with the request that I have it placed in the RECORD. I have conferred with the Senator from Arizona and he is glad to have it printed in the RECORD. I ask unanimous consent that the letter, with the list of cities therein referred to, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter and the list were ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

PUBLIC UTILITIES COMMISSION OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
April 24, 1922.

Hon. HENRY F. ASHURST,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR ASHURST: I have read a statement in regard to electric power rates apparently made by you in the Senate on April 19 and reproduced on page 6218 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of that date. I feel sure you will be glad to know the exact facts as to the rates prevailing in the District of Columbia, which are, as you know, based upon the commission's valuation of the Potomac Electric Power Co.'s property used in the public service and not on its capitalization.

This valuation was made by the commission as of December 31, 1916, and amounted to $11,231,170.43 on that date. Many additions to the property have been made since that time, due to the great increase in the use of electricity, so that on December 31, 1921, the valuation, on the commission's basis, was $18,946,245.30. Following the ascertainment of the valuation of 1916, the commission reduced the rates for electric current approximately 20 per cent, the maximum rate of 10 cents per kilowatt-hour for household consumers being reduced to 8 cents. Owing to large increases in the cost of materials and labor incident to the war, it was necessary for the commission, in 1920, to increase these rates one-half cent per kilowatt-hour. Since then, however, two reductions of 5 per cent each have been made by the commission, so that the rates in effect to-day are as shown on the inclosed table.

These rates compare quite favorably with those in effect in other large cities, some of which are shown on the inclosed list.

It is true that the enforcement of the reduced rates established by the commission is prevented by an injunction of the court, pending the final decision of the courts as to the valuation of this company's property. The trial court (the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia) rendered its decision in March, 1920, sustaining the commission in every particular. The Court of Appeals in November, 1921, reversed the trial court upon the grounds that the court below did not exercise its independent judgment as to both law and facts in reviewing the decision of the commission, and that the commission erred in not considering or allowing for, in its estimate of the reproduction cost, an alleged increase in value of the company's property between July 1, 1914, and December 31, 1916, occasioned by the increased costs of labor and material consequent upon the European war. The United States Supreme Court has allowed the commission an appeal from the decision of the court of appeals and a motion to advance the hearing is now pending.

Since the injunction preventing the enforcement of the lower rates fixed by the commission in 1917 was issued by the court the electric light consumers have paid the rates in force prior to that time, but under the orders of the court the company has been compelled to set aside the difference between the two rates to await the final decision of the courts. The amount so impounded amounted to $2,364,496.23 on December 31, 1921, and is increasing at an average monthly rate of over $50,000.

The Potomac Electric Power Co. has earned on the commission's valuation and at the commission's rates for current the following return in the last five years:

	Per cent.
1917	9.45
1919	7.68
1921	8.94

I know you have no desire to create an erroneous impression as to the situation in Washington, which, while complicated by the above-described litigation as to the validity of the commission's valuation of the power company's property, yet shows that the Public Utilities Commission has exerted itself to protect the public, while at the same time not infringing the rights of the public utilities.

While exact comparisons are difficult to make so far as the commission knows, there is no place in the United States where steam-generated power is sold much, if at all, more cheaply than it is in Washington, when the cost of coal is taken into consideration.

Respectfully,

C. KELLER, Chairman.

MAILS ON SHORT LINE RAILROADS OF GEORGIA.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I am in receipt of a letter from Hon. J. A. J. Henderson, of Ocilla, Ga., the president of the Georgia Short Line Railroad Association. There are 39 of those short lines in the State of Georgia, aggregating 3,000 miles of railroad, and the income of many of them the past two years has been less than the expenses. Mr. Henderson and other business men of my State who have developed and held together these short lines in the face of the business depression we are going through have rendered our people a great service. Unless the revenue from the roads increases it will mean a great hardship to the people living on these roads. There is an effort being made to take away from them the pay they are now receiving for carrying the mails. I ask that the letter be placed in the RECORD in order to give the information contained therein.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OFFICE OF GEORGIA SHORT LINE RAILROAD ASSOCIATION,
Atlanta, Ga., May 1, 1922.

Hon. WILLIAM J. HARRIS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The Georgia Short Line Railroad Association, at a meeting held here recently, passed a resolution protesting against the establishment of mail routes which will result in taking away from the railroads of Georgia the transportation of mails, and against changes in existing mail routes so as to allow individuals or bus lines to carry the mail where the service can be performed by the railroads.

There are in Georgia 39 short-line railroads traversing 96 counties of the State and having an aggregate mileage of 2,934 miles, serving a very large percentage of the population of our State.

We are sure that you have kept up with the situation and that you realize that a large number of these railroads are at present facing a serious situation and that if they are not afforded fair, and even generous treatment, that a great number of them will inevitably have to be dismantled. Should this be done, the owners of the railroads would, of course, be heavy losers; but by far the greater loss would fall upon the citizens of the State who are served by the railroads, but not directly financially interested in them. Many towns, and even small cities, are served by the short lines only, and these are the railroads which serve the people of the rural communities where the trunk lines do not care to or can not afford to go.

A number of railroads in this State have already been junked, and others are certain to be if the conditions do not improve.

Recently, and since the public highways have been paved or improved, a very large number of what are commonly called bus lines have sprung into existence, and these lines have entered into active competition with the railroads, and especially the short-line railroads, as carriers of freight and passengers. They charge identically the same rates which the railroads are permitted to charge where they compete with the railroads, and much higher rates where there is no railroad competition. They pay no taxes in the counties through which they operate, although the railroads are required to pay heavy taxes wherever they do business.

We understand that the owners of these bus lines are now making an active effort to secure contracts for the carriage of the mail which is now being carried by the railroads. We do not think that this is fair or right, so long as the railroads furnish convenient and adequate service in this respect.

We ask that you investigate this matter, and if you can consistently do so that you use your efforts to prevent contracts for the carriage of the mails being awarded to the bus lines where adequate service is or can be furnished by the rail carriers.

We would be glad to have a letter from you regarding your attitude in this matter.

Yours very truly,

GEORGIA SHORT LINE RAILROAD ASSOCIATION.
By J. A. J. HENDERSON, President.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 2193) to amend the act entitled "An act to prohibit the importation and use of opium for other than medicinal purposes," approved February 9, 1909, as amended, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Finance.

THE TARIFF.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7456) to provide revenue, to regulate commerce with foreign countries, to encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes, the pending question being on Mr. KING's amendment to the amendment of the Committee on Finance.

The amendment was on page 2, line 10, before the word "cents," to strike out "12" and insert "18," so as to read:

Citric acid, 18 cents per pound.

The amendment to the amendment was to strike out "18" and insert "5," so as to read:

Citric acid, 5 cents per pound.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, before the Senate recessed yesterday afternoon the Senator in charge of the bill, the chairman of the Committee on Finance [Mr. MCCUMBER], made a suggestion in reference to the expedition of the business before the Senate. I listened to him with much interest, as I fully realize the situation that confronts him. I know that no man has a more difficult or laborious task than the chairman of the Committee on Finance or the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, which committees have charge of tariff bills, because each item contained in such bills is a matter of moment; somebody is interested in it; and therefore there is always unusual delay and debate. On the other hand, the chairman of the committee has to be present all the time the bill is under consideration. He is responsible for all the errors that happen in the game and gets but little credit for the good plays. So my sympathy is entirely with the Senator in charge of the pending bill.

In reference to the Senator's suggestion as to expediting the consideration of the bill, let me say that I am sure there is no effort on this side of the Chamber to filibuster or unduly delay the bill. The Senator from North Dakota and his colleagues think there will be a political asset in the passage of the bill. I am sure that they are honest in their belief about it or they would not champion the bill. On the other hand, Senators on this side of the Chamber feel equally certain that there will be a political liability to the party in power if the bill shall be passed, and that no political asset will grow out of the passage of the bill. So it seems that Senators on both sides of the Chamber are perfecty willing to go to the country and face the issue in the country on the bill, and neither side cares for a delay on that account.

However, what I rose to call the attention of the Senator in charge of the bill to is this: I served for a good many years on the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives and know something about handling tariff bills. This bill comes before the Senate in a very unusual attitude. As a rule, in the past, it has required three or four months for the consideration of a tariff bill. I think more than 3,000 amendments have been reported to this bill by the Committee on Finance. If I am not accurate in that statement, I hope the Senator from North Dakota will correct me; but, as I understand, there are upward of 3,000 amendments which have been reported to the bill. Those amendments are material. Most of them either affect the rate of duty at the customhouse or involve legislation that will directly affect the rate of duty. The very fact that the Finance Committee has reported these amendments demonstrates that, in their judgment, they are material. Being material, it is entirely natural that there should be those in the United States who are opposed to the position of the Finance Committee in reporting the amendments, and if they are, it is perfectly natural that they should in a perfectly legitimate way seek some Senator on the floor of the Senate to voice their views and to express their opposition to the amendments.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, as to the number of amendments to the pending bill which have been reported to the Senate by the Committee on Finance, I wish to say to the Senator from Alabama that the great majority of them have been made necessary because of the change of the basis of valuation in the bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I realize that, but that does not change the result. Of course, I realize, while many of the rates in the House bill are not, on their face, as high as those fixed in the Senate committee amendments, yet, on account of the basis of valuation for the determination of the rates in the House bill being the American wholesale valuation instead of the foreign valuation, many of the House rates are really higher than the rates proposed by the Senate committee. I fully realize the truth of what the Senator from Utah states, but that does not change the situation.

Those who do not desire a high protective tariff—and this bill is a high protective measure in most of its rates—naturally will contend that the Senate committee rates should be reduced. They will desire that the House rates be adopted and at the same time that the Senate committee amendment, providing for foreign valuation, also be agreed to. Right or wrong, that is human nature. I am not now discussing the merits of the measure; I am discussing the question which the Senator from North Dakota suggested last night.

Most of the items of amendment reported by the Senate Finance Committee will be more or less contested. Then when, under the unanimous-consent agreement which the Senator in charge of the bill asked for and obtained to act primarily, in the first instance, on the amendments of the committee, the Senate shall dispose of those amendments, there being over 3,000 of them; then, of course, there will be individual amendments offered to the bill, for the bill involves the great industries of America. There will be, of necessity, amendments offered from the other side of the Chamber by individual Senators who may be interested in a particular matter; and undoubtedly amendments will be offered from this side of the Chamber, entirely independent of the Senate committee amendments. Such amendments will be offered in good faith and without any desire to delay the passage of the bill.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama yield to me?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. MCCUMBER. In order that it may not go out that the amendments which have been reported from the Committee on Finance to the Senate amount to 3,000 in number, the exact number, I am informed, is 2,082, and the greater number of those, as has already been suggested by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], grow out of the change from an ad valorem rate on the American valuation basis, as is proposed in the bill as it comes from the other House, to an ad valorem rate upon the foreign valuation.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I realize that. I have just said that.

Mr. KING. If the Senator from Alabama will pardon me, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], in the statement which he has just now made, is including a number of items which are all contained in one basket clause?

Mr. MCCUMBER. Yes; I was speaking simply of the number of amendments.

Mr. KING. So that if we should segregate the items in the basket clauses the number of amendments would be in excess of that stated by the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. MCCUMBER. In that case the number would not only be in excess of what I have stated, but it would be multiplied several times.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Undoubtedly. However, whether the amendments be counted according to one method, making the number over 3,000, or counted by the other method, making the number over 2,000, I will assume that the committee amendments number 2,000. I will also assume that the Senate committee amended most of these items because they changed the valuation basis; but that has nothing to do with the discussion. Those who want a lower tariff rate than proposed by the committee will naturally and properly and legitimately contend for that lower rate as against the higher rate.

If the number of amendments aggregates only 2,000, and each amendment is only debated an hour on the average, that would make 2,000 hours of debate, and if the Senate should remain in session from 11 o'clock in the morning until 9 o'clock in the evening, giving 10 hours to a day, which would be about as long as it would be possible for the Senator in charge of the bill to work the Senate, it would require 200 legislative days to complete the consideration of the amendments. Therefore it is apparent that, without any filibuster, with perfectly good temper on both sides of the Chamber, with a desire on both sides to indulge only in legitimate debate, it is going to be very difficult for the Senator in charge of the bill to get it through this body for a long time to come.

I am not desirous of having night sessions held; of course, none of us is; it is rather a burden on us; but I will say to the Senator that, so far as I am concerned, under the conditions, whenever he says that he thinks it is necessary for night sessions to be held, I will be perfectly willing to cooperate with him, because I realize the condition which is facing his bill.

I am opposed to his bill; I hope it will be defeated; I think the passage of his bill will defeat his party in the coming election; but, nevertheless, his party is in power; they are proposing this legislation, and they are entitled, after due consideration, to have an opportunity to vote on it. If, however, the Senator will allow me, I wish to admonish him that he must not fall out with this side of the Chamber if delays occur, because delays are inherent in the body of the bill itself. The amendments proposed by the committee of necessity are going to cause delay, and they will be followed in good faith by individual amendments after the committee amendments shall have been disposed of. So I think, if we are going to dispose of this bill before the summer, the burden will rest on the Senator in charge of the bill to see that extraneous matters do not come before the Senate. I can not keep them out; I am not in charge of the legislation here. The Senator is in charge of it, and his party is responsible. If he wants a reasonably early consideration of the bill and an opportunity to vote on it before election day comes, he has got to take the burden—and it is an unpleasant burden and the task is a difficult one—on his shoulders, as no one else can, to see that the time of the Senate, except as to such legislation as may come before the body by unanimous consent, is confined to the consideration of the tariff bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator, if he will allow me, that what he has stated this morning is entirely in line with my suggestion of yesterday. I know that there are a great many amendments reported to the bill, and I know that the time will come when the Senate will want to adjourn. I am anxious that we discuss the amendments and the bill just as long as may be necessary. I tried to admonish Senators yesterday that they ought to quit talking about irrelevant matters. We discussed yesterday and the day before questions which were not before the Senate, and, in a recent instance, about three-quarters of the day was consumed in discussing a subject that had already been voted upon. That was simply taking time that ought to have been given to the consideration of the tariff bill. In the very best of humor and spirit, I have tried to cooperate with Senators upon the other side and upon this side of the Chamber to keep out all extraneous matters, in order that we might give our undivided attention to the tariff bill before us. Of course, there will be other bills of an emergency nature to which we will have to give way, such as appropriation bills and conference reports on appropriation bills, which will come before the Senate. Naturally, to them we will yield, in order that they may be disposed of; but I ask Senators to conform to the suggestion the Senator from Alabama has just made and to meet the expectations of the country that we will dispose as promptly as possible of the tariff bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. KING. The Senator adverted to the discussion the other day of considerable length dealing with a matter which the Senator says had been disposed of anterior to the discussion. Let me say that the question of leasing the naval oil reserves is important. Frequently extraneous but very important questions arise during the consideration of a bill of paramount importance, and the Senator must not complain if there are occasional diversions in the consideration of the bill now before us.

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] yesterday considered that the Semenoff incident and the status of Mr. Bakhmeteff, the reputed ambassador, indeed, probably the de facto if not the de jure ambassador, from Russia, were questions of sufficient importance to bring to the attention of the Senate and the country. Senators have a right to present matters which they regard as worthy of consideration, though the Senator from North Dakota and myself might view them as rather inconsequential. Some persons attribute to current questions an importance which others do not perceive, but the former may be right and the latter wrong. We must therefore exercise the utmost amity and friendliness and cooperation in the disposition of the public business.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. KING. The Senator from North Dakota has the floor.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator has just taken his seat.

Mr. KING. I yield, then.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator will recall that yesterday another very important matter was under discussion. Of course, the tariff is an important question, but the question of who is appointed to administer the affairs of the Government is also a very important question to the American people. On yesterday there was read into the record an article, and a speech was made by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER], touching the nomination of a Mr. Goldstein, who had taken $2,500 in order to deliver delegates to the last Republican convention and deposited that sum to his credit, and now he is to be rewarded by appointment to an important position in the State of Missouri by this administration. Is not that of sufficient importance to call the attention of the country to, if we are to have that kind of men put upon us here—men who accept money to deliver delegates in a Republican convention?

Mr. KING. That is an important matter and deserves our attention, but the remarks of the Senator bring to my mind another matter which, in my opinion, calls for immediate consideration and action upon the part of the Senate. The matter to which I refer relates to the appointment by the President of the United States of Mr. E. Mont Reily to an important position; and the selection of Mr. Reily, who, in my opinion, is unsuited for the high position for which he was named, seems to support the view that the President too often makes selections for important positions from among those who claim the distinction of being "original Harding men" or were enthusiastic and indeed vociferous supporters of the President for the nomination. Mr. Reily, it is claimed, was one of the "original Missouri Harding men." He was named for the position of Governor of Porto Rico. His appointment by the President, in my opinion, was not welcomed by the Senate, but he was confirmed and immediately entered upon the duties of his office.

His career in Porto Rico has been turbulent, his administration unsatisfactory, and his conduct offensive to the great majority of the bona fide residents of Porto Rico. There have been turmoil and controversies and contentions ever since he reached the island, and there has developed a profound resentment upon the part of the people of Porto Rico, not only against Mr. Reily but it has extended to the administration itself. I might with entire accuracy go further and say that it is producing irritation against the Government itself.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. Let me proceed for a moment. In my opinion it will be for the best interests of the people of Porto Rico for Mr. Reily to resign, and if he does not resign, I think the President should name some other person for the position of Governor of Porto Rico.

Some time ago I introduced a bill which is now pending before the Committee on Territories and Insular Possessions, which has for its object the granting to the people of Porto Rico greater political rights and authority. Porto Rico is their home. They were there before the United States took possession of the island, following the War with Spain. We should regard the circumstances under which the flag of the United States was raised over Porto Rico and the island brought within the control and authority of the United States.

The Porto Ricans are an intelligent, progressive, and proud people. Their island belonged to the Kingdom of Spain and was wrested from Spain by force of arms. The conditions under which the people passed from the sovereignty of Spain and under the control of this Government must ever be kept in mind in dealing with Porto Rico and her people. They differ racially from the overwhelming majority of the American people. They have their traditions, their culture, their language, and their laws and institutions. I believe that they sincerely desire the most cordial relations between themselves and the people residing within the States of the Union. They honor and love the flag of this Republic, and I believe that they are proud to be embraced within the territorial possessions of this great Republic. But they feel that they should have something to say concerning their own domestic affairs and the persons who are placed in authority. The people of Porto Rico will love and respect the Constitution of the United States and the institutions of this great Republic if our Government accords to them proper consideration.

I lived in a Territory, and I resented the course of Presidents. They sent men to govern in Territories and to occupy high positions without the slightest regard for the wishes of the people. That should no longer be done; and Territories, particularly where the inhabitants are different in language and in race from those who reside in continental America, should not have imposed upon them as officials persons who are not in sympathy with the people, who are unacquainted with their language, and particularly who are objectionable to the people themselves.

Mr. Reily was not appointed because of his competency or his acquaintance with the island or the people but because of his political and partisan services. Mr. President, the matter of the appointment and retention of Mr. Reily is a live question and one which will recur again and again so long as the President keeps him in the island.

Mr. WILLIS and Mr. McCUMBER addressed the Chair.

Mr. KING. Permit me to yield first to the Senator from Ohio, who rose a moment ago.

Mr. WILLIS. I simply want to direct the Senator's attention to the statement he made touching appointments by the President of the United States. I understood him to say that they were personal partisans of the President, and the Senator referred to the appointment of Governor Reily. I trust he will not forget, in that connection, that the other important governorship filled by the President was filled by the appointment of his chief opponent, Gen. Leonard Wood, as Governor General of the Philippines. That disposes of the Senator's argument that these are appointments of personal partisans.

Mr. KING. The Senator may eulogize the appointment of General Wood. I do not. I do not believe in appointing military men for civil positions of the character referred to. I think it is a mistake to select a man from the Army and intrust him with the civil administration of the affairs of the Philippine Islands, as it was a mistake to send Colonel Russell to Haiti to exercise more or less of political or governmental authority. General Wood is a man of the highest character and integrity, and according to the ideas of many was equipped to discharge the duties of the high office of Chief Executive of the United States; but it is my view that military men are not the best suited to preside over a great Republic such as this is, nor are they the finest appointments for high civil positions among an alien race. Great Britain has found her best colonial governors not in the army but from among her civil lists. Occasionally some military man has the qualities needed to govern an alien people, but I think these cases constitute the exception.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I think the Senator will admit that it would not take a very high degree of executive ability to exceed that which characterized the predecessor of General Wood as Governor of the Philippines, because if there ever was an administration that set awry and wrecked a government and left it bankrupt, it was the administration of Governor Harrison in the Philippines. Governor Wood has gone there and has brought order out of chaos.

Mr. KING. The Senator will understand I am not disparaging General Wood, whose fine qualities and great patriotism I am happy to pay tribute to. I am speaking generally of the system, not of individuals. In a democracy there is less reason for military governors and military officers for the execution of civil and governmental powers than in a monarchy or in governments which have large colonial possessions. Theoretically we hold no territory in which the rights of the people are not the same as those enjoyed by all Americans who reside under the flag. If there are Territories, they are to be admitted into the Union as sovereign States. That is the theory of this Government. It was never designed that this Republic should hold millions of alien peoples in subjection and deny to them the full privileges of citizenship and the full rights that appertain to citizens of sovereign States. Military government is less defensible with us than it would be with empires or nations who possess colonies and govern millions of subject peoples.

I do not agree with the Senator as to the alleged chaotic condition in the Philippine Islands. There were some fiscal problems and difficulties in the Philippine government. I have no doubt that when we come to a discussion of the Philippine Islands, and the record of Governor Harrison while there, there will be very much to his credit, and if errors have been committed I feel sure that Governor Harrison will be found free from culpability. Under his administration there was progress in the islands. The people developed intellectually and morally. They increased in wealth and greatly added to the prosperity of the archipelago. Indeed, under Governor Harrison's administration the progress of the islands was remarkable.

The people, of course, should not be judged by the same standards as are applied to the Anglo-Saxon race or to those in this Republic, who have had advantages that perhaps have been denied to other peoples of the world. But the record of moral and educational advancement made by the Filipinos entitles them to great credit.

It is time we should redeem our promises and accord to them a government of their own choice, which will be, in my judgment, a republic fashioned after the pattern of this Nation.

Mr. McCUMBER and Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair desires to say at this moment that there is a rule of the Senate which restricts Senators to two speeches on the same legislative day upon the same question, and the present occupant of the Chair will feel it his duty to enforce that rule. The Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I have felt all along that we could get along without enforcing that rigid rule. I was unable yesterday to connect up the matter of the recognition of Mr. Bakhmeteff as ambassador from Russia and the League of Nations discussion with the citric acid amendment. They seemed to me to have no very close relation, and I can not see that the discussion of the matter of Indiana politics had any very close relation to the citric acid amendment, nor have I been able to realize any close relation of what has been said this morning on these extraneous matters with the citric acid amendment. That is the real question that is before the Senate, and while with the best of good nature and the best of intentions the leader on the other side of the Chamber has indicated his willingness and his desire that the Senator in charge of this bill should hold strictly to the matter under consideration, I had hoped that his good advice would be taken early this morning on the other side of the Chamber and on this side and that I would not be asked to make an objection because a Senator had spoken twice on the same day upon the same subject. I do hope now, however, that we can proceed to the discussion of the amendment that is now before the Senate—namely, the amendment concerning citric acid—and vote upon it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I am persuaded to indulge in a few remarks, because I feel that what has been said by implication means that there has been some intentional injection of extraneous matters, resulting in delay in the consideration of this bill, when, as a matter of fact, nothing in the situation as it has developed up to this time justifies such an imputation.

I know it is true that we have nominally had before the Senate for quite a little while the amendments proposed by the Finance Committee and we have acted upon only two or three of them; but, Mr. President, that is not unusual in connection with tariff bills. I think when the Underwood bill was under consideration in the Senate it was probably nearly three weeks before we began to vote upon amendments at all. That bill was made in the open. Senators knew what it contained some considerable time in advance of its being reported, and as soon as it was reported to the Senate they were ready to enter upon a general discussion such as ordinarily precedes voting upon such great and important measures of legislation. The pending bill, Mr. President, was prepared by the majority members of the committee in secret executive session, and the amendments they adopted, numbering over 2,000, were not known until the morning of the day upon which the bill was reported to the Senate. Senators therefore had had no opportunity to study the bill and prepare themselves for general discussion. As a result, instead of having a general discussion of this bill for two or three or four weeks, as is customary, we had to proceed in a few days to the consideration of specific amendments.

Now it is complained that since we reached the consideration of amendments the time of the Senate has been devoted to general discussion. That may be true, Mr. President, but it was general discussion that was held in abeyance by reason of the fact that this bill was framed in secret.

While other tariff bills have been framed in the open, so that we were ready to debate and discuss them and conclude the general discussion almost immediately upon their presentation to the Senate, in this case we have not been able to do it. For that reason we have reached the amendments at an earlier stage; but, Mr. President, the general discussion will have to proceed.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I should like to ask the Senator from North Carolina, who is the leader of the minority of the Finance Committee, if the practice of drafting bills in secret has not become prevalent in that committee? I note by the morning paper that the adjusted compensation bill has been drafted in secret by the majority members, and is to be submitted to the President for his approval, and then, I suppose, to be submitted to the Senate.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not desire to enter into that line of discussion, although I entirely sympathize with the suggestions made by the Senator. I was only discussing that fact in connection with the circumstance that we were not ready, and could not in the nature of things have been ready, to enter upon the general discussion of this bill immediately upon its presentation. General discussion of bills of this character, Mr. President, is not only inevitable but it is very proper. It helps in reaching an understanding as to the items upon which we are to vote, and that understanding contributes toward the facilitation of action with reference to those items.

It is necessary, if we are to act intelligently in casting our votes, that we should understand the general principles upon which the bill is framed, the object in view, and the effect of the tax impositions upon the people of the country and their business. That we can reach only by general discussion. It is not only highly important, therefore, that we have general discussion, but it is necessary that we should have it. There was no opportunity for general discussion before we entered upon the consideration of the schedules. The Senator who is in charge of this bill, I think, will recognize that it is to be expected, as we proceed, that Senators, as they are prepared to deliver general speeches upon this bill, will do so, and the fact that they do deliver them and that their delivery will consume a considerable length of time ought not to be attributed to any desire or purpose to delay action.

I have assured the Senator, not once but twice, that there was no purpose on this side of the Chamber unnecessarily to prolong discussion or in any way to delay speedy action upon his bill. I have said to him frankly, and I meant it, that if this bill must pass, as soon as we have had time to discuss it sufficiently to inform the people as to its provisions and to inform Senators as to what it means so that they may vote intelligently, we will do nothing to delay action; but, on the other hand, we will cooperate with him in securing just as speedy action as is consistent within these limitations.

It is not the purpose of this side to demand discussion on every item in the bill. It is not our purpose to demand yea and nay votes upon every item in the bill. We do desire, however, that in each schedule certain outstanding items, which illustrate the general scheme of customs taxation as exemplified in that particular schedule, shall be given thorough discussion, in order that we may act intelligently upon the other items in that schedule without the elaborate discussion which we deem necessary with respect to the more important and outstanding items.

So the fact that we have had considerable discussion upon the two or three items upon which we have acted does not at all indicate that we are to have the same character of discussion upon all the items in the schedule we are now considering.

Mr. President, while I agree in the main with the statements of the Senator from Alabama, I must express my dissent from what I may term one suggestion on his part. I can not believe that serious consideration will be given to the suggestion, even though it may be necessary in order to secure as quick action upon this bill as the majority desire, that we resort to the expedient of night sessions. I know we have done that frequently, Mr. President, and I believe in many instances it has worked well; but we have done that where we all felt that night sessions would have to be held for only a few nights, and that as a result of holding a limited number of night sessions we would tide over the difficulties which lay between us and final action. Evening sessions have been resorted to, therefore, simply as an emergency proceeding, to accomplish an act which we all felt ought to be accomplished, and when it involved foregoing our comfort and convenience for only a few nights.

To apply the night-session rule to a bill that is probably going to be here for discussion for three or four months, in my judgment, is unthinkable. It is true that many Senators who are not actively engaged in the discussions and who are not charged with special responsibility with reference to the legislation might stand up under such a strain, but I can not understand how it would be possible for the majority members of the Committee on Finance, as well as the minority members of that committee, who have responsibilities which other Senators do not have in connection with this legislation, after working here all day to remain here night after night during the period that would be necessary to pass the tariff bill.

I will cooperate with the Senator in any way that is consistent with the physical ability of Senators, but that suggestion would involve, in my judgment, a scheme that the physical abilities of Senators who are engaged actively in the consideration of this bill would be unable to stand, and I trust that no such action as that is contemplated. It is not necessary, Mr. President. It never has been resorted to in the consideration of a bill of this kind. I will cooperate with the Senator in every time-saving device he may suggest that is consistent with reasonable debate except that, but I will not agree to that. When we are nearing the end, I shall not object to a few night sessions, but I do not think the suggestion should receive consideration at this stage of the consideration of this bill.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I understand the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] desires to take the floor to discuss the pending amendment. While waiting for him, and to save calling the roll, may I ask the Senator from North Dakota whether it is contemplated that a favorable report will be made to the Senate shortly on the soldiers' compensation bill, and whether this tariff legislation will be set aside for a discussion of that bill?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I will say that that is the purpose. I want to correct the statement which the Senator made this morning, however, that the majority of the committee had adopted an amended bill. That is not the case. I myself have made a number of suggestions, and in order to have the matter brought before the committee I have prepared an amendment to the bill as it passed the House, and that will be presented not only to Republicans but to Democrats as well, as I want to get something, as I have stated, which will be satisfactory to the Congress, to the Executive, to the American soldiers, and to the public; and to get all those things into one bill may be a little difficult.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. How long does the Senator think it will be before the bill can be reported to the Senate?

Mr. McCUMBER. I hope we shall be able to report it within a week.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. When the bill is reported to the Senate, the Senator proposes to lay aside the tariff bill in order to have that measure considered?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes. I assume that it will not take more than a day or two at most to dispose of it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I wish to ask a question of the Senator from North Dakota. I suppose the Senator thinks he has a majority in the Chamber to pass the soldiers' bonus bill, and probably he has; but I am sure he does not think the bill can be passed without considerable debate. That will be impossible. If the Senator sets the example of laying aside this bill for the consideration of other measures, measures which are contested, I am sure he can not expect much cooperation from other Senators to aid him in securing the early passage of the tariff bill.

That is just what I pointed to a moment ago. Unless the chairman of the committee in charge of this bill expects to put its nose to the wall and hold it there until it is passed, I am sure that he can not expect very much progress, because if a Senator can lay it aside for a bill in which he is interested, of course other Senators will want to lay it aside for bills in which they are interested.

I am not discussing the merits of the soldiers' bonus bill. The Senator knows I am opposed to the bill, as I know he is in favor of it. However, our position in the matter is not material. If the Senator can set the example of laying aside this bill to take up a bill in which he is interested, how does he expect other Members of the Senate not to follow his example?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I have said that I suppose there will be important measures, measures we ought to dispose of, which will come up from time to time, for which the tariff bill will be temporarily laid aside. That will necessarily occur. I have not stated that there shall be no business in the Senate with the exception of the tariff bill until that is passed. The Senate itself determines that matter. The chairman of the Committee on Finance does not even determine the question as to whether the compensation bill will come up, but it is a very important measure, and a measure on which the American people want a decision. I think it is the desire of the vast majority of the Senate to take that bill up at some time in the very near future and dispose of it, and not to wait until we can finally dispose of the tariff bill, which the Senator from North Carolina has intimated might take four months. I do not think it will take that long a time; I do not think it will take half that time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, this is all I want to say to the Senator. I am not in charge of this tariff bill, and, of course, I am opposed to it. I have no desire whatever to delay its consideration. I am willing to cooperate in reaching an early disposition of the bill, but if the chairman of the committee in charge of the tariff bill is going to admit on the floor right in the beginning of the consideration of the bill that he is prepared to lay it aside for other matters which he considers to be of more importance, all I wish to say to him is that when the hot days of July and August come and the tariff bill is still pending here, as it will be if he pursues that course, I do not want him to call in question the action of this side of the Chamber, for, as surely as he pursues that course, we will not pass the tariff bill before the dog days are over.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I desire to say that the Senate has charge of all measures before it, and the Senate itself must decide when any measure is of sufficient importance to justify laying aside any bill which is then pending. Undoubtedly the Senate will follow the course it has always pursued when we have a bill before us which we know will take months, and allow that bill to be laid aside for the consideration of important legislation.

I am not so much afraid, let me say to the Senator, of bills coming up and taking time as I am of the discussion of so many matters that have no relation whatever to the business before the Senate. That is where we are killing time. I do not believe when we get down to it that there will be very much trouble between the Senator and myself as to what will be before the Senate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator is in favor of laying aside the tariff bill for the consideration of measures in which he is interested, but he is not in favor of other Senators talking about matters in which they are interested.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not think the Senator is justified in making that statement.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course, the Senator is right in the proposition that the matter is in the last analysis controlled by the Senate, but the Senate on matters of this kind acts through its leader. The Senator in charge of the tariff bill is the leader of the Senate on this question, and his personal attitude toward the bill which he has in charge will govern the situation. If he declares in the beginning that he is prepared to lay aside the tariff bill for the consideration of other measures, he can not take only the measures in which he is interested. Other Senators will be interested in measures which they will want to bring up, and the Senator from North Dakota will demoralize his column before he starts.

The Senator knows that just as well as I do. If the Senator wants to do it, it is his responsibility; let him go ahead and do it; but when the hot days of July and August come I want to tell the Senator right now not to point his finger to this side of the Chamber and charge us with delays on the tariff bill if he proposes to start in the beginning to pursue a course of procedure which will inevitably lead to delay.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have at least 25 or 30 bills in which I am greatly interested, but I am not going to call up any one of them. However, I think that the soldiers' compensation bill will be called up, and it will be called with almost a unanimous vote on the part of the Senate.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator will have some assistance from this side of the Chamber when that matter comes up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] has been called from the Chamber. He is very much interested in the item which is now before the Senate for consideration. In his absence I shall ask that it be temporarily passed over, if that meets the view of the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. I did not hear the Senator, as there is some confusion in the Chamber.

Mr. KING. The Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], as the Senator from North Dakota knows, has been called from the Chamber to take part in the proceedings of the Committee on Patents. He is interested in the item now before the Senate, citric acid, and in his absence I ask that it may be temporarily passed over. When he returns to the Chamber I am willing that we shall return to that item.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator from California is ready to return to the Chamber whenever I send word to him that the citric acid amendment is to be taken up. If the Senator desires, however, just to pass it over temporarily, and discuss some other feature of the bill, there is no objection to that course.

Mr. KING. If the Senator from California is ready to come, I would just as soon proceed now with the citric acid item.

Mr. McCUMBER. Very well; I shall send for him.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Arkansas or does he yield the floor?

Mr. KING. I called attention to the fact that the Senator from California is not here, but he has been sent for, and I yield the floor until he comes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas is recognized.

ATTORNEY GENERAL DAUGHERTY.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, as soon as the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] comes into the Chamber I shall yield the floor.

I wish to have placed in the RECORD, because they were sent to me I presume with that expectation, a telegram and an open letter dealing with the Attorney General's connection with the Morse case. The telegram is from Mr. Charles W. Morse, the pardoned man; the open letter is from Mr. H. L. Scaife, an investigator, or was, in the Department of Justice, as I understand.

Before I present them, however, I call attention to an interview in the Washington Post of this morning purporting to be an interview with the Attorney General, in the headlines of which it is said:

Cites letters from Taft and Wickersham clearing him in Morse pardon case.

In the interview the Attorney General says the Morse case was threshed out when he, Daugherty, was a candidate for the United States Senate and settled "satisfactorily." I think it was. The way it was settled reminds me of the man in my country who was trying to marry into a good family and was asked concerning a matter that had come up in the church of which he had been a member. He said, "That matter was settled some years ago, and settled 'entirely satisfactorily.'" He was asked how, and said, "Oh, they turned me out." The Morse case was "settled satisfactorily" when Daugherty was a candidate for the Senate, whenever that was, because he was beaten by a tremendous majority for the office. If that is a satisfactory way to Daugherty to settle the question, it seems to have been also settled satisfactorily. The Attorney General has said as much as one could say without admitting that he got the fee and that he ought not to have taken it. He might just as well confess now as later.

He ought, however, as I said yesterday, to admit that he told the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] that he did not have any connection with the case, in order to relieve from embarrassment the Senator from Indiana. In the presence of myself and another Democratic Senator a Republican Senator told me yesterday that the Attorney General also told him that he had no connection with this case. He ought also to relieve that Senator from any embarrassment in the matter by saying that when he made that statement he was not candid.

Mr. President, in this latest so-called answer the Attorney General says that the real people in interest "have not yet shown their hands or their heads." I do not know to whom he refers. Nobody is the instigator of my conduct in the matter, if he has any reference to me. No one but Felder and Morse have tried to set me right, and they both are bosom friends of the Attorney General. I came into the case, as I explained on yesterday, rather by accident. I was repeating what I understood was a fact, when the Senator from Indiana denied it, and the controversy arose.

Of course, all now know I was correct. The Attorney General, however, now says that if it does not stop he is going to tell the "real facts." I am curious to know what he means by "the real facts." If he means he did not tell the truth when he made a statement of the case to the Senator from Indiana, he need not do so, because all now know he was not telling the "real facts" then. If he did not tell the truth when he made the statement to the newspaper in Ohio in 1912, just after he procured the pardon, he ought to say so. He says he will tell the real facts if he is not let alone. I want him to tell the real facts, whatever they may be. Incidentally, he says he will expose somebody. That is not exactly his language, but it is its intent, and I will put his interview in the RECORD, so that it may speak for itself. I am curious to know whom he is going to expose. Is he going to expose the President for appointing him? Is he going to expose the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] for defending him? Is he going to expose the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] for rising in his defense? Is he going to expose T. B. Felder for writing a letter showing that he employed him and that they were close personal and professional friends? Is he going to expose Morse for sending me a telegram this morning offering to explain how it was that the pardon was granted?

Mr. President, the Attorney General now owes it to himself to say what he means when he says that if we keep on fooling with him he will tell the truth about this one matter, and that if he is hectored he will expose somebody. I want now to know what the truth is and whom he is going to expose. We shall wait with some interest for the Attorney General to make the threat good that he will tell the truth about this matter and that he will expose somebody if he is not let alone.

Mr. President, without objection, I wish to insert in the RECORD the interview with the Attorney General.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

ATTORNEY GENERAL ANSWERS CHARGES—CITES LETTERS FROM TAFT AND WICKERSHAM CLEARING HIM IN MORSE PARDON CASE—WARNS WILL BARE ALL FACTS—DECLARES REAL PEOPLE BEHIND ATTACKS ON HIM HAVE NOT SHOWN THEIR HANDS.

[By the Associated Press.]

Declaration was made by Attorney General Daugherty yesterday that should Democratic discussion in the Senate of his connection with the release in 1912 of Charles W. Morse, New York shipbuilder, from Atlanta Federal penitentiary, continue he would make known "the facts." He coupled with this the assertion that "the real people behind this movement, aside from the partisans interested, have not yet shown their hands or their heads."

Shortly after the Attorney General had made his declaration in a formal statement Senator CARAWAY (Democrat), of Arkansas, who has been leading the discussion, renewed his accusations, declaring, despite denials made by Mr. Daugherty's friends since the matter was brought up, Mr. Daugherty at the time of Morse's release "took credit" for obtaining the Executive clemency. The Senator read an interview published in a Columbus (Ohio) newspaper at the time of Morse's pardon, in which Mr. Daugherty, then practicing law in Ohio, was quoted as having said he sought the release of the present shipbuilder so that the financial affairs of a steamship company in which the imprisoned man was interested could be straightened out.

SAYS TAFT ANSWERED CHARGES.

"I will never discuss politics," said Mr. Daugherty in his statement, "but there is little of interest to be said in regard to the article appearing in the newspapers regarding the discussions in the Senate and elsewhere, which constitute an attack upon the administration and naturally an attack upon the Department of Justice. This may be expected from time to time.

"The Morse case of years ago was fully discussed in the newspapers when I was a candidate for United States Senator in Ohio. At that time President Taft and Mr. Wickersham wrote signed letters which immediately stopped discussion and conclusively answered all charges that were made or that ever would be made for any purpose whatsoever. These two letters are in my files and if there is occasion for it I shall send for them and they will be republished.

"The real people behind this movement, aside from the partisans interested, have not yet shown their hands or their heads. Their activities are well known and their purposes are well known. In due time it will all be revealed. The Department of Justice naturally will not be popular with persons who are being brought and will be brought to justice in due course. No activities of the Department of Justice will be inspired or conducted to help any political party. We are not much interested in years ago; that is a thing of the past and was entirely cleared up. What we are now interested in is the Remorse case and others.

"When the facts are fully known we would not expect even the persons now being used for purposes which they do not suspect to ever refer to the matter again."

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, before inserting in the RECORD the telegram from Mr. Morse I wish to say that in 1915 Mr. Justice Siddons was nominated by the President as a justice of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia. His nomination came to the Senate, but his confirmation was held up by the Republicans on the charge that he had offered to accept a fee to represent a man in prison who wanted a pardon. It was then such a heinous offense that had not Mr. Siddons shown that he had absolutely no knowledge of the matter, and had nothing to do with it, I presume he would have been denied confirmation as a justice of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia. Now, according to the Senator from Indiana, it is entirely proper for a lawyer to take a fee of that kind, and it does not reflect upon the Attorney General that he had such a reputation for doing those things that a man away down in Georgia, needing an attorney of that kind, went up to Ohio to get him. It is merely curious, Mr. President, how it is so heinous for a Democrat representing a man seeking a pardon to obtain a fee and is so laudable if the man who does the same thing is a Republican. That is not quite all of the Siddons case, but so long as the record is confidential I can not read it.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to insert in the RECORD the telegram from Mr. Morse, who got the pardon, because I rather think I was expected to do it. I think the Attorney General ought to feel grateful for the telegram, because it comes so nobly to his rescue. I take it that Mr. Morse fears he will need the Attorney General again and therefore hastens to his defense, and his defense is ardent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The telegram referred to is as follows:

BATH, ME., May 4, 1922.

Senator CARAWAY,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

If the press has correctly quoted you, you have been misinformed regarding my physical condition at Atlanta at present time. The commutation accorded me was based wholly on my physical condition as reported to President Taft and General Wickersham by four nurses from Walter Reed Hospital under whose surveillance I was two months at Fort McPherson, and four physicians, I think, from Surgeon General's Office in Washington, whose names I never knew and whom I never heard from, either directly or indirectly, before or since. No physician gave me encouragement of recovery except Dr. Machiafasta, of Rome. Last fall X-rays taken in New York, also Naval Hospital in Washington, showed my left kidney filled with stones, and surgeons wished to operate at once. Being anxious to consult Machiafasta before operation, was on my way to Rome when asked by Department of Justice to return, which I did at once. Have been trying unsuccessfully to secure passports that I may proceed to Rome and consult him.

CHAS. W. MORSE.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I also wish to put into the RECORD a letter to Attorney General Daugherty written by Mr. H. L. Scaife. I present this letter without comment other than to say that Mr. Scaife was formerly connected with the Department of Justice, having been one of the inspectors of that department who was relieved of his office because it seems that he wanted to do his duty. And incidentally I understand he is both an intelligent and an honest man.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

5419 FORTY-FIRST STREET NW.,
Washington, D. C., May 3, 1922.

Hon. HARRY M. DAUGHERTY,
Attorney General, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: On April 11 Representative ROY O. WOODRUFF presented to Congress official records showing the failure of the Department of Justice to function in certain whisky frauds and war-graft cases, and that you had ignored a resolution adopted by the House of Representatives nearly two years ago requesting the Attorney General to "institute investigations before grand juries for the purpose of indicting and prosecuting such persons as are guilty of criminal conduct, and to institute civil suits for the recovery of any Government funds which have been fraudulently or illegally paid." The records show that your assistant, Mr. Abram F. Myers, has announced that the cases which were referred to in this resolution have been closed.

The records will show that various cases which were prepared for trial have lain dormant in your department for months after you had been requested by the chairman of the Select Committee on War Expenditures to ask Congress for any amount of money necessary, if you should need funds to prosecute these cases. You made no request for such funds until after Hon. ROYAL C. JOHNSON offered an amendment to the Department of Justice appropriation bill on April 7, 1922, to appropriate $500,000 for the purpose of carrying on these investigations and prosecutions. It is therefore evident that the request for these funds does not come through your initiative. That you have not been hampered in the cases which have been long since prepared for trial by a lack of funds is shown by the fact that, although you were urged to do so last summer by the chairman of the Select Committee on War Expenditures, you failed to ask for funds, and cases which were audited and prepared for trial at the expense of the War Department were withdrawn from the hands of United States attorneys, not on the initiative of any person connected with the Department of Justice, but because of influences exerted by persons on the outside. I refer particularly to the cases of the Wright-Martin Aircraft Corporation and the Lincoln Motor Co. There were various other cases, such as the Phillips & Stephens case, the American Electro Products Co., the American Bosch Magneto Co., and the Chemical Foundation case, which would now be in the courts but for inaction and the removal or suspension of investigators who were working on the same.

Three weeks ago you were quoted in the press with brief references to the allegations contained in Mr. WOODRUFF'S speech, and promises were held out to the public that you would make a more complete reply. The allegations made by Mr. WOODRUFF were definite and tangible and showed willful delay in the prosecution of these cases. The public still awaits your denial of the specific allegations set out in the record and fortified by documentary evidence. Your request for an appropriation at this late day does not answer the questions which must arise in the mind of every intelligent and honest citizen.

Until there is an assurance that present policies and conditions which exist in the Department of Justice are to be changed further appropriations would be ill-advised and untimely. You still retain on the pay roll in connection with these cases men who have not been in sympathy with a clean-up. In order that the people may know whether or not you intend to clean house before there is placed in your custody further appropriations, I ask that you answer the following among the many questions which must inevitably arise in the minds of persons informed as to conditions in the Department of Justice:

1. Why have there been no civil suits and grand jury investigations in the cases of the Wright-Martin Aircraft Corporation, the American Electro Products Co., the Dayton Wright Co., the American Bosch Magneto Co., the Standard Aircraft Cos., the Chemical Foundation Co., and other cases where audits were made and the evidence was available?

2. Were not the Wright-Martin Aircraft Corporation and the Lincoln Motor Co. cases withdrawn from the hands of United States attorneys at the request of persons in no way connected with the Department of Justice?

3. Is it not a fact that you have personally granted hearings to alleged malefactors of great wealth to determine whether or not their cases are to be handled by the courts, and are similar hearings granted to all classes of citizens?

4. Is it not a fact that the Chemical Foundation Co. case was taken out of the hands of other officials of the Department of Justice and is now being handled solely by the President and yourself?

5. Are the Chemical Foundation Co. and the American Bosch Magneto Co. cases interlocked, and do they involve any of the same personalities? If so, whom?

6. Is it not a fact that a number of investigators have been removed or suspended from time to time by Mr. Rush L. Holland, Assistant Attorney General, after they had filed reports that the Government was being defrauded? Will you deny, Mr. Attorney General, that requests for the removal or suspension of any of these men came from persons outside of the Department of Justice?

7. Is it not a fact that the war fraud cases and investigations are now being handled largely by young men who were within the draft age and obtained exemption from military service? Will you deny, Mr. Attorney General, that some of these young men have stated that it was not the policy of the department to prosecute war fraud cases?

8. Is it not a fact that men connected with the Department of Justice are charged with whisky frauds and are still on the Government's pay roll?

9. Is it not a fact that after Congressmen JOHNSON and WOODRUFF addressed their colleagues in Congress on April 11, 1922, you immediately assigned agents Recellar R. Gray (colored), James Connolly, H. F. Crawford, and A. C. Raynor, of the Bureau of Investigation, to shadow these Congressmen and myself; and is it not a fact that you brought various agents of the Bureau of Investigation from out of town to Washington and employed them for the same purpose?

10. Is it not a fact that you had two bags of mail belonging to Congressman ROY O. WOODRUFF shadowed, followed, and inspected? Is it not a fact that Agent H. F. Crawford, of the Bureau of Investigation, followed these bags of mail belonging to Congressman WOODRUFF to the post office in Washington and inspected their contents?

11. Is it not a fact that one of the highest paid agents in the Bureau of Investigation is Rescellar R. Gray, a negro, who has been in your employ for a number of years as a valet and chauffeur for your family, and that this negro was ordered by you to trail these Congressmen and myself? I ask you to affirm or deny that the reports of these agents will show that they were in the House Office Building and that they mention the names of these Congressmen in connection with my own?

12. Is it not a fact that a memorandum was prepared in the Department of Justice urging my arrest; and is it not a fact that you were officially advised that I had committed no violation of law?

13. Is it not a fact that, notwithstanding my clean bill of health, you have turned the machinery of the Department of Justice on me in an effort to discredit me, if possible, notwithstanding the fact that in every particular my record has showed up as clean as a hound's tooth?

14. Is it not a fact that the Bureau of Investigation has been employed for the private use of certain Government officials and in attempts to discredit those who have endeavored to furnish the Department of Justice evidence on which to base prosecutions against influential persons and politicians who have been caught in the meshes of the law?

15. Is it not a fact that Rocellar R. Grey, your negro valet, is now assigned to investigate an alleged robbery of jewelry from persons connected with the British Embassy, instead of turning the case over to the police department?

16. Who is Jess Smith, and what are his functions at the Department of Justice? Is it not true that he has no official position in the Government service, that he has never taken an oath of office, and is it not a fact that he has access to the files of the Department of Justice, that he maintains an office in the department, employing Government stenographers for personal dictation, and that he uses other facilities of the Government which are paid for out of public funds?

You are in a position of great responsibility, and the integrity and dignity of the American Government have been intrusted to your zealous care. A public office is a public trust, and the humblest citizen has the right to call upon you for an account of your stewardship. The allegations contained in the speech of Congressman WOODRUFF are matters of vital concern. If the allegations are true, the machinery of justice is out of gear. If they are not true, they should be denied and an issue framed on any allegation that you are willing to challenge. The speech of Congressman WOODRUFF is now a public document, and if you fail to specifically answer the allegations therein contained, together with the foregoing questions, your failure as a public official is admitted and you should immediately resign your high trust.

Respectfully,

H. L. SCAIFE.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I have no desire at all to delay the consideration of the important measure, the tariff bill, which is pending before the Senate. I think it ought to be considered constantly and pressed for passage. Therefore I shall take no time to discuss any of the matters alluded to by my friend, the Senator from Arkansas. I do, however, merely wish to say that there are two men who know more about this particular matter, probably, than any other men in the country. One is the gentleman who was the Attorney General of the United States at the time the Morse case was under consideration, and the other is the present distinguished Chief Justice of the United States, who was then the President of the United States.

I have secured from a newspaper man in this city copies of letters, for the authenticity of which I vouch absolutely, one being a letter from the then Attorney General, Mr. Wickersham, and the other a letter from former President, now Chief Justice, Taft. I ask unanimous consent that both letters may be printed in the RECORD without reading.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. WILLIS. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I should like to have the letters read, because this question has become quite acute.

Mr. WILLIS. I have no objection to having the letters read. I asked that they be printed in the RECORD because I did not desire to delay the consideration of the pending bill.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, at the time Mr. Daugherty——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. WILLIS. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. CARAWAY. At the time Mr. Daugherty got those letters from Mr. Taft, Mr. Daugherty was the chairman of the State central committee of Ohio, was he not?

Mr. WILLIS. I do not remember as to that. He was chairman of that committee at different times. Whether he was chairman at that particular time, I do not recall.

Mr. CARAWAY. And Mr. Taft was a candidate for reelection and one T. Roosevelt was crowding him rather closely?

Mr. WILLIS. I think the Senator is mistaken as to the date, but I will look at the letter. I do not think it was written at the time Mr. Taft was a candidate for the Presidency of the United States. His letter is dated November 22, 1915. On that date, of course, Mr. Taft was not a candidate for the Presidency, and had not been a candidate for a number of years.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the communications will be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I asked that the letters be read, but I withdraw the request, as I shall read them in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letters referred to were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW HAVEN, CONN., November 22, 1915.

Hon. H. M. DAUGHERTY,
Columbus, Ohio.

MY DEAR MR. DAUGHERTY: I have yours of November 17. I write to say that in no way did you influence me in respect to the application for the pardon of Charles Morse. My recollection is that you told me you were counsel for Morse, but that you had declined to present the matter to me. The letter of the Attorney General states the case exactly, and I am glad to confirm what he says in regard to it.

With very best wishes for your future, and with warm appreciation of your kindly support in the past, believe me, my dear Mr. Daugherty,

Sincerely yours,

WM. H. TAFT.

40 WALL STREET,
New York, November 17, 1915.

HARRY M. DAUGHERTY, Esq.,
Columbus, Ohio.

MY DEAR DAUGHERTY: I have your letter of the 15th inst. I am delighted to know that you are a candidate for United States Senator, and that your candidacy stands in such a favorable light. You should have no anxiety whatever from your connection with the Morse case. All that you did in that matter was to bring the subject in a perfectly straightforward way, as an attorney should, before the Attorney General. You made no representations to me, nor, so far as I am aware, to the President, in connection with that case, which deceived us in any respect. As far as I recall, you had nothing to do with the reports of the doctors in charge of Morse, and I do not recall any special insistence on your part with me regarding the matter. A number of different people came to both the President and me very urgently regarding Morse's health, and by the President's direction he was sent to the Government hospital near Atlanta, where he was kept for weeks under the supervision of Army surgeons. Finally, upon their reports, and with the written recommendation of the Surgeon General of the Army, I felt constrained as a matter of humanity to advise the President to pardon him, which was done. It is as far as possible from my thoughts to consider that you played any part in the matter which was not entirely straightforward and honorable.

Very sincerely yours,

GEO. W. WICKERSHAM.

THE TARIFF.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7456) to provide revenue, to regulate commerce with foreign countries, to encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the item under consideration is citric acid. On that commodity the House bill imposes a duty of 12 cents a pound; the Senate Committee on Finance has increased it to 18 cents a pound. The Underwood-Simmons law imposed a duty of 5 cents a pound and the Payne-Aldrich bill 7 cents a pound. This bill increases the rate above the Payne-Aldrich bill, as will readily be perceived, by nearly 300 per cent. This is only one of the many examples of the enormous increases in rates which are found in this bill over the rates of the discredited and denounced Payne-Aldrich tariff law.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. I know the Senator does not want to create a wrong inference by his remarks. I will, therefore, call his attention to the fact, which he omitted to state, that under both the Payne-Aldrich and the present law citrate of lime, from which the citric acid is made, was upon the free list, while under the pending bill there is a 6 per cent duty imposed upon the citrate of lime, and, then, allowing 2 pounds of citrate of lime for 1 pound of citric acid, we would have to double that rate, which would be 12 cents. The remaining 6 cents constitutes a differential to cover the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad of citrate of lime.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I was about to come to citrate of lime, which is dealt with in paragraph 46 of the bill. The Senator's remarks compel me to digress for a moment from the course which I was pursuing, although I intended to show that we could not fairly deal with citric acid without considering the rate to be placed on citrate of lime. From page 20 in the committee print of the pending bill, paragraph 46, it appears that the duty on citrate of lime adopted by the House was 7 cents a pound, while the Committee on Finance has reduced that to 6 cents a pound. The Senator says that under the Payne-Aldrich Act, as well as under the Underwood-Simmons law, citrate of lime was on the free list.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to correct the statement made by me; I was mistaken. Under the Underwood-Simmons law a duty of 1 cent a pound was imposed, while under the Payne-Aldrich bill the commodity was free.

Mr. KING. I thank the Senator. I was in error also. The Underwood law laid a duty of 1 cent per pound. Of course, Mr. President, if there is any relation—and under the theory of tariff bills there is—between citrate of lime and citric acid, then, if the tariff on citrate of lime be increased, then, according to the stepladder, the illogical, and too often unfair and unjust method adopted in the formulation of tariff bills, the duty on the finished product should be greatly augmented. I may add parenthetically that it has become a habit in the framing of tariff bills for the proponents of a tariff rate on the finished product to suggest a rate which is tentatively accepted. Then the proponents of a tariff rate upon the raw material make suggestions and demands, and when they have won their fight and the rate upon the raw material or upon the intermediate has been raised to altitudinous heights, which in the end must become oppressive upon the people, not only to those who purchase the raw material or the intermediate product but also those who use the finished product, then the manufacturer or the purchaser of the raw article returns to the framers of tariff bills and demands higher rates for his commodity, because he will be compelled to pay higher prices for the materials employed in his factory for the fabrication of the commodities which he manufactures. Then those interested in the production of raw materials or intermediates say that the rate which is finally fixed for the manufacturers of the finished product does not bear a proper relationship to the raw material or to the intermediates, and they in turn demand an increase in the rates upon the raw or the intermediate product; and so, Mr. President, by this stepladder process the rates upon the raw materials are further increased. These are transferred, of course, to the intermediates and to the finished products, which, when completed, carry to the ultimate consumer all of the antecedent tariff exactions. The ultimate consumer must pay all these increases, as they are passed on, finally resting upon him with deadly consequences.

We all remember the fabled Atlas of mythology, with bowed back bending beneath the weight of the world. The ultimate consumer is not a fabled Atlas, but he becomes incarnate in the mighty people, the ultimate consumers of the United States, and upon their bowed backs are placed the heavy burdens which result from imprudent or odious laws.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. McLEAN. I gather from the Senator's declaration that he does not believe in protective tariffs at all.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator from Connecticut is not a prophet nor the son of a prohpet. Though a Yankee, he is not always a good guesser.

The protective tariff, or the principle of protection, is not involved in this bill. This bill is not framed upon any rational protective theory. It is designed to give monopolies to domestic manufacturers and to strangle competition. Its consequences must be the placing of unjust burdens upon the people. Reasonable protection, or fair protection in behalf of infant or struggling industries, is not, I repeat, involved in this bill.

The Senator from Connecticut, with his splendid abilities, is indoctrinated with the most extreme views respecting tariff prohibitions. He believes in erecting tariff walls behind which the domestic industries of the United States will take refuge, and thus, buttressed and protected, they will ride over the prostrate forms of labor and exploit consuming masses of the country. Already many of these industries have grown fabulously rich by their profiteering policies and their imposition upon the public.

Mr. McLEAN. Assuming that this country has grown rich under a protective tariff, does the Senator think that we now ought to bear the burdens of the rest of the world by subjecting our industries to the ruinous competition of the low-cost countries of Europe?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, that is always the cry.

Mr. McLEAN. I will——

Mr. KING. Does the Senator want me to answer his question?

Mr. McLEAN. No; I will save the Senator the necessity of answering it.

Mr. KING. The Senator must not ask questions if he does not want them answered.

Mr. McLEAN. Instead of having the Senator answer that question, I will simply repeat my first question: Is the Senator in favor of a protective tariff?

Mr. KING. I shall briefly reply to the Senator. But he can not ask a question in my time and then dodge it. I desire to answer the first one.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator can answer both, but I should like to have an answer to the first one first.

Mr. KING. The Senator can not always select the forum in which he wants to contest.

Mr. McLEAN. It would not take the Senator very long to answer my first question.

Mr. KING. Oh, well, the Senator need not grow impatient. It did not take him long to ask it, although he has been drilled for many years in a system of protectionism which, as I view it, binds the people for the benefit of the protected classes. But let us come back to the last question which the Senator asked and which he sought to withdraw.

His question, in effect, was whether I believed in our bearing the burdens of the world, and the assumption was that we would bear the burdens of the world if we did not pass the odious bill which is now before us, and to the framing of which he so powerfully contributed. Doubtless he has pride in his offspring and I can not complain at his attitude toward this bill, nor find fault with the evident pride he exhibits in its form and qualities.

Mr. President, I do not concede that a fair and rational economic policy will involve the destruction of American industry or subject the United States to burdens or produce ruinous competition because of conditions in Europe. The Senator again implies that a proper tariff law prevents all competition from abroad; indeed, that it awards to the domestic producer a complete monopoly. I do not have the time now to enter into a discussion of labor conditions or the cost of labor abroad, or to institute a comparison between labor costs in other lands and those in the United States. A consideration of that question would involve also the question of the superior advantages which the United States has in raw material, in resources, in the intelligence and genius and skill of the American workingman, and a multitude of other questions, all of which are directly related to the question of the cost of production in the United States and the cost of production abroad. I deny that a proper tariff bill is a free-trade measure or that the Democratic Party is supporting a free-trade policy. I deny that a proper economic and tariff policy will place the burdens of the world upon the United States. Indeed, I insist that a rational trade policy and a sensible and statesmanlike tariff law will increase the prosperity of the United States, multiply the manufacturing institutions, add to the capital invested, and furnish employment to the American people at wages which will be remunerative. In other words, Mr. President, I am for a tariff policy and for economic, industrial, and, if I may use the term, "trade policies" which will increase American production and open the markets of the world to the great surplus of commodities which will be inevitable if the United States pursues a wise and rational economic policy.

The Senator, during the debate upon the emergency tariff bill, as I recall his utterances then, insisted that the Underwood-Simmons bill was a free-trade measure. Of course, he was inaccurate. Many of its duties are very high. Indeed, it was charged by some Republicans when it was under consideration that it was but an indifferent reduction below many of the rates of the Payne-Aldrich tariff law. A sufficient answer to the contention of the Senator made at the time referred to and implied in his questions to-day is found in the fact that the Democratic Party never has enacted a free-trade law, and I can assure the Senator that it never will enact a free-trade measure.

The position of the Senator doubtless is that under the Underwood law the American manufacturers are being subjected to ruinous competition and that we are bearing the burdens of the world. Mr. President, our exports exceed our imports, and have done so ever since the Underwood law was enacted. Our enormous exports have been due largely to the fact that we did receive imports. In other words, there was trade between the United States and other nations. We exported the products of which we had a surplus and received in part payment therefor products which we needed and of which our vendees had a surplus.

Since the passage of the Underwood law the wealth of the United States increased from one hundred and eighty-seven billions to more than three hundred billions. It is true that after the Republicans came into power there was a great reduction in the wealth of our country. Under the operation of the Underwood-Simmons law the chemical products of the United States increased from approximately three and one-quarter billions annually to more than five billions and the capital invested increased from more than two billions to more than five billions.

Mr. McLEAN. That was entirely due to the war.

Mr. KING. Of course, the Senator will say it was due to the war. That is always the cry of the Republicans. When prosperity comes under Democratic régime it must not be ascribed to Democratic policies.

Mr. McLEAN. The war virtually repealed the Underwood Act for the time being.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I repeat that the prosperity of the people of the United States was never greater than under that law. The industrial and manufacturing development of the United States under that law never has been surpassed.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. Will not the Senator tell the Senate in what way the Underwood law was responsible for that prosperity?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Underwood bill removed obstacles to our foreign commerce, thus increasing it. This increase added to the national wealth and to the prosperity of the people.

Mr. LENROOT rose.

Mr. KING. Permit me to complete my thought. The Senator with his knowledge of economic matters and historical precedents knows that the great struggle among nations has been to enlarge the field of trade and commerce, not only of individuals but of communities and states and nations. With the breaking down of a narrow and provincial attitude, nations found markets for their products, and thus added to the richness of the nation and the wealth of their people. Prohibitory tariffs, either as the result of law or edicts or military proclamations, stood in the way for centuries of international trade, but when people became more enlightened and perceived the interdependence of communities and states, a broader and more catholic spirit exhibited itself, not only in enlarged travel and interchange of thoughts and views but also in an interchange of commodities.

The Underwood law was in the interest of greater international trade. Trade does not impoverish, it benefits. The more we trade the greater are our products, and as our products are multiplied our factories and plants are increased in number and more people find profitable employment. It is an economic maxim that as we increase our foreign trade we add to the prosperity of our country. Under the Payne-Aldrich law rates were so high as to constitute impediments to the development of our foreign trade. This law was condemned by the progressive and thoughtful people in the Republican Party as well as by Democrats. It was admitted by many Republicans that the rates were dictated by trusts and were calculated to give a monopoly of the domestic market to the American producer. Paralysis in our industrial life was threatened and the evils flowing from this law provoked resentment and discontent and led to the overthrow of the Republican Party.

The Underwood law, taking full cognizance of infant industries, but recognizing the importance of obtaining foreign trade, removed many of the barriers constructed by the Payne-Aldrich law. Thus our foreign market increased, and with this increase greater domestic production resulted. Opening foreign markets for our surplus products was one of the objects of the Underwood law. This it accomplished. Any policy that will increase our foreign trade will add to our prosperity. May I add that the United States with its limitless natural resources and with its inexhaustible supply of primary products, raw and intermediate products, that enter into the industrial and manufacturing activities of the people need fear no competitor in all the world.

Unless it does find foreign markets, its industrial expansion will not keep pace with that of other nations, nor will it play the great part which it should in the world in virtue of the bountiful gifts which have by a merciful Providence been bestowed upon this favored land.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. Does not the Senator admit that the primary object of the Underwood law was to permit dutiable imports to come in more freely than under the Payne-Aldrich law?

Mr. KING. In my opinion one of the chief objects of the Underwood law was revenue. Undoubtedly it was believed that there would be larger imports because the exports would be greatly increased. The country demanded the repeal of the odious Payne-Aldrich law, and the Democrats in repealing that act, of course, were required to enact another in its place. They believed that several hundred millions of dollars should be raised from duties upon imports. They transferred to the free list a large number of important commodities in order that the burdens of the people might be lightened and prices upon necessities of life might be reduced to proper levels. They recognized that a proper tariff measure would stimulate exports, thus increasing production, and that as exports were increased there would be an increase in imports. So I frankly say to the Senator that it was expected that there would be a greater volume of imports.

But in drafting the Underwood law, keeping in mind the question of revenue, there was the thought that in laying duties incidental protection would result, and it was desired that it should in behalf of certain industries. The Democratic Party believes in the development of industries. It recognizes there could be no exports unless we had large domestic production. It recognizes the fact that we have the resources to produce greatly in excess of the needs of the people and that it is imperative that foreign markets be found for the excess production.

The Underwood law, fashioned for the purpose of increasing domestic production, was so framed as to enlarge our foreign exports and greatly increase our foreign trade and commerce. The Democratic Party recognized that the mercantile system is obsolete and that prohibitive tariffs are an anachronism. They accepted the more enlightened views of Adam Smith, a political economist, who perceived the importance of international relations which include international trade and commerce.

The industrial progress of the American people would be seriously retarded if policies should be adopted that would cut off imports. It is a popular cry to talk about producing everything that we consume. Experience demonstrates that civilization advanced as differentiation occurred in the industrial and social lives of the people. When individuals began to trade among themselves they began to prosper, and when communities engaged in trade and commerce their progress and prosperity became manifest. Even the Crusades, which brought many of the uncultured and narrow peoples of western Europe into contact with the Levant, not only broadened their views and advanced their learning, but greatly stimulated their industrial life, and thus brought added prosperity to the people. No community can live alone. If it succeeded it would enter upon the path of decay and intellectual and moral and economic stagnation and death. When the people of a community can find markets beyond their narrow territorial boundaries they diversify their labor, intensify their efforts, increase their production, and thus expand their exports. For their exports they receive in return metallic money, or bills of exchange, or commodities produced by those to whom they sell.

Thus by reciprocal trade and commerce communities and nations grow in wealth.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the Senator contend that the Underwood law did provide that reciprocal trade and commerce?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, any bill which removes obstacles and impediments, particularly those which are irrational and which are aimed against trade and commerce, will bring about reciprocal trade.

Mr. LENROOT. Did it?

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator says it did?

Mr. KING. The trade between the United States and Canada increased under the Underwood law, and the trade between the United States and Great Britain increased under the Underwood law. I grant that after the war was over the imports into the United States may not have borne the same relation to the exports they had borne at other times in the history of the Republic.

Mr. LENROOT. Will not the Senator admit that during the period in which the wealth of the United States increased there were practically no imports from Europe under the Underwood law?

Mr. KING. No; I do not agree with the Senator at all. I speak only from memory, but, as I recollect, our imports in 1919 were approximately between four and five billion dollars, and our exports were approximately eight billion, so that our total foreign commerce exceeded $13,000,000,000. Certainly that $13,000,000,000 was not all exports. We exported American products of the value of $8,000,000,000, and in 1920 our exports slightly exceeded $8,000,000,000. In 1919 our imports were approximately $4,000,000,000, and in 1920 they were more than five and one-quarter billions of dollars.

The Underwood law was in effect at that time. As I stated, we imported billions of dollars worth of goods, and we exported billions of dollars worth of American products.

Mr. LENROOT. How could the Underwood law have been a factor when those exports were paid for with American money and American credit? Europe is owing for them to-day.

Mr. KING. The question of how they are paid for is not always the consideration. It is not accurate to say that we paid for them all with American credit and American money, because, as I have stated, the imports were from 1913 to 1920, and during the latter year they were in excess of $5,000,000,000.

I repeat that the intimation implied in the suggestion or question of the Senator that all of our exports were paid for by American money and with American credits is not accurate, because the records show we imported during the years between 1914 and 1920 commodities of the value of many billions of dollars. My criticism is that Senators on the other side of the Chamber—the troglodytes who are defending this bill, the die-hards who do not want trade with other nations—are fighting for a bill that will aid in the accomplishment of their purpose. Under the Underwood Act there have been large imports of all classes of commodities; but the inference of the Senator from Wisconsin was that there had been no imports, that though there had been extensive exports, no payments had been made by the purchasers, except as we might denominate credits and money loaned by us as payments.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I am sure the Senator does not wish to misquote me.

Mr. KING. Indeed I do not.

Mr. LENROOT. I did not say there were no imports. What I did say was this, that during the period when the wealth of the United States increased, we had no imports from Europe, practically speaking.

Mr. KING. With all due respect to the great knowledge of the Senator, I respectfully submit that he is in error. There were imports, and if the Senator will look at the figures of the imports in 1917, 1918, 1919, and 1920 he will discover that the imports aggregated many billions of dollars and that such imports consisted of thousands of commodities for the use and benefit of the American people. Our Republican friends were crying out against any imports, which must mean restricted exports. They want to build a wall around the United States so that other nations may have no access to our shores or bring to us any of their products, though desired by the American people.

I am surprised that the troglodytes upon the other side do not try to exclude the ideas, the literature, the learning, the morals, and the ethics which are found in other lands. We ought to keep out Lady Astor, and Professor Einstein, and H. G. Wells, and Mr. Galsworthy, and Gilbert K. Chesterton, and the scientific men, and the great leaders in thought who constantly seek our shores. Their ideas may be pernicious and conflict with the narrow complacency of some antique Americans.

It has been said, Mr. President, that ideas are the precursors of revolutions and are the iconoclasts that batter down the walls of ignorance and provincialism. Ralph Waldo Emerson speaks of the thinkers—the men of ideas who carry a revolution in their vest pockets. Our friends upon the other side do not want new ideas. They do not want the products of other nations. So they are determined to pass and will pass this tariff bill.

Mr. President, recurring to the question of my friend from Connecticut—I am not going to lose sight of him—I deny that the Democratic Party seeks to place upon the back of the United States the burdens of the world. The mission of the United States, primarily, is to develop the resources of the United States, but in developing the resources of the United States and adding to its riches we are benefiting the world. It is just like the accretions which result to the moral reservoir of the world. Every good deed done, whether by pagan or Christian, then, is an addition to the moral reservoir which supplies the inspiration for the enlightenment of the world.

Our Republican friends seem to think that you can make greater progress materially, intellectually, and morally by isolation. That I deny. The Democratic theory is that while developing your own country you should so shape your legislation that you will aid other peoples and other lands. Indeed, if you seek a selfish policy you not only place obstacles in the pathway of national progress but you offer impediments to international growth and development.

Narrow and selfish policies may promote temporary gains to individuals and nations, but ultimately the advantages are lost and humiliation comes to those who follow a course so illusory. The men and nations who lead, and who accomplish, and who serve, and who attain honor and glory and immortality are the ones who possess sympathy and altruism and broad international concepts. To-day, more than ever, this world needs great leaders—men of vision who can see a unity of purpose in all the activities of men and in the unfolding of humanity.

Returning to the theme suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin, the greater our domestic production the more capital will be required and the greater will be the rewards for labor. We must find markets for our surplus agricultural crops. We have enormous quantities of wheat and corn and cotton and agricultural products which must find purchasers across the seas. Our agricultural products could be increased, as could our mineral products, and no one can measure the potential greatness of this country in its manufacturing possibilities.

The cattle and the sheep men produce more than the domestic market consumes. The great packing plants have shipped abroad their products to the value of billions, and as their exports increased the live-stock industry expanded and the wealth of the Nation was augmented. When Europe could not take the cotton from the South, the people of the Southern States reached the verge of bankruptcy. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL] will correct me if I am in error.

Mr. DIAL. The Senator is correct.

Mr. KING. And I think the Senator will corroborate my statement that the greater part of the cotton crop of the South must find a foreign market.

Mr. DIAL. About one-half.

Mr. KING. The Senator knows that if it were not for the foreign markets the South to-day and in the future would be in the bankruptcy court.

Mr. DIAL. We are already about there.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, it is imperative that we extend our foreign trade; and yet we are considering a bill to limit it. Our business men who have any enlightenment and vision are now sending representatives to China, Japan, Australia, and even to the Dutch possessions in the Far East, to Siberia, and to nearly every European country, as well as to South America, for the purpose of finding markets.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I desire to ask my friend a question. Of course, I can not insist upon a categorical answer; but does the Senator contend that by surrendering our home market we will gain any foreign market?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, there is no such question involved as the surrender of our home market. That is always the cry of the troglodytes—that we will surrender our home market if we trade with other peoples; or, at least, they contend that we must prohibit any products from foreign countries coming into the United States. There is no proposition to surrender our home market. The Democrats insist upon a policy which will greatly increase domestic production, thus enlarging the home market, and at the same time expanding the foreign or export market. So I answer categorically, Mr. President, that there is no purpose to surrender the home market.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Then I ask the Senator this question: Does he think that the producers in Utah of many products, the producers in California of many products, can compete with oriental producers of like products without our imposing what might be called high, but what I would term adequate, tariff protection? In other words, does the Senator favor, to use the phrase which describes accurately the two schools of economics, a free-trade policy in respect to oriental products, or the protective-tariff policy?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I repeat what I have said before, that there is no question of free trade involved in the discussion of the present tariff bill. The Democrats have not advocated, nor do they now advocate, free trade. We are here fighting an odious bill, which is in the interest of the trusts and oppressive to the American people. The bill which the troglodytes, our "die-hards" in the Senator's party, have placed before us does not in the slightest degree involve the question of reasonable protection for American products which possibly might come into competition with foreign products.

If the Senator's party had reported a bill with even the schedules of the Payne-Aldrich Tariff Act, which divided and destroyed for the time being the Republican Party, some of us on this side of the aisle would not have been criticizing it so vehemently as we have the pending measure. The Senator knows that Republicans denounced the Payne-Aldrich law more bitterly than Democrats have denounced this bill, and the country supported them. Can he wonder that Democrats are denouncing this bill when it is so much worse than the former?

My friend refers to western products, including copper produced in Utah. Our mines have been closed because Germany and other countries who would have purchased our copper were unable to make payment for the same owing to the economic conditions in Europe and the unwise policies of the Republican Party. I desire the adoption of a policy which will enable Germany and other nations to buy copper from Utah and Montana as well as the cotton from the South, the surplus agricultural products of the United States, and the thousands of commodities which we can and do produce in quantities greatly in excess of our domestic needs.

The Senator from California is here to-day with his keen eye upon the items known as citric acid and citrate of lime——

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. And olives.

Mr. KING. Yes; and olives.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. And almonds, and all citrus fruits, and rice, and long-staple cotton, and beans, and quicksilver.

Mr. KING. The Senator from California, living in a rich State, rich in so many things, in great men——

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Only excelled by Utah.

Mr. KING. And charming women, and formerly in the fruit of the vine, is here with that delightful selfishness which manifests itself in his demand that California shall have a tariff upon whatever she produces. The Senator—and I say it without any disparagement of his high conception of ethics and morals—is perfectly willing to make the rates so high upon oranges, lemons, olives, almonds, citrate of lime, and citric acid that the millions of American people who are compelled to use them would pay tribute to his State, pay an unjust tax, which would amount to millions annually.

Permit me to say, Mr. President, that I want the people of California to be prosperous. They are now the most prosperous people in the United States, and California is the most prosperous State in the Union to-day. It has potentialities denied to other States. And its future is assured. It is a great State, and looks out upon the Pacific—the guardian of our western shores.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, the beautiful tribute which my friend pays to California robs me almost of the weapons of warfare. But I wish to say that I would stand and shall stand just as earnestly for the industries of Utah as I am standing for those of California. I would like to ask the Senator his views with regard to the great wool industry and the lead industry of his own State. They need protection, and the Republican Party is willing to give them that protection.

Moreover, if I may interrupt the Senator a moment only, we look ahead. The industries of California may be put out, the industries of Utah may be put out, upon the theory that the consumers of those products will benefit. But we look ahead and, judging by the past, we think we know that when the industries of this country have been put out we not only deprive our people of employment and wages but ultimately, when we shall again become dependent upon the foreigner, we will be in his power, and prices will not be lower than they are under a competitive system in America, with our industries protected by adequate tariff duties. In other words, we are not asking the consumers ultimately to pay more. What we want is to give work and wages to our own people, the Senator's people in Utah and ours in California.

The same doctrine would apply in every State in the Union. Moreover, we can not gain a foreign market for copper, for lead, for any product of America by surrendering, as we shall surrender, our own markets. The American producer can not compete with the cheaply paid labor of the Orient or of Europe.

There are two schools of economics. I have never hesitated to answer categorically that I believe in the doctrine in which Washington believed, in which Andrew Jackson believed, in which all the great Whig statesmen believed, and in which all the great Republican statesmen believed and now believe. Others, for whom I have great intellectual respect, recognizing their abilities, hold to another theory. What I would like the Senator to make answer to, if he cares to do so, is whether he grounds his whole argument upon what has been called the free-trade policy, the Cobden theory, or upon what I call the Washington, the Lincoln, the Garfield, the McKinley, the Harding theory, namely, the American protective theory in the fixing of customs duties and rates. If a man is a free trader he can support his cause as best he may. The people of America recognize those two schools. If the Senator from Utah is a free trader, let us know it. If he is a protective-tariff man I would like to know that.

So I say, begging the Senator's pardon for interrupting so much, because it is not my habit to interrupt Senators when they are making their thoughtful arguments, that the subject comes home to every Senator as it does to every man, woman, and child in America.

I add to what I said a moment ago by saying that I know conditions in my State, and I have a fairly accurate knowledge of conditions in Japan, China, and in the Far East. We have certain interests in California which will perish unless they are adequately protected. I know there are industries in Louisiana which will perish unless they are adequately protected. I think there are industries in Utah which will perish unless they are adequately protected. The bill which we have framed and submitted here undertakes to and will protect those industries of the several States.

Adjectives do not add to argument. Hereafter perhaps, if I shall gain the attention of the Senate, I may reply to the Senator's favorite phrase touching the character of the party to which I am very proud to belong; but I would be very glad if the Senator once for all would take his stand upon one platform or the other. I am familiar with the history of the Democratic Party and of the Republican Party and every other party in America. I know that from the time of Washington down there have been two schools of politics relating to economics. I belong to one school and it may be that the Senator belongs to the other school. Perhaps he can answer these remarks of mine by definitely stating, if he cares to do so, to which school he belongs.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, it is unimportant to which school of economics I belong. I have stated pretty clearly my views during the debates upon this bill. I have repeatedly said there was no question of free trade involved. I am fighting what I believe to be a bad bill, hoping if it can not be defeated that the rates may be reduced. The rates are the highest ever before seen in an American tariff bill. The views of Say, the great French economist, and writers of his time; of Adam Smith, of John Bright, and Cobden and John Stuart Mills; of Henry George and Professor Marshall, are only natural here, as they show the fundamental principles of political economy and point the way to economic and national growth and development.

The question of free trade is not before the Senate, and the Senator from California, with that legal acumen and that skill as a parliamentarian which he possesses, and with the ability which we concede to him, is exactly in the same position as the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. McCORMICK], who is trying to divert attention from the issues before us by injecting the League of Nations into political discussion. The Senator from California is endeavoring to divert attention from the monstrosities of the pending bill by thrusting the specter of free trade into the debate. I assure him we shall not be diverted. I announced the first time I addressed myself to the bill that the question of free trade was not involved in the consideration of this bill.

I am willing to state here and now, so far as I am concerned, that if those having the bill in charge will lower the rates to fair and just and reasonable levels—not to the level of a free-trade bill—it will pass this body with but a few days' debate. But so long as I believe that selfishness and the demand of predatory interests are found—and I use the word without any harshness—upon nearly every page of the bill, and so long as I believe that many of the schedules of the bill are not written in the interest of the American people but in the interest of trusts and combinations and corporations and persons who have always profited and benefited by the prostitution of the taxing power of the Government, I shall oppose it, and I know that others upon this side of the Chamber will do the same.

We are not here asking for free trade. I am willing now, in the light of world conditions, to make liberal concessions in the formulation of a tariff bill to the sentiments of men who honestly feel that certain industries need a modicum of protection.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Will the Senator have the goodness to yield for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ODDIE in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. KING. I am always happy to yield to my friend from California.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Does the Senator from Utah think the duties provided in this bill on sugar, on lead, and on wool, or any of them, are too high?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, my friend can not to-day drag me into a discussion of other items than those which are found in the schedule in which I am particularly interested.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Will the Senator promise me to answer my question before we are through with the argument?

Mr. KING. Yes. Let me say to the Senator that I am not a member of the Finance Committee. I have, however, been honored by being requested by the minority leader and minority members of the committee to take some part in the discussion of the chemical schedule, the first schedule of the bill. As I have said, I am not a member of the committee; I have not had the advantage of participating in the deliberations of the committee; and I am confining my feeble efforts now to the schedule at present under discussion. The Senator from California is very much interested in citric acid and citrate of lime, which are involved in this schedule.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I will say to the Senator that when we come to the other schedules, if the distinguished minority leader asks me to make some observations with respect to those schedules I shall be very glad to discuss them, and with the same frankness, I hope, that I am discussing the chemical schedule, or shall discuss any other schedule found in the bill.

The Senator from California knows me sufficiently to pay me, I hope, the tribute that I am not afraid to express my opinions.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. That is true. So, for the reasons stated, the Senator now does not desire to make answer to the question which I have asked?

Mr. KING. That would mean going into the wool schedule. As the Senator from California knows, there are many complications in determining just exactly what that schedule involves.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. That is quite true.

Mr. KING. I want to say once and for all to the Senator—and I will digress a moment from what I was discussing for that purpose—that if we give the high rates proposed in the bill upon the finished products, I would support the policy of a reasonable rate upon raw materials; but, pray, do not ask me to leave the pending schedule, because I expected to have spoken only about 10 minutes while the senior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] was absent from the Chamber.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Pardon me just one suggestion, and then I shall not disturb the Senator longer.

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Of course, we are all interested in sugar, in lead, and in wool; in my State we are interested in two of those articles at least directly and, of course, in one of them indirectly. As the Senator from Utah proceeds, if it seems prudent or wise to him, I wish he would tell us what he means by "the finished product" and "raw material."

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the first political speech I ever heard was by a distinguished Republican Representative from Michigan, who invaded my State and, I must confess, did a great deal of good for the Republican Party. He spent two hours in pointing out the differences between the finished product and the raw material. Lacking the ability of the distinguished Republican Representative, my friend from California can not expect me in a moment, by way of digression, to point out what are raw materials and what are finished products.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. The difference between the two is very simple and easily stated.

Mr. KING. The Senator mentioned wool. Wool, I submit, would not be a finished product.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. The tree standing in the forest is raw material; the ore in the mine is raw material; but they cease to be raw material when human labor is applied to them. That is a sufficient description of raw material or a finished product.

Mr. KING. The Senator may define them as he sees fit, but I may not always accept his definition.

The Senator from California, Mr. President, tries to link his school of protectionism with George Washington. He reminds me of some Americans who are always trying to trace their ancestry back to the Mayflower and then beyond the Mayflower to some marauding courtier of the King of Great Britain or France or some other country. They are not satisfied with being plain John Jones, son of Richard Jones, farmer or blacksmith, who was born in Portsmouth, N. H., or in Syracuse, N. Y., where my father was born; they are not satisfied with being genuine Americans, so to speak; but they are interested in tracing their ancestry back to medieval ages. So my friend from California wants to trace his brand of protectionism back to Washington. There may be differences of opinion as to what were Washington's views on this subject. Moreover, it would be rather hazardous to say what Washington or Hamilton would do if they were now living and had to deal with the great world problems confronting this country.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. If the Senator from Utah will pardon me, I desire to say that I trace my personal ancestry only back to Kentucky. There our family tree stands. As to the doctrine of protection, however, if the Senator from Utah will read the second bill which was passed by Congress and signed by Washington, as the Senator will remember, as a patriotic act, on the 4th day of July, 1789, it will be seen that it is a thorough American protective tariff measure. That is the doctrine which has run down through a hundred years. We need not go back further than George Washington, although we could go clear back through three or four centuries and trace that doctrine in different countries, such as England, France, and Germany.

Mr. KING. I can go back to medieval times and find the protectionists then carried their policies so far as to prohibit any importations. Of course, to carry protectionism, as I understand my friend believes in it, to its logical conclusion we must erect a tariff barrier around us as the Chinese wall was erected centuries ago by the Chinese. They wanted to be let alone; they wanted to be a hermit people. My friend is not a hermit; he is a brave and liberal American, and thinks he must pronounce in favor of protectionism because his party has declared for it in the past.

But he is a cosmopolitan. He rejoices in the literature, in the arts, in the great products of brain and of genius that come from Europe and even from the oriental lands. I have no doubt he has a copy of Tagore, the great Indian poet, upon the shelves of his library and rejoices in it. I have no doubt that he has read Max Muller's "What Can India Teach us?" He has welcomed the great springs and fountains of knowledge that perennially pour their limpid floods for the enlightenment and the progress of the world.

The Nazarene came from a far-off land, but His philosophy and His faith will guide and govern the world. Mr. President, many great things in the future will come out of the Orient. More and more, as the acid of knowledge eats away the prejudices of men, we shall see the goodness and greatness, indeed, the divinity, in peoples not of our faith or race.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator once more?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. In reference to the British policy, let me remind the Senator from Utah, as he must recall, that the policy of England down to 1840, during the premiership of Sir Robert Peel, was that of a highly protective tariff; that when Sir Robert Peel yielded to the repeal of the so-called corn laws, he said that he reserved to himself the right to shape his conduct according to the exigencies of the times. To-day England is carrying out the very policy which he foreshadowed, for England to-day is a protective tariff country, shutting out our exports and the exports of other countries. What I mean to express is that we should shape our conduct according to the exigencies of the times, and that in this day we in America can not compete with the cheap labor of Europe or of Asia.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, when Sir Robert Peel yielded before the forces of Cobden and Bright in the contest which they waged—a contest which took on the fervor of a religious crusade—he perceived that the economic views of the past must be modified. Peel and his predecessors had been wedded to the medieval school which had refused to accept the views of those who formed the Hanseatic League of Germany, as a result of which the free cities became the standard bearers of trade and commerce; they liberalized Germany and carried the torch of progress and liberty throughout Europe.

Mr. President, every step which has meant the emancipation of humanity from servitude has been taken against the opposition and the implacable hatred of reactionaries. That is true of our own country; it is true of every age of the world. Progress signifies an approach to a common civilization and a world unity.

Christianity itself is the expression of a common faith and a common destiny as the inheritance of man. The future holds the great ocean of unity. Paul speaks of "One God and one faith and one baptism." It will be more than a religious faith or a theological creed. Democracy to-day speaks for a more liberal attitude and broader spirit toward the problems of life, a deeper sympathy for the oppressed of all nations. It demands justice for labor and the application of the principles of justice and righteousness in all of the affairs of men.

Mr. President, I hope these digressions will not be charged to me by my good friend the Senator from North Dakota. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] interrupted me, as did the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], and now my distinguished friend from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE] has engaged me for some time. Doubtless I have not satisfied them. No Democrat could. We will try to satisfy them before this discussion is over; but of one thing they can rest assured, Mr. President: We shall not permit them, now or at any other time during this debate, to take the position that this bill is merely for the purpose of protecting home industry or to meet the difference in cost of labor here and abroad or that the question in interest is free trade versus protection.

My good friend did not hear a statement which I made the other day when I quoted elaborate figures to show that in the chemical industry, which in part has grown and developed under the Underwood bill, the labor costs were only 8½ per cent of the products; that in 1913–14, before we entered the war, the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1914, when Germany was supreme, as Republicans now say, we had more than $2,017,000,000 invested in chemical industries in the United States, with an output of more than $3,251,000,000, and the amount paid for labor was 8½ per cent only. Labor did not get much. In 1920, as I recall, when the output was more than five billions, notwithstanding the high wages which were paid or alleged to have been paid in the United States, 8 per cent only of the value of the products went to labor. So, Mr. President, our Republican friends may talk about labor, but this bill is not for labor but for the interests who have prospered in the past by high and exorbitant tariffs.

My friend speaks about oriental labor. The great majority of the products here do not come in competition with oriental labor. We have been told over and over again that the menace was Germany; and yet, when the facts are fully revealed—and I have tried to portray some of them—we find that that is only a specter which our Republican friends are erecting for the purpose of frightening the American people. Our Republican friends know that the Democratic Party believes in the development of our country. It was Thomas Jefferson who gave us, through his great statesmanship, the Louisiana Purchase. It was the Democratic Party that fought the War of 1812. It was the Democratic Party that stood for the flag upon the sea and for the honor of the newborn Republic. It was Jefferson and his associates who fired the American people until they established this Republic. It was Patrick Henry, in his great speech in the House of Burgesses, who wrote upon the flyleaf of an old law book the "resolves" which in effect affirmed the right of the American people to enjoy all the rights that Britishers enjoyed, including the right of taxation by representation.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, I do not want the Senator's beautiful sentence to pass without a slight correction. He paid tribute to the genius of Patrick Henry; but Samuel Adams of Massachusetts must not be forgotten.

Mr. KING. No.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. He is said to have been the father of the Revolution.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I would not detract from Massachusetts. My grandfather was born there, and I rejoice in its great contributions made by Massachusetts to the glory of this Nation.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Is quicksilver within this schedule?

Mr. KING. This is all outside the schedule.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Frankly, I do not recall whether quicksilver is mentioned within this schedule or not.

Mr. KING. No; I think not.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Before the debate is over, however, I should like also for the Senator to stand with me on the rate which we are asking for quicksilver. I merely observe now that the California producers can not compete with the Spanish or the Italian producers. All our mines are closed. Spain and Italy—the latter country, largely due to the Versailles treaty, having control of the Austrian quicksilver mines—control the quicksilver market of the world. Our mines are closed. We want to open them, and the only possible way in which the Government can help us to open them is by fixing what we claim to be a necessary tariff duty. My theory goes to the point that we want to open those mines—call it selfishness; call it what you will—but we wish to open those mines and give employment to our people; and I hope the Senator will look to that item before we are done and stand with California upon that proposition.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I can assure my friend that I shall examine the matter, and if I think that California is right I shall be happy to support the hands of her mighty Joshua as he fights for the right.

Mr. President, may I say, tempted by the observation of my friend, that the copper mines of my State have been shut down for a long, long time, not because of competition in the production of copper, but because no buyers could be found. Our industries do not consume it and Germany, who wanted millions of pounds, could not buy. So, if my friend says that the quicksilver production has been restricted because of competition, I can assure him that there are many productions that have been restricted, if not destroyed, because there was no market, either domestic or foreign; and I will say to my friend that there will be more factories closed down, and there will be less mines operated, if the selfish policy of some American manufacturers and trusts shall prevail.

Mr. President, we can open our mines and smelters and mills and bring back prosperity to the farm and send our ships laden with our products to the ports of the world if we will recognize the fact that international trade and commerce means that there must be international exchanges. We can send our ships to foreign ports with our products if we do not require them to return in ballast.

What could California do, rich and powerful and blessed as she is, unless she found a market for her surplus products? In the southern part of California there will be 2,000,000 people within the next 25 years. California, as a whole, will have five millions of people or more within that same period. They are producers. They must find markets. They can not consume all that they produce. My State can not consume all the copper or the wool or sugar which it produces.

Now, I will come back to citric acid and speak for a few moments upon that, and then yield the floor. I started to talk a little about citric acid, and my friend from North Dakota interrupted me to talk about citrate of lime, but his interruption was entirely proper and relevant.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, I think, as my colleague thinks, that those several items should be considered together, and when the Senator shall have finished with what he is saying I will ask that we pass over that item.

Mr. KING. Until we reach the citrate of lime item?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Yes.

Mr. KING. I will say to the Senator that I was going to ask the chairman of the committee, or my distinguished friend from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], that we consider the citrate of lime item, which is in paragraph 46, and the citric acid item, which is in paragraph 1, together, because they are in pari materia.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from California and my colleague that I care not whether we turn now to the consideration of citrate of lime or pass this item over until we reach paragraph 46, in which citrate of lime appears. It is evident that the citrate of lime rate must be first determined before we finally determine the rate upon citric acid, and I think myself it is just as well to pass this over at this time until we reach paragraph 46, or else turn to paragraph 46 now and take up citrate of lime and dispose of that, and then return to this item. Whichever way the Senator from California desires that we follow is perfectly satisfactory to the committee.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. If it is consistent with the rules, then I suggest that we pass this over until we come to the later item.

Mr. SMOOT. That is perfectly satisfactory to the committee.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. And that we consider them both together.

Mr. KING. I have no objection. I will not ask for any vote on this—I do not think I ought to—until we consider the two together, because if a duty is laid on citric acid a higher duty must be laid upon citrate of lime, and if we shall conclude to lower the rate on citrate of lime, then, of course, there ought to be a diminution in this duty.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from California, I understand, requests that we pass over this item at this time and take it up when we reach citrate of lime, in paragraph 46.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Yes; I do.

Mr. KING. That will be agreeable to me, and I will finish my statement a little later.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I did not want to interrupt the Senator in his statement now.

Mr. KING. I would rather not go on with it now.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that this item be passed over temporarily, and that we proceed with the next item.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KING. I have no objection, and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

PROPOSED NATURALIZATION AND CITIZENSHIP LEGISLATION.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, on April 5 I introduced a bill (S. 3403) to provide a uniform rule of naturalization and to amend and codify the laws relating to the acquisition and loss of citizenship; to equalize the citizenship status of men and women; to establish a method for the registration of aliens for their better guidance and protection, and for other purposes. The views of the Secretary of Labor were requested, and I am to-day in receipt of a letter from him. I ask unanimous consent that this letter may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, May 4, 1922.

Hon. SAMUEL M. SHORTRIDGE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: You have recently requested my views on the matter of naturalization and citizenship legislation which is now pending in the Senate. You have yourself introduced a measure intended to greatly facilitate naturalization and Americanization, as well as to extend educational advantages to aliens. I am glad indeed to have this opportunity to express myself on this subject.

So that you may more readily appreciate my attitude and the keen interest which I take in this matter, I will first say that I was myself an immigrant, arriving here with my mother, four brothers, and a sister from Wales at the age of 8 years. My father had come to the United States previously and had sent back to Wales passage money to pay for the transportation in steerage of the family which he had left behind him when he sought better things in the New World. My first experience in this land of liberty was trailing along beside my mother vainly endeavoring to find the two featherbeds which had been the pride of the family and which had become lost in the shuffle at the then immigrant station, Castle Garden. To add to the confusion some sharpy had relieved my mother also of what little money she had. Altogether, with the experiences which I had with the family as immigrants and as foreign citizens during the years I worked in the mills with my father and living all my life among aliens and immigrants of many nationalities, gradually working up through the ranks, I can speak sympathetically on the needs of the alien from his viewpoint, as well as with consideration as to serving the best interests of the Republic.

I can see in such legislation only good for the alien himself. As I view it, the legislation under consideration makes it possible for the alien to become not only a good citizen, when he has the right to be a citizen at all, but one fully understanding America and what it stands for, at the same time making it hard, and justly so, for undesirables to get their papers. What opposition has been manifested comes from just two sources. First, the Red, or anarchistic element; and second, the misinformed as to the purposes and intents of the legislation contemplated. Statements have been made in the foreign-language press in an effort to stir up opposition which are exactly contrary to the real facts as to what will occur under the administration of the law.

As an illustration of misinformation, one foreign-language paper recently carried an editorial criticizing the contemplated legislation which we are discussing as tending to make the alien discouraged, disgruntled, and inimical to America and its institutions. It takes the attitude that this measure throws into discard the American ideals of tolerance, equality, human kindness, and the spirit of cooperation which were "zealously fostered by such immortal men as Washington, Jefferson, Hamilton, Clay, Lincoln," etc. It does not mention that in Jefferson's administration there was in existence a law which required all aliens to register, but without any intention of giving them any of the advantages contemplated in this bill. If one were to believe the information which this paper gives, a common language and the teaching of principles of government, history, and economics would "retard immeasurably the work of our justly famous 'melting pot.'" It asks the question: "Why not befriend the alien and extend to him a helping hand, as was America's glorious custom in former years?" calling attention to the fact that "the real American way is to make friends, not lose them."

Anyone who had read the bill would recognize that it is specifically designed to encourage the alien, increase his respect for American institutions, uphold American ideals of tolerance, equality, human kindness, and the spirit of cooperation, thus making more efficient our famous "melting pot." It will give every foreign-born citizen a just sense of pride in the possession of his citizenship and a trust in the Government of the United States.

I believe the bill which has just been introduced by you, known as Senate bill 3403, is the real American way to make friends. Summed up the bill provides:

1. A required standard of education for citizenship.
2. Ability to use and understand a common language, making it possible for every citizen to communicate with each other, understand his work and the regulations made for his protection in industry, increase his opportunities for entertainment, and add greatly to his ability to use and enjoy the full advantages of residence in America.
3. Facilities for the naturalization process, eliminating the necessity for furnishing witnesses who have known the alien for five full years. It is estimated that this will save to aliens becoming naturalized between $3,500,000 and $7,000,000 each year.
4. Protection against destitution for himself and family should he become permanently disabled, and for his family should he die and leave dependents unable to care for themselves.
5. Machinery to accomplish the purposes of the act through enrollment and the payment of a small annual fee.

The contemplated new citizenship legislation is essentially a program of education in which every alien enrolls for citizenship training. The desire is first to teach English so that we will be a Nation with a common language; every citizen standing upon an equal basis with every other in ability to understand all matters of general interest and to communicate one with another upon the many subjects which arise in the daily life of every man, woman, and child in the country. No one cause of dissension and international strife in the countries of the Old World has proved more efficient than misunderstanding. These misunderstandings have bred the jealousy and hate which we find everywhere and which have given rise to battles and wars of more or less serious consequences throughout all ages.

We can not change these feelings of national antipathy overnight nor without organized effort. There must be a campaign for better understanding, and the first essential is that the parties be able to communicate with each other.

But that is not the only advantage which accrues from the knowledge of a common language. It actually means dollars and cents to the workman to be able to understand the orders given to him for execution and not follow blindly what some one else is doing. Many accidents in industry are caused through inability to understand the regulations made for the protection of the workmen.

Many sources of amusement are closed to those who do not understand the national language. Being unable to read our books, our periodicals, and our newspapers the foreign born gets a very limited knowledge of our history and of our institutions. He takes only what some one else who does know sees fit to pass on to him. The greatest menace to American institutions is ignorance led by selfish education—the man who has to get his information from one who sees fit to give him only such as will serve his selfish interests. The alien should be educated and made to think and argue for himself. He should not be allowed to take for gospel truth those statements made from a soap box by some red leader in his campaign of anarchy. Good citizenship would mean the practical elimination of anarchy and the reduction of labor disturbances to a minimum. By knowing English and being able to read and reason out things for himself, the alien or foreign born would soon learn the relationship existing between capital and labor.

In addition to English, the alien should be taught the several other subjects which treat of our national life—history, government, and economy. These are far from being dry subjects. They can and should be presented in an interesting manner which will remove the tediousness of study and accomplish quicker and better results. I have in mind the application of visual education; series of films depicting national and international affairs. The evenings when the citizenship classes get together in community meetings for their education would be social evenings. They would have their moving pictures and instruction first and later perhaps a songfest and a dance.

Also in our campaign for better citizenship through education we should make liberal use of the foreign language and labor press as a medium of publicity and instruction. Carry the English lessons with a thorough treatment in the native tongue alongside of it; carry also, for instance, the story in English that is to be presented at the next class meeting in picture form. Coordinate them so that the man or woman or child in citizenship training classes would look forward to his evening of instruction with anticipation of an evening of amusement and of social intercourse.

I would not in any way restrict the use of foreign languages. To do so would be like taking from the alien one of his best friends. He has his native literature and song; the language of the Old World is the language of his mother, and all remembrances of his mother should be sacred. Let the alien keep this heritage, and even encourage him to keep up his correspondence with the Old World and keep in touch with international affairs. His knowledge will help him as an American and will benefit us. America will never suffer by contrast with the land of origin of the immigrant.

It is essential also as a prerequisite of patriotism that one love and honor one's parents—especially is one's respect for one's mother an index to patriotism. In every campaign encourage devotion to mother, and it will almost naturally follow that the alien will love his country and his God.

It is my understanding that your bill will enable the Secretary of Labor, after enrolling all aliens, to appoint a national advisory committee to assist him in making such regulations for carrying on the work of naturalization as would seem to best suit the needs or requirements not only of the United States but of better cooperating with the several nationalities and races represented. The national committee would comprise the leading men in every one of these groups of enrolled persons. They would serve without compensation, to the end that a better understanding and a more efficient working basis for Americanization and naturalization could be worked out. Under the national commission would be local commissions made up in the same way, and, as the Secretary of Labor would be chairman of the national committee, the local naturalization examiner would be the head or chairman of the local commission. These commissions, through the individual members representing each one of the nationalities or races enrolled, would assist in making up the program for education and Americanization in the local communities.

These organizations would work with the local schools, the churches, fraternities, and civic and patriotic bodies. They would outline the programs for education, determining to what extent textbooks, moving pictures, dramas, and other means of education could be best utilized. At present there is no organized program for such work. A number of separate organizations have undertaken it, but they have been without direction. Having once organized it would not be difficult for the different groups of aliens to work out their own associations for promoting singing, drama, and many other forms of self-advancement, furnishing entertainment and recreation as well as instruction.

Singing as a community asset most of these people recognized in the countries from which they came. After coming to the United States this great influence was allowed to die out, and the folk songs of their native countries do not live in the hearts of their children. Drama is getting to be a lost art. It seems to me that in permitting these to fall into disuse we are losing a valuable asset which could be used to great advantage in stimulating patriotism and developing a keener desire for the better things which America affords. Encourage community singing and get the older people together with the youth to sing in their mother tongues the songs which were dear to them in childhood. At the same time teach them the patriotic and folk songs of our own Nation. By working up enthusiasm for singing and stimulating the bringing back of this European custom, we can more readily teach our own songs—"The Star-Spangled Banner," "America," "The Battle Hymn of the Republic," and even "Yankee Doodle," or some of our other comic songs which we love so well. We do not oppose the foreign language, but we must have in America one common language for all.

The drama is another powerful agency which is fast losing ground. This should not be permitted. There is much talent among the foreign born if it were but used. Let our local commissions seek out this talent and put it to work. Each nationality could stage episodes of national life of their native countries, to be staged for the benefit of the others, and let them all combine in staging at least once a year—at the time when the court acts upon final petitions for citizenship—a great drama depicting scenes in American national history. Then organize great testimonial meetings, and let each new citizen get up and tell why he believes in American citizenship, what the United States has done for him, and what he expects to do in return for the privileges which have been granted him.

I can picture to myself the great army of foreign born banded together through the enrollment system as one great fraternal organization working toward the commendable end of fostering better citizenship and greater respect for American institutions, and in this work of Americanization there is a part for every American citizen individually and through the organizations of the church, fraternal, civic, and patriotic societies, for we should extend to the foreign born every assistance possible to secure the accomplishment of the ends aimed at. All have a duty and a privilege in spreading the gospel of truth about America and its institutions to counteract the radical propaganda of the few who dispense seeds of anarchism and of hate for selfish purposes of their own. My idea of unhappiness is nothing to do. Work makes us all happy, and that should be our favorite pastime. When we have nothing else to do let each one of us join in and further this great work. It will make our melting pot far more efficient if we all get out and work together, and that is one of the aims of the legislation contemplated—to get all the organizations possible interested in this one subject, better citizenship.

And let our first thought be tolerance. Tolerance has always been my favorite virtue. In it I see an easier and better way to get along with my neighbor. We will always have, so long as we uphold the traditions of the past, the foreign born with us. Let us look for their virtues and expect not too much from those who have not had the advantages which we have had through our institutions, but rather encourage them to secure an equal, and, if they can, a better education and knowledge than our own.

Another great provision, my dear Senator, that is included in the bill which you have introduced is that which provides for taking care of aliens who become destitute. You know under the present immigration laws should an alien become a public charge before he has resided here five years he is subject to arrest and deportation to the country from which he came. Think of the tragedy which must follow when the breadwinner, the father of a family of five or six small children, dies and leaves them without means of support. And this you will find is true in most such instances: That the alien who dies and leaves a family in this condition before having been five years in America seldom leaves behind sufficient means to care for the family. The small children also make it impossible for the mother to earn a living for them and they have to be sent back. They have no home on the other side. Perhaps they have lost all communication with their friends, and yet we do not deem it our duty as American citizens to take care of them. One of the provisions of this bill creates a fund from which these people could be taken care of and the family educated. This may seem paternalistic, but when our alien population is banded together under the enrollment system, much as a fraternal order is organized for mutual help in just such contingencies, that stigma is removed and it takes on the essential elements of some of our leading fraternities.

The machinery for carrying on the work which I have outlined, as you have set forth in legislative form, is very simple. All that is necessary is that the alien enroll and pay a small fee, which goes into a fund to be disbursed for the purposes outlined. Not one penny of the fees collected is to go into the coffers of the National Treasury as a tax upon aliens for the purpose of government. It is merely a small charge for education and insurance. Upon enrolling the alien is given a card, and periodically upon this card is entered his record, which will show the progress he has made in his studies and the status of his eligibility for citizenship. Another advantage of the card lies in that it is authentic identification, should the alien ever be in a strange place and find it necessary to prove his identity.

I have before me a table showing the number of foreign born from the various countries of the world, and the percentage of those naturalized. The following table shows the 10 nationalities having the highest percentage of naturalized American citizens among their foreign born:

Country.	Per cent naturalized.	Per cent unnaturalized.
Wales	74.4	25.6
Germany	73.6	26.4
Luxemburg	73.4	26.6

It will be noted that even of the aliens most responsive in taking out their citizenship papers, more than 25 per cent have failed to avail themselves of the privilege. There are many reasons for this, some of them easy to determine, others must be left to conjecture. One of the most important factors in deterring aliens from becoming citizens is their inability to produce qualified witnesses. Under the present law it is required that they produce two or more witnesses, citizens of the United States, who have known them personally for five years. This does not seem to be an unreasonable requirement nor one difficult to comply with. Certainly it is not unreasonable when we consider the value of American citizenship and the protection that should be given it, and yet I know that many men and women whom we would welcome as first-class citizens can not produce those witnesses, and many who do secure citizenship can only procure their witnesses at great expense. The enrollment feature of the new legislation does away with all this requirement of witnesses. There is no getting away from the card record which he carries with him and a copy of which is made a part of the permanent records of the Government. It gives mute testimony in vouching for his eligibility to become one of us who are running and operating this greatest of all Governments. But whatever the causes for nonnaturalization, we can determine them and take steps to remedy any defects in our law or processes.

Some objection has been raised on the ground that the enrollment provision would constitute a system of espionage similar to that which has been practiced by the militaristic governments of some of the countries of Europe. If I or, I believe, any one of the 531 Senators and Representatives thought for one moment that this would develop into an espionage system or savor of the autocratic, monarchistic régime of the broken European governments, the measure would never be considered for a moment, and I for one should use every vestige of power which I possess to defeat such a move if it were made. But this legislation is, I am sure, an honest effort on the part of the Government to cooperate with every private organization and individual in raising the standard of citizenship and making it easier to attain that standard and acquire the privilege. True, as an incident to the working of the law, those aliens of anarchistic blood and selfish motives for aggrandizement would be discovered. We would prevent the extortion of millions of dollars by people now engaged in making out and advising on citizenship matters for aliens unable to understand the process. The immigration law already provides that those aliens in America in violation of law and with motives of overthrow of our Government and institutions shall be deported. But the provisions of the new legislation are not to spy upon the alien in the United States on legitimate business. It is intended to aid him in his search for the better things in life, to give him an opportunity to understand us and give us an opportunity to understand him, so that we may live together with better understanding of each other's trials and ambitions, and to make for all a better and safer place to reside.

The Government should not be overpaternalistic; that attitude would be repellant; but it should be helpful, and this is the purpose of the new legislation contemplated. Many have been the utterances of foreign-born citizens against the Government because they did not understand it, and because the Government apparently was willing to do nothing to help him in solving the many problems of life in a strange country. With the facilities offered, and the alien himself paying for them in a small fee, he gets closer to the Government, and its officers are able to help and assist in individual problems. This service and spirit of helpfulness will do more in cementing friendship between our people and Government, and creating respect for law and our other institutions, than any police or Federal regulations which could be devised.

I shall always remember that I was an immigrant, and all the people with whom I became acquainted and worked during my early years were immigrants, and that these immigrants were largely instrumental in developing the coal, steel, tin, and other industries of the country. I shall always keep them in mind. I believe what the immigrant wants in America is not so much sobbing and sighing about him and his condition, but a true, wholesome, and sympathetic understanding of him and his problems, and that he wants only an opportunity to help himself, and that with this opportunity he will develop not only his own interests but those of our Republic.

Cordially yours, JAMES J. DAVIS.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives on the amendments of the Senate to House bill 10101, the District of Columbia appropriation bill, which the Secretary will read.

The reading clerk proceeded to read the action of the House.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, this is a very important amendment, changing not only the Senate provision but also the House provision, and there is so much confusion in the Chamber that I could not hear it. I ask that the Clerk may read that amendment from the beginning.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, before that is done——

Mr. SMOOT. Let us have it read.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state his inquiry.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I would like to inquire if this measure is now before the Senate for consideration and action.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is just laying it before the Senate for action.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Of course, it is a privileged measure, but I apprehend that it would take considerable time to dispose of it if it involves a readjustment of the fiscal conditions in the District of Columbia.

Mr. SMOOT. That is why I wanted it read over, and at a time when we could hear the Clerk read it. It is an important matter, and I would like to hear what the conferees have agreed upon.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, as I understand it, the conferees did not agree upon anything. This is an amendment agreed to by the House, and it comes to us not as a report from the conference committee but upon a motion to concur in the amendment put on by the House. It changes existing law. It is of vast importance, and I think it is of so great importance that it ought to go to the committee. I hope the Senator in charge of the bill will not try to put the amendment through in this way. If it came here as a conference report, the amendment would be subject to a point of order. There is no question about that in my mind, because it changes a law which provides for an appropriation for one year to a provision for an appropriation for five years. It seems to me that this matter is so important that the committee ought to pass upon it, and I hope the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS] will ask that it be referred to the committee.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I suggest to the Senator from Kansas that the provision put on in the Senate was just about as broad as it could be, and I question very seriously if this proposition, if it came here as a part of the conference report, would be subject to a point of order, because of the broad provision the Senate put on. But, as the Senator has said, it does not come here as a part of a conference report. It comes as an amendment by the House. However, it is no broader than the Senate provision, though a little more in detail.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator from Kansas yield to me for a question?

Mr. CURTIS. I yield the floor.

Mr. NORRIS. Who has the floor, Mr. President?

Mr. HARRISON. I thought I had the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Mississippi has the floor.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator from Mississippi yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to say to the Senator from Mississippi that I have to leave the Chamber at 2 o'clock to attend a hearing before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. I presume this amendment will be voted on and that there will be a roll call, and therefore I want to take just a few minutes to explain what my vote would be and why.

I understand the conferees have yielded on the so-called Jones amendment. That amendment consisted of a bill which had been passed by the Senate. When that bill passed the Senate there was an amendment put on exempting improvements of real property to the amount of $2,000. I understand the Senate conferees have yielded on that proposition.

Mr. JONES of Washington. This does not come as an agreement. There was a disagreement upon amendment No. 1.

Mr. NORRIS. What has become of that amendment?

Mr. JONES of Washington. That amendment is still in disagreement unless we agree to the amendment proposed by the House. That is, the House concurred in the Senate amendment with an amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. And that amendment excludes the exemption?

Mr. JONES of Washington. That amendment does exclude the exemption.

Mr. NORRIS. Then I want to say just a few words, because I presume some time during the afternoon we will vote upon it and there will be a roll call and my vote will be misunderstood. I am going to vote against it. I am going to vote against any conference report which omits that exemption.

I have noticed recently in the papers a great fuss that is being made about this disagreement on something else, but in the argument that is being used by speakers and writers they are continually saying if this thing is put through the poor people are going to have to pay more taxes. These men who, with such large hearts, are looking after the poor, never discuss, except to condemn, the proposition that with the Senate amendment agreed to there would be an exemption for the poor man to the extent of $2,000, or a compromise of that amount, upon his home. That would, of course, necessarily increase the tax on other property.

I have noticed in the discussion which has taken place by members of the chambers of commerce and bankers and other men, almost universally very wealthy men, it has been in the name of the poor and for the purpose of saving the poor man from paying taxes; they want to do so-and-so for the poor man. They never discuss the proposition except for the purpose of condemnation, when the same amendment contained a provision which, if enacted into the law, would exempt from taxation $2,000 of the value of every poor man's homestead in the District of Columbia.

When the negotiations were going on and the House conferees were objecting to that proposition I had a conference with the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], one of the Senate conferees. He submitted to me a proposition and asked whether I thought it would be agreeable for them to compromise on that basis and say that this exemption should apply only to the homestead and should be cut down to $1,000. I frankly said that so far as I was concerned, while I would rather have it the other way, I would be perfectly willing to agree to a compromise of that kind.

I have talked personally with at least one member of the House conferees who expressed to me his idea that the House conferees ought to agree to the amendment, that he was in favor of it himself. I can not understand why this terrible fuss in the city of Washington is being made to save the poor man from the payment of some taxes while they are condemning the very amendment that will relieve the poor man from the payment of some of the taxes on his home. Of course, I know why they are doing it. I understand that; but that is not the pretense that is going on. Mass meetings are being held and articles are being written in all the papers telling how we propose to tax the poor, but they make no reference, except to condemn, to the very proposition which will relieve the poor from taxation. I am not to-day going to discuss the merits of the proposition. I discussed it fully when it was originally presented to the Senate. However, so far as my vote is concerned, I am going to vote against anything that does not recognize just that amendment.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I ask the Senator from Nebraska whether the result, so far as the exemption of $2,000 is concerned, which is aimed at by the people who are making the protest and to which he refers, is not the same that he desires? If the conference report is adopted, the measure he speaks of is defeated. The people to whom he refers as making the fuss, as he expresses it, in the papers and elsewhere, are opposing the conference report, and, consequently, whatever their motives may be, they take the same attitude and look toward the same result that the Senator from Nebraska is seeking.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not finding fault with the man who opposes the amendment and is in favor of the bill as originally offered. He has a perfect right to do that. But I do not want him to sail under false colors. A man can say that the poor people ought to pay more taxes than this bill calls for, but if he believes in that, let him say so. The facts are that both in and out of Congress capital is being made of the proposition that we are going to relieve the poor of some of their burdens. Here is an opportunity to do it.

We have recognized the principle of allowing certain exemptions on personal property. I understand the House conferees used that as an argument why it should not be done as to real property. In fact, it is an argument why it should be done. Everybody knows that the people with the small unit of property ninety times out of ninety-one pay a higher rate of taxation that the man with the big unit. The individual with his little home can not escape. The man with the mansion, while he is taxed more heavily, it is true, is not taxed, as a rule, as nearly on the basis of the actual cash value of his property as is the poor man.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. PHIPPS. Just at that point I desire to call the Senator's attention to the fact that during the consideration of the amendment the conferees had in mind the assessment of property at its full valuation so as to remove any inequality which it is claimed exists under the two-thirds basis in force at the present time, so that the large expensive buildings would be assessed on the basis of their full value and small property at a proportionate rate. There would probably be a reduction on the small house of the homesteader where a valuation of some five or six thousand dollars would be involved.

The conferees also had in mind the fact that an exemption of $1,000 on personal property in the District is comparable to three or four hundred dollars in other cities. It is believed that the report as made and embraced in the amendment now adopted by the House is equitable and does care for the conditions which the small homesteader has to meet. It will work a reduction in his taxation because it will mean a much lower rate than he has paid in the past.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator expects to help the poor man by having the full value instead of two-thirds value——

Mr. PHIPPS. We do, because on the full valuation basis the property of greater value will be raised more in proportion than will his.

Mr. NORRIS. I hope it will, but I do not see any assurance that it will. If we want to get at the two-thirds value of a piece of property, we first get the full value and then take two-thirds of it. If we do not take two-thirds of it, we have the full value. I do not see any difference, so far as the comparison between the rich man and the poor man is concerned, as between the old method and the new method.

Mr. PHIPPS. That is true in theory, but not in practice. In fact, it is believed that the assessors, knowing that they are not called upon to return full value, estimate the two-thirds value instead of going through the records and getting the real value.

Mr. NORRIS. If it works that way, I would be very glad if that were true. I do not see how it makes any particular difference myself.

But, Mr. President, the man who is escaping and the man who ought to be taxed is the speculator in real estate, whether in the District of Columbia or any other place. If we give a reasonable exemption from taxation on the improvements, especially the home, we add to the burden of the man who holds vacant property for the purpose of speculation. The effect of it is to increase his taxes, and everybody ought to be willing to do that, even the speculator himself, because he gets his profit out of the toil of the man who has his home and who has no exemption.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I said in the beginning that I have a committee meeting which is now waiting for me, and I hope the Senator will not interrupt me.

Mr. PHIPPS. I am going to move that the amendment be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. NORRIS. Even if the Senator does that, while I am thus far I want to finish. The man with the home, the man who plants a rose, who builds a new step, who puts a new shingle on his house, who sows grass and waters it and cultivates it, who raises flowers, who plants fruit trees, is penalized every time he does anything of that kind, and it is for the benefit of the speculator who is holding property for speculation and who will get larger values for it when he is able to dispose of it. We penalize the man who makes the city beautiful, who makes it more habitable, who makes it more pleasant to live in, and who adds to its civilization and the happiness of its people, by increasing his taxation for every move that he makes. This exemption would give that man some incentive, some inducement to make his home and to build it up. It would give him an exemption that we can well afford to give, particularly when the effect of it will be to drive into use real estate that is now vacant, to drive the speculator to the place where he will have to sell his real estate or improve it.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, may I suggest, with the permission of the Senator from Mississippi, that I request that consideration of amendment No. 1 go over until we dispose of the others, regarding which I believe there will be no objection. Then I will follow with a motion that amendment No. 1 be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HARRISON. I am very glad to hear the Senator say that he intends to move to refer it to the Committee on Appropriations, but before that motion is presented I desire to make a point of order against the amendment, and I desire to argue that point of order. So I hope the Senator will not insist upon it at this time.

Mr. PHIPPS. As the Senator desires to argue it eventually, he may as well proceed now.

Mr. HARRISON. I have another matter which I think will prove more interesting to the Senator than that right now.

Mr. PHIPPS. Very well.

NAT GOLDSTEIN.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, there was no candidate for the Republican nomination two years ago who was sailing more smoothly toward success, apparently, at the Republican convention——

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator wait a moment until I finish the sentence and then I think the Senator will be glad he heard me.

There was no candidate, as I said, sailing more smoothly toward success at the Republican convention than ex-Governor Lowden, of Illinois, and the thing that turned his chances and accomplished his defeat more than anything else was the corrupting of two delegates from the State of Missouri to the Republican convention.

Now I yield to the Senator from Colorado for a question.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that amendment No. 1 be referred to the Committee on Appropriations for action.

Mr. HARRISON. I object for the present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is objection.

Mr. HARRISON. I desire to read from some of the testimony which was produced at the hearing before the committee investigating corruption in the preconvention campaigns, so that the minds of Senators will be refreshed as to who these delegates were, the amount of money which was raised, and the sources from which the money came, and how it was spent. Before I proceed to read, however, I want to say that I am not taking up the time of the Senate uselessly, because, if the New York Times and the New York World and other papers are to be believed, there has come to the Senate in the nomination for collector of internal revenue at St. Louis, Mo., the name of one of the men who was "bought and paid for" at that time. So I am sure Senators want to know all about this individual from the testimony which was taken before the committee which investigated the matter at that time.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. HARRISON. Not for the present, Mr. President. There appeared before that committee Mr. Moore. His home is St. Louis. He is a deputy clerk under a man named Nat Goldstein, who is the clerk, Mr. Moore working under him as his deputy. These two men were political favorites in the Republican Party and were men of power, not only in their precincts and wards but in their city and in their State. Mr. Moore in appearing before the committee made a statement, from which I shall now quote:

Who gave you that money?

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] asked him that question. I am sorry the Senator from Missouri is not here. I sent word to him that I would speak on this matter this afternoon, but I think the Senator is out of the city on important business:

Senator SPENCER. Who gave you that money?
Mr. MOORE. The check was given to me by Mr. Babler.

Mr. Babler was, I think, the national Republican committeeman from Missouri.

Senator SPENCER. What was it to be used for?
Mr. MOORE. The money was given to me; at that time Mr. Babler said, "Here is a check for $2,500 from Mr. Emmerson"—

Mr. Emmerson was Mr. Lowden's handy man, who had plenty of money to spend at that time in order to get delegates from Missouri—

I asked him what it was for. Mr. Babler said, "Well, you can use the money for the campaign; you can use it for the election of delegates—for whatever purpose you see fit." I had previously told Mr. Babler in Mr. Emmerson's presence that there was no occasion to use a dollar of money for the selection of delegates to any convention that I knew of.

* * * * * * *

Senator SPENCER. Then what was your next conversation in regard to the matter?
Mr. MOORE. That was the only conversation in regard to it. The next I knew of any money, anything about any money, was when Mr. Babler phoned me to come to his office. I went to his office, and he said, "Here is a check for $2,500." I said, "Why, what is this for?" He said, "That is money that Mr. Emmerson sent to you." I told him at that time that I had told Mr. Emmerson that there would be no use for any money.

Mr. Moore, in answer to the question of the junior Senator from Missouri, says:

Pardon me, I took it; I told Mr. Babler at the time that there was no use for money. This came as much as a surprise to me as to anyone. The money came at that time. Mr. Babler called me into his office, and he said, "Here is this $2,500." I said, "I do not want any $2,500, Jake." He said, "Go ahead. It is all right. Use it in the fall; use it when you want it." That is Mr. Babler's statement.

A little further on Mr. Moore says:

I would have felt free to use it. It was given to me as custodian; I had charge of the money; and there was no accounting to be made. I was to spend the money as I saw fit. If I saw fit to use it to further Governor Lowden's interests, I was free to do so.
Senator SPENCER. And you did not spend any of it?
Mr. MOORE. No.
The CHAIRMAN. Are you a delegate to the national convention?
Mr. MOORE. I am.
The CHAIRMAN. When were you elected a delegate?
Mr. MOORE. February 16, 1920.

* * * * * * *

The CHAIRMAN. Did you talk with Mr. Babler about being a delegate?
Mr. MOORE. Mr. Babler—I had discussed with him about being a delegate.

A little further along the following occurred:

Senator REED. Have you told us all that you can think of that took place when you and Mr. Emmerson and Mr. Babler were present at this meeting?
Mr. MOORE. Yes; with the exception that Mr. Goldstein was present at the time.
Senator REED. When did he get there, after you came or before?
Mr. MOORE. Mr. Goldstein, I think, got there after I came.
Senator REED. Well, did you hear any talk—did Mr. Goldstein take any part in any of the conversation?
Mr. MOORE. Only in a general way.
Senator REED. Now, what was the general way that he took part?

Mr. MOORE. In so far that Mr. Babler explained to us that Mr. Emmerson was secretary of state, etc., and that he was managing Governor Lowden's campaign, and that Mr. Emmerson would take care of any expenses that we might be put to, etc.

Then Mr. Goldstein was asked by the chairman:

When did you first talk with Mr. Babler about the campaign; do you remember?

Mr. GOLDSTEIN. No; I just remember when there was any question about it. The first I recall is, as Mr. Moore has told you, when Mr. Babler called us up to his office.

* * * * * * *

The CHAIRMAN. What did you do with the money?

Mr. GOLDSTEIN. I deposited it in the Liberty Bank, where it still remains.

The CHAIRMAN. In a separate fund?

Mr. GOLDSTEIN. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. In your own checking account?

Mr. GOLDSTEIN. In my own checking account.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you consider it in the nature of a trust fund?

Mr. GOLDSTEIN. I did. I did not see any reason why it might not just as well be deposited there as some other place.

Senator SPENCER. Has that amount been intact ever since?

Mr. GOLDSTEIN. It has been intact ever since.

The CHAIRMAN. In your own private checking account?

Mr. GOLDSTEIN. Yes.

Senator REED. What you mean is that you placed $2,500 in the bank and that they credited your personal account?

Mr. GOLDSTEIN. Yes.

Senator REED. And you check on your personal account, which account was made up of this $2,500 and other moneys that you had put in there from time to time?

Mr. GOLDSTEIN. And checked out.

* * * * * * *

The CHAIRMAN. When this matter was first presented to you by the reporter of the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, did you not deny receiving any money?

Mr. GOLDSTEIN. I did.

The CHAIRMAN. Why?

Mr. GOLDSTEIN. Just because I knew I had made a mistake. In the first place, I really thought—I knew that it was not intended for my district, for Governor Lowden. It could not have been, because there was no excuse for spending a dollar in that district.

And I shall place in the RECORD certain parts of this testimony; but it seems that Goldstein admits taking the $2,500 while he was a delegate to the convention and was for Mr. Lowden. That he deposited the money in the bank and checked on the money just as he did on other funds in the bank; it was mixed with his own account; but he afterwards repented doing so, and said that he had made a mistake. Yet, Mr. President, if the newspapers are to be believed, that same Mr. Goldstein is now honored by the President of the United States with an appointment as collector of internal revenue in the State of Missouri, and that appointment is now here for the Senate to pass on and to say whether or not they will confirm him.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. CARAWAY. Does not Mr. Goldstein seem to be a pretty good collector?

Mr. HARRISON. He is a splendid collector—like Republicans generally.

Now, it may be asked, What did Moore get in the way of a position? He has not as yet received a position from the present administration, but Moore is Goldstein's deputy, and when Goldstein gets the place of collector of internal revenue naturally there will be an opening created for Mr. Moore and he will step one round higher. He will doubtless be made clerk, with an increased salary.

Mr. President, that is not all of the story. There have been other appointments made by the present administration in other States which perhaps are equally as bad; but I will confine myself in the brief remarks I intend to make to the State of Missouri. In other States, perhaps, the conditions are as bad, if not worse, but in Missouri at that time Lowden money was free, and I shall show before I conclude that Harding money also was plentiful. However, other individuals than Moore and Goldstein received money from the Lowden campaign. They were delegates, perhaps, at that time, or, at any rate, workers in the Republican ranks. Some of those men have also been rewarded.

Sirs, I know this will open your eyes; that you will bow your heads in shame because of the revelation. You did not know that such characters were being appointed to high and responsible positions by the powers that be.

E. L. Morse, who received $32,000 from the Lowden campaign fund at that time and was the paymaster for Missouri, has not yet received a position from this administration. He is a generous man; he has humanitarian instincts. He was kind enough to lease his beautiful home, since this administration came in, at Excelsior Springs, Mo.—I believe that is the name of the place—to the Veterans' Bureau for the hospital service, and the Government is now using it. That was a generous act upon his part. He did not do that because he received $32,000 and spent it in that campaign. He is a little different from others there who did get money, though, and tried to create Lowden sentiment.

Roy T. Davis, who received $500 of the Lowden money, has since been made minister to Costa Rica by this administration.

W. H. Allen was handed money from the same sources and in the same manner that Goldstein and Moore were given money. Allen did not get as much as Goldstein; he only received $400; but Allen to-day is State prohibition agent for the State of Missouri, appointed to that high place by the present administration. It looks as if the only way to get a good position in Missouri from the Republican Party is to have been corrupted by Republican emissaries before the Republican convention.

There is another man out there, W. L. Cole, who did not obtain as much money as Moore and Goldstein received, but he received it in the same way. Five hundred dollars was the amount which he received from the Lowden campaign managers, and at about the same time he got $1,250 from Daugherty, the present Attorney General, who went to Missouri to work for Harding. So he received $1,750 for his part. Those who were particularly interested, however, could never find out just how Cole stood before the convention. Naturally he was neutral between Harding and Lowden because he had received money from both of them.

Lowden's forces said they thought that Cole was with them, and Harding's forces thought that Cole was with them, but I believe finally they agreed that Cole was first for Lowden and as a second choice he was to be for Harding.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, which one paid him last?

Mr. HARRISON. Harding paid him last, and finally he voted for Harding. The amount was a little larger.

What has Cole received? Cole to-day is a special assistant to the Attorney General, living here in Washington and getting a big salary; so that is the way they do things among certain Republicans out in Missouri.

I want to read, just briefly, because it is interesting, something of the testimony about Mr. Cole. It is very interesting. Mr. Morse was testifying, and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] asked him this question. You will remember that the Senator from New Jersey was asking these questions. He was going deeper into the proposition. He said to Morse:

You started jotting them down at the Congress Hotel in Chicago, did you?

Mr. MORSE. Yes, sir; $500 to Mr. Cole, chairman of the Republican State committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know anything about his having received money from Senator Harding's managers?

It was the former Senator from Iowa, Mr. Kenyon, who asked that question, and Mr. Morse said:

I do not want to do Mr. Cole an injustice. We were in the midst of a campaign in the third congressional district for the election of a Congressman, and I gave this money to Mr. Cole, and he told me he was going to use it for the opening up of the headquarters there.

* * * * * * *

The CHAIRMAN. Was he working for Governor Lowden?

Mr. MORSE. He was for Governor Lowden; yes.

A little further on:

The CHAIRMAN. Did you know anything about his receiving Harding money, as the testimony here discloses?

Mr. MORSE. Not until after the disclosures at the committee meeting.

Senator REED. Did you suppose at that time he was for Governor Lowden?

Mr. MORSE. Yes.

Senator REED. You have been very active for Mr. Lowden, have you not?

Mr. MORSE. Yes, sir.

Senator REED. And you have a reputation in our State for knowing what is going on in politics.

Mr. MORSE. He never gave any evidence of being otherwise than for Governor Lowden at all of our meetings.

The CHAIRMAN. Was it a surprise to you to know that he had received money from the Harding men?

Mr. MORSE. Yes; I was surprised. I understand that he explained it by saying that he was the second choice.

Senator REED. Well, he got twice as much money from the second choice. Did you ever hear that story about the colored man who was accused of not delivering his vote; and the Republican said to him, "I gave you $5 for your vote, and you did not vote for me." And the colored man said, "Yes, sir; but," he said, "the Democrat gave me $2.50 and I voted for him"; and the Republican asked him, "Why did you do that?" And he said, "Because you Republicans are the most corrupt."

The man that paid the most money was the second choice in this case?

Mr. MORSE. Well, I was not aware of that fact until after this disclosure.

The CHAIRMAN. Is Mr. Cole a delegate to the convention?

Mr. MORSE. He is one of the delegates at large.

Senator REED. What are Mr. Cole's initials?

Mr. MORSE. W. L. Cole.

Mr. President, that is the character of men that are holding high positions in the Federal service to-day at the instance of this administration. Those who received money to influence delegates in Missouri before the last Republican convention are the ones who now have the high places in that State. Allen is the State prohibition agent, and he received $400. Cole received $500 from Lowden and $1,250 from Daugherty on behalf of Harding. He is now Special Assistant Attorney General of the United States. Roy T. Davis, minister to Costa Rica, appointed by this administration, received $500. Goldstein is the next on the list; and you will be called on to say by your votes whether you will indorse the President's action in sending to the Senate the name of a man who acknowledged taking $2,500, and said afterwards that he had made a mistake.

I serve notice on you now that if there is any way to discuss this nomination in the open it will be discussed in the open. If there is any way for the American people to know how Senators vote upon it, they will know.

It is a pity that men without stain or suspicion can not be found by the present Republican leadership to be appointed to these high places.

I shall not believe, even though your actions indicate the contrary, that good men, free from corruption, apostles of purity in politics, can not be found within the Republican Party to fill these places.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, my friend from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] has already been discussing the nomination in the open, before the committee has reported. This matter is before the committee. The committee has made no report. I think it would have been more in keeping with the proprieties if the Senator had come to the committee and had made his objection to the committee having the subject under consideration.

I knew nothing whatever about this matter, and neither did the other members of the committee, until the nomination came to the committee. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] lives in the city of St. Louis, and on yesterday he made his statement respecting the standing and character of this man. Up to this time the committee has given the matter no consideration. Until the committee has acted and has reported favorably on the nomination, it occurs to me that it is not exactly proper to be discussing the subject on the floor of the Senate, though, of course, I do not desire to criticize my friend unduly; but if the committee shall report favorably, after consideration, and the matter comes here, I presume that, like every other nomination, it will be discussed in accordance with the rules of the Senate. If the committee, after full consideration, shall conclude to report the nomination favorably, my friend from Mississippi may be assured that the members of the committee will have no objection to discussing the matter in the open.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. PHIPPS. I ask that the reading of the action of the House of Representatives on the District of Columbia appropriation bill may be concluded.

The reading clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the action of the House of Representatives, which is entire, as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES,
May 3, 1922.

Resolved, That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 114, 164, and 175 to the bill (H. R. 10101) entitled "An act making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes," and concur therein.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and concur therein with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by said amendment insert:

"That, annually, from and after July 1, 1922, 60 per cent of such expenses of the District of Columbia as Congress may appropriate for shall be paid out of the revenues of the District of Columbia derived from taxation and privileges, and the remaining 40 per cent by the United States, excepting such items of expense as Congress may direct shall be paid on another basis; and that in order that the District of Columbia may be able annually to comply with the provisions hereof, and also in order that the said District may be put upon a cash basis as to payment of expenses, there hereby is levied for each of the fiscal years ending June 30, 1923, 1924, 1925, 1926, and 1927, a tax at such rate on the full value, and no less, of all real estate and tangible personal property subject to taxation in the District of Columbia as will, when added to the revenues derived from privileges and from the tax on franchises, corporations, and public utilities, as fixed by law, and also from the tax, which hereby is levied, on such intangible personal property as is subject to taxation in the District of Columbia, at the rate of five-tenths of 1 per cent on the full market value thereof, produce money enough to pay such annual expenses as may be imposed on the District of Columbia by Congress, and in addition to such annual expenses a surplus fund sufficient to enable the District of Columbia to get upon a cash-paying basis by the end of the fiscal year 1927; and that the Commissioners of the District of Columbia hereby are empowered and directed to ascertain, determine, and fix such rate of taxation as will, when applied to the aforesaid property in accordance with the levies and values hereinbefore mentioned, produce the said sums of money; and that until July 1, 1927, the Treasury Department may continue to make advancements toward the payment of the expenses of the District of Columbia as has been done during preceding years, but after June 30, 1927, it shall be unlawful for any money to be so advanced or for any money whatever to be paid out of the Treasury for District purposes, unless the District, at the time of such payment, has to its credit in the Treasury money enough to pay the full per cent required of it; and that for the purpose of defraying such expenses of the District of Columbia as Congress may from time to time appropriate for, there hereby is levied for each and every fiscal year succeeding that ending June 30, 1927, a tax at such rate on the aforesaid property subject to taxation in the District (the rate fixed herein on intangible personal property not to be made less but which may be increased by the commissioners in their discretion) as will, when added to the other taxes and revenues of the District, produce money enough to enable the District to pay promptly and in full all sums directed by Congress to be paid by the District, and for which appropriation has been duly made; and that the Commissioners of the District of Columbia hereby are empowered and directed to ascertain, determine, and fix annually such rate of taxation as will, when applied as aforesaid, produce the money needed to defray the share of the expenses of the District during the year for which the rate is fixed; and that the Commissioners of the District shall, in accordance with existing law, cause all such taxes and revenues to be promptly collected and, when collected, to be daily deposited in the Treasury to the credit of the District for the purposes herein set out; and that on July 1, 1922, the Treasury Department shall open, and thereafter accurately keep, an account showing all receipts and disbursements relative to the revenues and expenditures of the District of Columbia, and shall also show the sources of the revenue, the purpose of expenditure, and the appropriation under which the expenditure is made; and that from and after June 30, 1922, any and all revenue derived from property not owned wholly or in part by the District of Columbia, as between the United States and the District of Columbia, shall be the property of the United States; and that after June 30, 1922, where the United States is the owner of ground or the holder thereof in trust for the public, upon which improvements have been made at the joint expense of the United States and the District of Columbia, the revenues therefrom shall first be used to pay the United States 3 per cent of the full value of the ground as a ground rent, and the remainder shall be divided between them in the same proportion that each contributed to said improvements, and for such purposes the assessor for the District of Columbia shall fix the full value of the ground after he has first made oath that he will fairly and impartially appraise the same; and that after June 30, 1922, any revenue derived from any activity or source whatever, including motor-vehicle licenses, not otherwise herein disposed of, which activity or source of revenue is appropriated for by both the United States and the District of Columbia, shall be divided between the two in the same proportion that each has contributed thereto; and that if, for any fiscal year after June 30, 1927, the District of Columbia should raise and deposit in the Treasury to its credit, as herein provided, more money derived from taxation, privileges, and other sources authorized herein than may be necessary for the purposes herein set out, such excess shall be available the succeeding year, in the discretion of the commissioners, either for the purpose of meeting the expense chargeable to the District of Columbia and/or for the further purpose of enabling the commissioners to fix a lower rate of taxation for the year following the one in which said excess accrued than they might otherwise be able to do; and that after June 30, 1922, the agencies through which the District of Columbia collects its revenues derived from taxation shall also collect for the United States any revenues which by this act become the sole property of the United States, and said revenues shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States as "Miscellaneous receipts," but the revenues from the property known as Center Market shall not be so collected; and that hereafter the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall not be restricted in submitting to the Bureau of the Budget their estimates of the needs of the District, but they shall, as near as may be, bring them within the probable aggregate of the fixed proportionate appropriations to be paid by the United States and the District of Columbia.

"That all acts or parts of acts in conflict with any provision of this act are hereby repealed to the extent of such conflict but no further.

"That in order to defray the expenses of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, 40 per cent of each of the following sums, except those herein directed to be paid otherwise, hereby is appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and all the remainder out of the combined revenues of the District of Columbia and the advances from the Federal Treasury herein permitted, namely:"

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 78, and concur therein with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed in said amendment, insert "$25,000."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 79, and concur therein with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed in said amendment insert: "$134,220."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 86, and concur therein with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed by said amendment insert "$75,000."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 101, and concur therein with an amendment as follows: After the sum "$2,400" in said amendment insert: ": Provided, That such playgrounds shall be kept open for play purposes in accordance with the schedule maintained for playgrounds under the jurisdiction of the playgrounds department."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 115, and concur therein with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by said amendment insert:

"For beginning the erection of an addition to the Armstrong Manual Training School and alterations thereto, to include an assembly hall, additional classrooms, shops, and laboratories, within a limit of cost of $500,000, which is hereby authorized, $100,000, and the commissioners are authorized to enter into a contract for said addition at a cost not to exceed $500,000."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 116, and concur therein with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by said amendment insert:

"The Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized and directed to have plans prepared by the municipal architect for an addition to the Western High School, which plans shall include repairs and alterations to the present building, with a view to providing not less than 24 additional classrooms."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 142, and concur therein with an amendment as follows: Strike out the matter inserted by said amendment, and on page 65 of the bill strike out lines 1 to 5, inclusive.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 155, and concur therein with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by said amendment insert:

"The Commissioners of the District of Columbia are authorized and directed to use a site for a home and school for feeble-minded persons, said site to be located in the District of Columbia on land owned by the District of Columbia and now allotted to the Home for the Aged and Infirm, and to erect thereon suitable buildings at a total cost not exceeding $250,000, and toward said purpose there is hereby appropriated the sum of $100,000, to be immediately available. The persons to be admissible thereto and the proceedings with reference to securing such admission to be in accordance with law."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 163, and concur therein with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed in said amendment insert: "$2,500."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 187, and concur therein with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by said amendment insert:

"For increasing the water supply of the District of Columbia in accordance with Project E, submitted in Senate Document No. 403, Sixty-sixth Congress, third session, the estimated cost of which has been revised and placed at $8,738,000, there is hereby authorized an appropriation, including those heretofore made, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, of not to exceed the sum of $8,738,000, which shall include the cost of all land, rights of way, easements, materials, engineering, labor, equipment, service, and all things necessary to complete said project and its full and complete connection with the present water plant of said District and its distribution system, and of said sum there is hereby appropriated for said purpose the sum of $1,500,000, to be immediately available and to be expended in such a manner as will at the earliest possible date provide for the completion of said project. The Secretary of War may enter into contracts for materials and work necessary to the construction of said project, to be paid for as appropriations may from time to time be made, not to exceed in the aggregate the sum of $1,450,000 in addition to the amount herein appropriated. The Secretary of War is hereby authorized to acquire all necessary land, easements, and rights of way necessary to the construction of said project by purchase or condemnation: Provided, That no bid in excess of the estimated cost for that portion of the work or plant covered by the bid shall be accepted, nor shall any contract for any portion of the work, material, or equipment to constitute a part of the plant for which this appropriation is available be valid unless the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army shall have certified thereon that all its terms are within the requirements of this authorization and the revised estimates: Provided further, That the Secretary of War shall submit to Congress on the first day of the next regular session a supplemental report on said water system and increase of water supply showing, among other things, new or proposed construction within said District, connections with the present system of distribution, and revised estimates of cost."

That the House insist upon its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 186.

Mr. PHIPPS. I move that the Senate agree to the amendments of the House to the amendments of the Senate numbered 78, 79, 86, 101, 115, 116, 142, 155, 163, and 187.

Mr. HARRISON. Will not the Senator explain what those amendments are?

Mr. PHIPPS. The Secretary has read the amendments. These are the Senate amendments that the House has accepted with amendments. They have just been recited. I will run over them again briefly.

On the question of playgrounds, where the Senate had authorized $50,000, the House agreed to make it $25,000.

On the question of night schools, the amount remains the same as originally proposed, $75,000.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask about the $75,000 item? The House originally appropriated $75,000?

Mr. PHIPPS. Yes; it appropriated $75,000. The Senate raised it to $90,000.

Mr. HARRISON. Then the House finally receded from their action?

Mr. PHIPPS. No; the House receded from an amendment to the amendment of the Senate which would have restricted the subjects to be taught to those taught in ordinary school grades and the first two years of high school. This action of the House eliminates that proviso.

The next item is one providing for the purchase of land for the Dunbar High School, which the House has agreed should be acquired.

The next is that relating to the Armstrong Manual Training School. In these cases the House amendments simply modified what the Senate had proposed and what the Senate had voted for.

The sinking fund interest item is the next one which, it was found on investigation, it was unnecessary to provide for this year. Therefore this action will eliminate the item of $400,000 from this year's appropriation bill.

The other items are small, the National Library for the Blind and the Polytechnic for the Blind. The Senate inserted appropriations in the bill. The House agreed to allow a little more than half the amounts suggested by the Senate.

The other item, that relating to the increased water supply, is practically in accord with the Senate amendment, the only difference being the language in connection with the operation of the project for developing an increased supply of water. That covers the list, I believe, and I am now moving that the Senate agree to these items in the form as modified by the House.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Colorado.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PHIPPS. That leaves item 186, which is the matter of acquiring the three pieces of property for park uses, which the Senate put into the bill in accordance with the vote of the Senate, authorizing the park commission to take jurisdiction over that property. The House has refused to make any appropriation for those items. Therefore, my motion is that the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 186.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PHIPPS. That would leave undisposed of only one item, which is the fiscal item, amendment numbered 1, and on that I want to say a word.

A very misleading impression has gone out among the citizens of the District as to the effect of this proposed amendment. As a matter of fact, it accepts the House basis of the 60–40 division of expenditures, and makes it permanent until changed by legislation.

To go back, under the basic law of 1878, and until 1900, the taxes on property were collected in two installments of 50 per cent each, November 1 and May 1. The act of June 6, 1900, provided that thereafter the taxpayer would not become delinquent until the end of May, which had the result of throwing all collections into the month of May, instead of the payments being made in semiannual installments, as had been the custom, and evidently realizing what that would mean in the fiscal affairs of the District, Congress then authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to make advances from time to time to cover the District's requirements, and reimburse the Treasury out of the tax collections as received by the District.

The result has been that until the District began to accumulate some surplus, in 1916, the Secretary of the Treasury was advancing large amounts of the funds wanted to meet the appropriations, but as late as the year 1921 the amounts advanced were not excessive. Taking the entire year 1921, the advancements amounted to $7,202,000, in round figures, all made before the end of April, after which time the District taxes were coming in, and the Government was repaid. As a matter of fact, $101,000 additional was turned over to the Treasury of the United States and put into the surplus, to which the District claims credit. For the 10 months of the current year, the advances have been larger and amount to about $8,622,000.

If the District, as it claims, has a surplus to its credit of some $5,000,000, which we expect to determine through the means of a bill which has now been reported out by the Committee on the District of Columbia, with that $5,000,000, plus the amount which comes in currently by way of miscellaneous receipts, amounting to $3,000,000 per year, it would only be necessary to go back to the former basis of collecting the taxation in two installments, on November 1 and May 1, in order to enable the District to meet its 60 per cent of the expenditures for the government of the District, as nearly as we can estimate it; or, at the worst, it would mean but a very small additional amount, which would have to be accumulated during the next five years, until the District would be on a cash paying basis.

Mr. BALL. Why would it not be better to find first whether there is to be a surplus, before we make this new provision?

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, the question whether or not a surplus exists has been a matter of discussion and dispute, and it should be determined. To that end, the bill to which I refer has been introduced, and I understand the Committee on the District of Columbia, of which the Senator from Delaware is chairman, has reported favorably upon that measure. I therefore hope that it will come up very promptly for action.

Mr. BALL. I hope the matter will be acted upon immediately by a report from the Committee on Contingent Expenses of the Senate, which provides that the payment of the commission shall be in part from the contingent fund of the Senate and in part from that of the House. But the question is: Why should we make this provision by law? Why not continue the present practice, and let these advancements be made another year, until it is decided whether there is or is not a surplus?

Mr. PHIPPS. This leaves it entirely within the power of the Commissioners of the District to determine what amount it will be necessary to raise by taxation to meet the current needs of the District and supply a surplus, if one is required. It is not obligatory on them to raise any definite amount.

Mr. SMOOT. As I understand it, the bill is not going back to conference at this time.

Mr. PHIPPS. I was just about to say that the only item now unsettled, amendment No. 1, should be referred to the Committee on Appropriations. I move that amendment No. 1 be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HARRISON. Do I understand the Senator to say that the amendment which was adopted by the House was agreed to by the Senate conferees and the House conferees with the thought that it was the best compromise that could be effected?

Mr. PHIPPS. The Senate conferees so expressed themselves before the amendment was taken by the House conferees to the House. That is correct.

Mr. HARRISON. And it was worked out as a compromise matter between the House and the Senate conferees?

Mr. PHIPPS. That is correct.

Mr. HARRISON. Then why was it not included in the conference report and brought here in a formal way, according to the customs and rules of the House and the Senate, for adoption as a conference report?

Mr. PHIPPS. That is the difficulty and that is what we are up against in all cases where we have to meet the rules of the House. The conferees on the part of the House are not permitted to agree to the adoption of certain amendments. They can only agree that they will report them back to the House for action, so that as the conference report was laid before the Senate the Senator will find that amendment numbered 1, as well as many others—those on which we have just had action to-day—while tacitly agreed upon by the conferees, were still in dispute as between the two Houses, and, so far as the conferees were concerned, between the conferees themselves.

Mr. HARRISON. In other words, if the amendment as agreed to by the Senate conferees and the House conferees had been reported in a report to the House, a point of order could have been made and it would have been sustained. Is that the idea of the Senator?

Mr. PHIPPS. I would hesitate to answer that question, because that involves a construction of the House rules.

Mr. HARRISON. I understood the Senator to say that the reason why it was brought here in that way is because the House has a rule that any change in a bill must be brought into the House first and be voted on separately, and it was to evade that rule that this procedure was adopted.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I want simply to say that the House conferees insisted that under their rules they would have to take the matter back to the House. I am not passing upon whether it would have been subject to a point of order or not. That is what the House Members contended—that they would have to take it back to the House. They said they would have to take back to the House all the amendments we had agreed to, because under their rules that was required of them.

Mr. HARRISON. And if that course had not been followed and the amendment had gone in a report to the House, a point of order could have been sustained and probably would have been sustained.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I doubt that very much, but I do not know. I am not passing on that proposition.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, may I say that I think it would have been subject to a point of order in the House only because of the new rule of the House that any legislation incorporated in an appropriation bill by the Senate is not subject to action by the conferees unless first acted upon by the House.

Mr. HARRISON. I understand. The rule was adopted about two years ago. It would be subject to a point of order if it had been brought in in a report, and this procedure was followed to evade that rule.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, it simply means that as to any amendment placed on an appropriation bill the conferees of the House can not act without first taking it back and having a vote of the House upon that particular item. In other words, every Member of the House is a member of the conference on any amendment put on by the Senate.

Mr. HARRISON. I understand, and I think we all agree on the proposition.

Mr. LODGE. I do not think taking it back to the House means that it then may go out on a point of order. It means that they have to take a vote upon it, because it would be out of order if it originated in the House; but a point of order does not lie in the House against a Senate amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. I understand; but the Senator knows, because he had long experience in the House, that if a conference report comes in and contains new matter which is not germane to the House provision or to the Senate amendment, but goes out into a field that is new legislation——

Mr. LODGE. That is the old rule.

Mr. HARRISON. It exceeds the power of the conferees and a point of order operates against it.

Mr. LODGE. Then, after action by the House it goes back to conference. That is not the proceeding here; that is entirely different.

Mr. HARRISON. I understand it is; but they were trying to evade the situation with which they were confronted.

Mr. LODGE. As I understand it from the conferences in which I have taken part, they reserve it for a vote in the House. It is not subject to a point of order in the House, but has to be voted on before they can agree to it.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I desire to call attention to the fact that on May 3, the point of order having been made against this very amendment on the preceding day, the Speaker of the House ruled that the matter was germane and the point of order did not lie, that it was proper matter on which the House should have a vote. Thereupon the House voted and agreed to the amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; he ruled that way after two days' discussion, and in his decision he said it was a very close proposition and had given him a great deal of concern and some worry.

Mr. LENROOT. I would like to suggest to the Senator that the point of order, if it would lie at all, did lie just exactly in the same way when offered as an amendment on the floor as if it had been incorporated in the conference report. They were not evading anything, so far as general parliamentary law was concerned. If the House had originated that amendment it could then have gone back to the conferees, and the conferees would have had full jurisdiction over it.

Mr. HARRISON. I think the Senator is right about the latter proposition, but not the first. I think there is a great deal of difference between the proposition of an amendment being offered on the floor of the House and an amendment coming in as a part of a conference report. I think the Speaker in his decision said so. I know it was argued that way to him.

Mr. LENROOT. The Speaker ruled just the opposite, as the Senator will see if he will examine the record. The Speaker held that the question was identically the same, whether it had been incorporated in the conference report or offered on the floor, so far as being germane was concerned.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I now make the point of order, in view of what the Senator from Colorado has said, that this is an evasion of the custom of the Senate and the rules of the Senate. The conferees have acted without authority. They have exceeded their jurisdiction. They come in here with an amendment in the form in which this amendment is presented, because they knew, or they should have known, that if they brought it in as a part of the report it would be subject to a point of order because, as I shall try to demonstrate, they have gone far beyond either the Senate amendment or the House amendment in this compromise amendment.

The Senator from Colorado said that he and his colleagues, conferees upon the part of the Senate, helped the House conferees to draft this compromise amendment. It is the outgrowth of the conference. It was born in the conference. So far as the spirit of the case is concerned, this is a conference report.

Mr. President, the Presiding Officer's ruling on this proposition will have great weight and be far-reaching, because a precedent will be established which will be cited in the future. If the Chair should hold against my point of order and the Senate should afterwards follow that ruling, then conferees can go and deal with almost any question and tack it onto a House or Senate amendment. In other words, if the House or the Senate should amend either amendment by placing a provision, for instance, touching the tariff question just in the slightest degree on one article, the other House would have jurisdiction to take up the whole tariff question and write a new tariff bill. If an amendment upon the part of the Senate was added to the House amendment dealing with the Federal reserve system in the slightest, as was suggested by one of my friends, Mr. WINGO, in the House debate yesterday, the conferees could go into conference and repeal the whole Federal reserve system. In other words, it is proposed to place in the hands of three Members representing the Senate and three representing the House the power to write into a bill matters that are not germane to the subject matter and which may be involved and complicated and deserving of full and careful consideration. We will have established a precedent that will constantly rise to haunt us in the future.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. PHIPPS. I only desire to call attention to the fact that the two important features of amendment No. 1 are the establishment of the 60-40 plan on a permanent basis; that is, until otherwise changed by legislation. The 60–40 plan was written in the House bill. The permanency feature was written by the Senate in its amendment. The items of detail that have been added to the amendment are of no great importance, but are only those necessary to make the 60–40 plan workable as a permanent law.

Mr. HARRISON. The policy of the Senate, as well as the policy of the House, as expressed recently in changes of rules in the two bodies, has been to take away from the conferees more and more power and to compel them to confine their consideration to the amendments which might come either from the House or the Senate. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] cited the late rule passed by the House that before the conferees could agree to new matter or new legislation in a conference report it must first be submitted to and acted upon by the House. In this instance it was sent to the House and acted upon, carrying out the specific instruction according to the rules of the House.

Now, it is different in the Senate. Here was a rule which was adopted in 1918, known as the Curtis rule. The sole intent of that rule was to compel the conferees to consider questions in difference between the House and Senate without bringing in new legislation or unrelated matter. If the Chair will look at the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD giving the debates at the time of the adoption of that rule he will see the purpose of it. Let me read just a brief part of it to show what the desire of the Senate was at that time and the policy that has been pursued since. Mr. Gallinger brought in the rule. That rule is the present rule of the Senate, and the second section of it reads as follows:

> Conferees shall not insert in their report matter not committed to them by either House, nor shall they strike from the bill matter agreed to by both Houses. If new matter is inserted in the report, or if matter which was agreed to by both Houses is stricken from the bill, a point of order may be made against the report, and if the point of order is sustained the report shall be recommitted to the committee of conference.

I ask that that discussion, which comprises about a page of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, be printed at the close of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HARRISON. Without question, if this amendment had been brought here in a report by the conferees it would have been subject to a point of order. There would have been no question about that, I take it. The Senator from Colorado has admitted that the amendment is born out of the minds of the Senate and House conferees; that they entered into it as a compromise. So, if we are going to carry out the spirit of the Senate rule, the same rule should be applied against an amendment which has been adopted by the House, that deals with enlarged matters and matter that is not germane to the question in conference. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] shakes his head.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator from Utah understood the statement made by the Senator from Mississippi, the Senator from Utah can not agree with the statement in this particular case, because he does not believe it applies. In other words, as I understand the situation it is this: The conferees have made to the Senate not a full report but a partial report, all of the amendments having been agreed to by the Senate with the single exception of the one which is under discussion. The conferees can not now go further. The conferees on the part of the Senate have got to be appointed again before they may act on behalf of the Senate. There is only one of two things to be done. The Senate may appoint its conferees to confer again with the conferees on the part of the House, and agree, if possible, to eliminate or amend the provision so as to bring it within the rules of the House and the Senate, or it may be referred to the committee. Those are the only two things the Senate may now do.

This, I repeat, is only a partial report, and there is only one amendment still in disagreement. There will be no conferees on the part of the Senate to act until the Presiding Officer shall again appoint such conferees.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask the Senator, does he not think that this amendment would have been subject to a point of order under the rules of the Senate if it had come in on a conference report?

Mr. SMOOT. If the report had been a complete report, and if the conferees had asked that the amendment be agreed to by the Senate, I have not any doubt that it would have been subject to a point of order. That, however, is not the case.

Mr. HARRISON. I know it is not the case, and the conferees are trying to avoid that situation by preparing a compromise amendment and putting it in another way. In other words, accomplish their purpose in an evasive way.

Mr. SMOOT. No; I do not think it is an evasion, because the whole question is presented here by the conference committee to the Senate, and it is for the Senate to act. There was only one of two things which the Senate could do, and one of them has been eliminated by the conferees saying that they could not agree to a certain amendment. The only other thing to do, if the Senate is to take action on the matter, is to refer it to the committee. It may lie on the table here forever, if the Senate does not want to act upon it, but if there is to be any further action taken upon the appropriation bill the only way it can be done is to ask that the amendment be referred to the committee.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, the amendment as originally adopted by the other House dealt with this matter as on a 60–40 basis. The Senate, however, adopted a different method and provided the rate of taxation should be $1.75 per $100. Both in the House and in the Senate the provision was confined to real estate and tangible personal property. I suppose there is no difference of opinion about the proposition that the provision originally adopted by the House on the 60–40 basis dealt solely with real estate and tangible personal property, and that the Senate amendment did the same thing; and yet in conference the committee not only deal with the question of tangible personal property but with real estate and with intangible property also, as well as with a great many other questions. Both the House provision and the Senate amendment were designed to raise enough revenue to provide the current expenses of running the District of Columbia; but the conferees go beyond that and provide that the $15,000,000 indebtedness which the District owes shall be wiped out, and that such a rate of taxation shall be levied every year that within five years' time the District of Columbia shall be operating on a cash-paying basis.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, do I understand the Senator from Mississippi to have made a statement regarding some supposed $15,000,000 that the District of Columbia owes the Government?

Mr. HARRISON. No; I said nothing like that.

Mr. PHIPPS. Then I apologize to the Senator. I did not understand him.

Mr. HARRISON. I said that the House did not deal with the proposition in the original bill, nor did the Senate, but the conferees now, through their amendment, propose to give the right to levy such taxes as will wipe out the indebtedness of the District of Columbia and put the District upon a cash-paying basis by the end of 1927.

Mr. PHIPPS. There is no reference to any indebtedness. There is merely a reference to necessary working capital. As has been stated here—I think I stated it myself very distinctly a few moments ago—the District authorities claim that the Federal Government owes the District $5,000,000. Members of the other House, and, perhaps, some Members of the Senate, claim that the Federal Government owes the District of Columbia nothing. I have stated that a separate bill has been introduced and has been reported out by a committee to determine what the fact is.

Mr. HARRISON. But nothing is said about that in the amendment.

Mr. PHIPPS. Then, why does the Senator from Mississippi bring that in here if it is not in this amendment?

Mr. HARRISON. I will read a portion of the proposed amendment to the Senator. Perhaps he did not draft this part of it and he probably has forgotten it. It provides:

> And that in order that the District of Columbia may be able annually to comply with the provisions hereof, and also in order that the said District may be put upon a cash basis as to payment of expenses, there hereby is levied for each of the fiscal years ending June 30, 1923, 1924, 1925, 1926, and 1927, a tax at such rate on the full value, and no less, of all real estate and tangible personal property subject to taxation in the District of Columbia as will, when added to the revenues derived from privileges and from the tax on franchises, corporations, and public utilities, as fixed by law, and also from the tax, which hereby is levied, on such intangible personal property as is subject to taxation in the District of Columbia, at the rate of five-tenths of 1 per cent on the full market value thereof, produce money enough to pay such annual expenses as may be imposed on the District of Columbia by Congress, and in addition to such annual expenses a surplus fund sufficient to enable the District of Columbia to get upon a cash-paying basis by the end of the fiscal year 1927.

Mr. PHIPPS. It is all left to the commissioners of the District.

Mr. HARRISON. Under that provision the additional tax will amount to about $3,000,000 per annum.

Mr. PHIPPS. Who said that? The newspapers? There is no basis for that statement.

Mr. HARRISON. The District commissioners say that, do they not? And the general impression is that those figures are correct. Of course, when such an important question is treated in such a way as has been done, naturally the correct estimate is hard to make as well as difficult to obtain.

Mr. PHIPPS. Oh, no; they have never said that. If the Senator is going to take newspaper reports, and read them on the floor of the Senate, instead of getting information from an authoritative source, he is likely to fall into error.

Mr. HARRISON. I have not alone been reading from newspaper reports.

Mr. PHIPPS. The statements that $3,000,000 of taxation will be added each year, as I have already stated, is absolutely incorrect. On May 1 the District had received from the Federal Treasury $8,600,000 by way of advancement on this year's expenditures. During the present month the District taxes come in, and before the end of May, perhaps, certainly before the end of the first week in June, the District will have repaid every dollar of that advance to the Federal Treasury. That does not take into consideration at all the balance to its credit on July 1, 1921, of some $5,000,000, which figure has been agreed upon as between the auditor for the District and the Treasurer of the United States.

Mr. HARRISON. Under the plan proposed by the Senate, leaving out of consideration the House amendment, when does the Senator think the District would get on a cash-paying basis?

Mr. PHIPPS. That would depend upon the determination of the amount standing to the credit of the District in the Federal Treasury. If, as claimed by the District officials, $5,000,000 at least will be standing to the credit of the District on July 1, 1922, based on the best information I can obtain from the District records, it would not take three years; it would not take two years, and it would not mean more than two or three million dollars at the outside to enable the District to carry currently its fair share, or 60 per cent of the expenses of the District. That statement is based, of course, upon the assumption that there shall be a return to the plan which was in force before the law of June 6, 1900, was passed, which eliminated the collection of taxes for the first half of the year under penalty on November 1. If there shall be a return to the plan of dividing the payment of taxes so that 50 per cent shall be paid on November 1 and 50 per cent on May 1, subject to penalty a month later, the District will get its tax money in season to enable it to meet its obligations or its share of the 60 per cent of the expenses.

Mr. HARRISON. I will ask the Senator not to take into consideration the $5,000,000 which is in dispute between the Federal Government and the District of Columbia, because that has been a matter in controversy for a long time, and the Government has not turned it over to the District.

Mr. PHIPPS. On that basis, my view is that an increase of a million and a quarter dollars a year would be ample to put the District on a cash-paying basis.

Mr. HARRISON. That is, under the plan adopted by the Senate in its amendment in five years the District will be on a cash-paying basis?

Mr. PHIPPS. Provided we should return to the plan in force prior to June 6, 1900, which allowed the District to collect the first half of its taxes in the month of November.

Mr. HARRISON. Was that provided for in the Senate amendment?

Mr. PHIPPS. It was not, for the very reason that the Senator is now objecting to this amendment. The conferees did not feel that they should load it down with legislation to any greater extent than necessary in order to provide a workable plan, taking as the basis the Senate contention for a permanent plan and the House contention for the 60-40 basis of providing the money to meet the expenses of the District. The other provision is only put in as being necessary to make the plan workable and to enable the District to meet its 60 per cent of the obligations incurred.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator says that the committee did not deal with this plan when the bill was before the Senate for the very reason that it was feared it might constitute legislation, and would therefore be subject to a point of order.

Mr. PHIPPS. I do not think the Senator should put words in my mouth.

Mr. HARRISON. Or that some question might be raised against it.

Mr. PHIPPS. The record will speak for itself. I do not think the Senator has quoted me accurately. My statement was that the House conferees, under the rules of the House, could not accept certain amendments, but had to carry them back to the House for a vote.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not understand that the Senator from Mississippi has raised a point of order. The question before the Senate is the motion to refer the amendment of the House of Representatives to the Committee on Appropriations. Does the Senator raise any point of order against that amendment?

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I was going to make a point of order, but I care nothing about the proposition except that it establishes a precedent here which must be followed in the future. I may say to the Senator from Colorado that it may be that I will vote for this plan at some time, but there is a peculiar situation. The Committee on the District of Columbia gave consideration to a plan to raise taxes in the District, which plan the Senate adopted. The District Committee of the House had adopted another plan, and the House had agreed to it. The House has never adopted the Senate plan, nor has the Senate adopted the House plan, and the plan now proposed is one which has not been adopted by either the House or the Senate, but it is absolutely a new proposition that was evolved in the minds——

Mr. PHIPPS. It has now been adopted by the House.

Mr. HARRISON. That was evolved in the minds of six gentlemen—splendid men, able legislators—but certainly the committee should consider this proposition at some time. The Senator is quarreling with me because I say that the conferees should not exceed their authority, and present a provision for an entirely new fiscal policy for the District of Columbia which is different from the policy adopted both by the House and by the Senate. Oh, the Senator says the House has adopted it. They only adopted it yesterday, and apparently every one, with one or two exceptions, apologized for the haste and lack of deliberation in which it was then being done.

Mr. PHIPPS. The question whether the point of order will lie or not may be determined by the Chair. I do not care to discuss the matter at length. The conferees certainly devoted their best effort to securing a workable plan as between the District of Columbia and the Federal Government.

Mr. HARRISON. I have no doubt of that.

Mr. PHIPPS. Having in view the idea of not departing from the wishes of the House and the Senate as expressed in the provision of the House bill and in the amendment of the Senate, if the Senator thinks differently, I do not know what line of action he would have taken had he been named as one of the conferees on the part of the Senate and been compelled to sit day after day in the discussion of the question involved.

Mr. HARRISON. Does the Senator want to know what I would have done?

Mr. PHIPPS. I do not know whether he would have so strictly hewn to the line for fear that he might depart from a provision of the Senate rules and perhaps unthinkingly violate a rule of the Senate by considering something which was not germane to the original proposition.

Mr. HARRISON. If the Senator asks me what I would have done, I will tell him I would have followed the instructions of the Senate.

Mr. PHIPPS. That is what the conferees believe they have done.

Mr. HARRISON. That is what the conferees have not done. I would have stood for the Senate amendment and I would not have exceeded my authority and gone out and increased the taxes of the people of the District, eliminated items which had been agreed to both by the House and the Senate in some instances, and placed in the bill other provisions which had never been considered by the House or by the Senate. I would have taken it for granted that the legislative committee should consider such questions.

They should arrive at a conclusion and then their plan should be fought out; and no three men, simply because they are conferees, should usurp the authority to write a whole fiscal system or fiscal policy for the District of Columbia.

Mr. PHIPPS. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the motion before the Senate is that this matter be referred back to the committee. I do not see why the Senator should insist that the conferees are trying to "put something over" on the Senate, so to speak. That has not been attempted at any time.

Mr. HARRISON. They are not now, because they have been checked in it.

Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state his inquiry.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I just want to say to the Senator that I am not going to argue the matter now, but, as one of the conferees, I am satisfied that even in this informal agreement—of course, technically, it is not before the Senate as an agreement—in the informal agreement I am satisfied that the conferees have not gone outside of the amendments that were put on in the Senate and in the House. The Senator may not agree with me, but when the time comes I think I can give very substantial reasons for my position that the conferees have not exceeded their authority.

Upon the proposition of the action that was taken, however, I think I have said on the floor of the Senate heretofore that I do not like the situation that confronts the House or the Senate upon conferences in connection with appropriation bills.

We do not have a full and free conference under the system as it is working now. We can not have it. We get into conference, and the House conferees can not agree or disagree to amendments that the Senate puts on properly under its rules, but they have to say to the Senate conferees: "We are in favor of this, but we have to take it back to the House," and we have to report a disagreement.

I do not know how long that is going to continue. I am just as much opposed to it, I think, as the Senator is, and I have been willing myself to try to settle the controversy in some way; but on account of the state of the public business we have been going along with these conferences on appropriation bills and bringing in, just as we have done on this bill, disagreements, and then, after the conference report is accepted, reporting to the Senate what the conferees have actually agreed upon and asking the Senate to agree to it.

That, however, is the situation that confronts us. All I rose to say was simply that as one of the conferees I do not believe that the plan proposed transcends the authority of the Senate conferees if the House conferees had authority to agree to it; but I am not going to argue the matter.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, if estimates are correct, this amendment will increase the taxes in the District of Columbia about $4,000,000 per annum. It increases the rate on intangible property by two-tenths of 1 per cent. Neither the House nor the Senate dealt with the question of intangible property at all.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Oh, yes, Mr. President; the Senate did deal with it.

Mr. HARRISON. How did the Senate deal with it?

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senate declared that the tax on intangible property should be as it is now.

Mr. HARRISON. Absolutely; and the House did not say anything at all about it, and consequently it was the same as it is now, and the Senate did not change it at all.

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; but the House disagreed to our proposition, and we dealt with it. So far as that is concerned, however, the proposition has passed the House now.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator will admit that the House did not change the tax on intangible property. The House did not change it at all, did it? They left it as it is under present law?

Mr. JONES of Washington. They did not change the tax on anything.

Mr. HARRISON. That is right. The Senate did not change the tax on intangible property, did it?

Mr. JONES of Washington. No.

Mr. HARRISON. Neither one of them—the House or Senate—changed the tax on intangible property.

Mr. JONES of Washington. But the Senate declared that the taxes of all kinds in the District of Columbia should be fair and reasonable, and that is pretty broad.

Mr. HARRISON. Oh, well! This amendment also changed the manner of collecting rents at the Center Market. Neither the House nor the Senate dealt with that proposition at all. It was not mentioned. This amendment seeks to set up in the District a ground rent for Federal property. Neither the House amendment nor the Senate amendment dealt with that proposition at all. This amendment seeks to change the basis of assessment from not less than two-thirds the value of the property to the market value—a question that did not enter into the House amendment or the Senate amendment. In instance after instance the conferees have gone beyond the amendment that was adopted in the House and the amendment that was adopted in the Senate; but my parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President, is this, because I am glad the proposition is going to the committee. I hope it will be considered fully, and I am sure it will be considered fairly.

This may be all right. I have voted every time, as a Member of the House and as a Member of the Senate, for the 60–40 plan. I have ever believed that the District should bear its just part of the burden of running the Government. I would not favor the District one whit over other localities, of course taking into consideration the fact that the Federal Government should bear its part of running the District; but, Mr. President, I want to be fair with the District. I want to see the people here treated fairly and have an opportunity to be heard. I have always voted against the 50–50 proposition, but I do not believe that this amendment deals fairly with the District under the circumstances. I know that the conferees have prepared it here in a very short time; and just six Members—three of the House and three of the Senate—have considered it. No person in the District, I presume, has been consulted. Indeed, evidently, their judgment was not sought; their appeals or remonstrances not heard.

My parliamentary inquiry, however, is this: Should this matter go to the committee and be reported back, and then be sent to conference, and the conference report come to the Senate, and the conferees still have exceeded their authority, will a point of order then lie, or will the fact that the point of order has not now been made prevent the point of order from then being made?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is inquiring whether a point of order will lie to action which he says exceeds the authority of the conferees. That question answers itself.

Mr. HARRISON. To be perfectly clear on the proposition, then, I make the point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. HARRISON. My point of order is that the conferees have exceeded their authority; that they have evaded the rules of the Senate by not bringing in this amendment in the form of a report, but in the form that they have; and if this practice should continue, of course, one House could amend an amendment adopted by the other House, and bring in almost any question. That is contrary to the practice as well as the spirit of the Senate rule.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question before the Senate is the motion to refer this matter to the committee. Does the Senator make a point of order on that?

Mr. HARRISON. I am making the point of order that this amendment has no business here.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will rule that that point of order is not well taken. This matter comes here as an amendment adopted by the House of Representatives.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; and my point of order is that the amendment that was presented here by the conferees exceeded their authority and is contrary to the rules of the Senate. I have been frank with the Chair, and I must state to the Presiding Officer that really, if I were presiding, I would overrule the point of order that I have made; but I have made it because I do not want to lose any rights with regard to making the point of order, if desirable, when the final report comes in.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has just stated that the matter does not come here by any action of the conferees; it comes here as an amendment adopted by the House of Representatives.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; but the Senator from Colorado says that they prepared it themselves, and they are doing it in order to evade the rule of the Senate that if it should come in as part of a conference report it would be subject to a point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair can not see that it makes any difference who prepared it. It comes here as the action of the House.

Mr. HARRISON. I thought the Chair would rule that way, and I find no fault with his ruling. I just want a ruling.

APPENDIX.

[From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, proceedings of the Senate, March 8, 1918.]

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES—CONFERENCE REPORTS.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I am directed by the Committee on Rules to submit a report on Senate Resolution 162, which I ask may first be read, and I call the attention of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] to the report after it has been read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the report.

The Secretary read as follows:

"The Committee on Rules, to whom was referred Senate Resolution 162, providing for an amendment to Rule XXVII by adding the following paragraph:

"'2. Conferees may not include in their report matters not committed to them by either House, and in case new matter is included, the same shall be subject to a point of order, and, upon such point of order being made by any Senator, if sustained by the presiding officer of the Senate, such new matter shall be ruled out and eliminated from the report: Provided, That the elimination of such new matter upon a point of order shall in no way affect the remainder of the conference report'— having considered the same, beg leave to report a substitute, as follows, and recommend its adoption:

"'2. Conferees shall not insert in their report matter not committed to them by either House, nor shall they strike from the bill matter agreed to by both Houses. If new matter is inserted in the report, or if matter which was agreed to by both Houses is stricken from the bill, a point of order may be made against the report, and if the point of order is sustained the report shall be recommitted to the committee of conference.'"

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution reported by the committee as a substitute for Senate Resolution 162. I think it appeals to every Senator, inasmuch as now we are beginning with the appropriation bills. If the Senate desires a rule of this kind it ought to be adopted at once. I think the rule explains itself. It gives any Member of the Senate the right to rise to a question of order when new matter not considered by either House is put in a bill or matter has been stricken out.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I desire to have the attention of the Senator from North Carolina and the Senator from New Hampshire to ask this question. As I heard the report read, it provides that the conferees shall not be authorized or empowered to change any original text which has been agreed upon by both Houses.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is the——

Mr. STONE. If the Senator will pardon me, I have served on conference committees where a section was under consideration, a part of which—it may be a clause—had been amended by one House or the other and the remainder of the section was left intact. I want to know if it were found in conference that it was necessary to change that part of the section which had been amended by one House, would it then be forbidden to conform the remainder of the section to the change?

Mr. GALLINGER. I think not. I will say to the Senator that that provision is taken from Jefferson's Manual, while the first provision in the resolution is taken from Cleaves's Manual on Conferences and Conference Reports, which was submitted to the Senate by former Senator Allison many years ago. I have been told that the manual prepared by Mr. Cleaves, who was for many years the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations, was adopted by the Senate, but I am not sure about that. However, both the propositions are sound, and they protect the Senate from the abuse with which we have so often been met. I feel sure that it will facilitate the work of the Senate and will prevent controversies that are constantly arising on these points. I hope the resolution will be agreed to.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from New Hampshire that Cleaves's Manual on Conferences and Conference Reports was adopted as the result of the passage of a resolution by the Senate. This amendment to the rules is one which was offered by me, and the amendment reported by the committee is satisfactory. I hope there will be no objection to it, for if adopted it will stop legislation by conferees.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from New Hampshire a question. I am in hearty sympathy with the purpose of this rule, but my recollection, from the reading of the report, is that the original resolution expressly provided that the point of order should be passed upon by the Presiding Officer.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. But the rule as reported from the committee leaves out that express direction. Is there any special reason for that?

Mr. GALLINGER. The objection to confining the decision to the Presiding Officer is that an appeal may be taken, and the question may ultimately be decided by the Senate itself. Of course, it is the duty of the Presiding Officer to make a ruling upon a point of order, but an appeal may be taken, so that the point of order may not be absolutely settled until the appeal is acted upon.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Of course, I understand that; but have we not another rule under which the Presiding Officer could himself submit any point of order to the Senate?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think we really ought to require the Presiding Officer to pass upon a point of order which is made, subject of course to appeal to the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. Of course I assume that that is what the Presiding Officer is in the chair for, that when a point of order is made he will decide upon it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. But we find very frequently that Presiding Officers in the chair do what they are not supposed to do.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have no objection to inserting those words, but I think it would be supererogation.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Then the Senator from New Hampshire thinks that under the rule reported it would be the duty of the Presiding Officer to pass upon the point of order, subject to the right of appeal?

Mr. GALLINGER. Unquestionably.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I simply want that to appear in the record.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I understood the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] to say that the objectionable matter would be eliminated without affecting the balance of a conference report. As I understand the rule, it is just the reverse, and if the point of order is sustained the report shall be recommitted to the committee of conference.

Mr. OVERMAN. I had not intended to say that.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, manifestly we can not strike any matter from a conference report. That is a power which belongs to the conference committee. All we can do under our custom is either to reject the report, or, in this case, if the point of order is sustained, to send the report back to the conference committee for their further consideration.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from New Hampshire, but there were Senators in my neighborhood who understood the chairman of the committee to say that the effect of sustaining the point of order was simply to strike out the objectionable matter and to leave the balance of the matter for action by the Senate.

Mr. OVERMAN. No; I had not intended to say that, though I may have done so inadvertently.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from North Carolina inadvertently made that observation; but that is not the intention of the committee.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I thought it was only proper to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the proposed rule does not assume that authority——

Mr. GALLINGER. It does not.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But sends the entire measure back to the committee of conference.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

The amendment of the Committee on Rules was, after line 4, to strike out:

"2. Conferees should not insert in their report matter not committed to them by either House, and in case any new matter is included, the same shall be subject to a point of order, and upon such point of order being made by any Senator, if sustained by the Presiding Officer of the Senate, such new matter shall be ruled out and eliminated from the report, provided that the elimination of such new matter, upon a point of order, shall in no way affect the remainder of the conference report."

And insert:

"2. Conferees shall not insert in their report matter not committeed to them by either House, nor shall they strike from the bill matter agreed to by both Houses. If new matter is inserted in the report, or if matter which was agreed to by both Houses is stricken from the bill, a point of order may be made against the report, and if the point of order is sustained, the report shall be recommitted to the committee of conference."

So as to make the resolution read:

"Resolved, That the standing rules of the Senate be, and they hereby are, amended as follows:

"Amend Rule XXVII by adding the following paragraph:

"'2. Conferees shall not insert in their report matter not committed to them by either House, nor shall they strike from the bill matter agreed to by both Houses. If new matter is inserted in the report, or if matter which was agreed to by both Houses is stricken from the bill, a point of order may be made against the report, and, if the point of order is sustained, the report shall be recommitted to the committee of conference.'"

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment which has been reported by the Committee on Rules.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I am in hearty accord with the motion the Senator from Colorado has made to refer this most important matter to the people of the District of Columbia to the committee of the Senate, where they may have hearings, and the people of the District who are interested may have an opportunity to be heard. I suppose that is the purpose of the motion; but the technical form of the motion is that the Senator has moved to refer the amendment. This amendment is a House amendment to a bill. It is now a part of the bill, incorporated by the House. I do not see how the Senator can make a motion to divorce the amendment from the bill.

Mr. PHIPPS. The Senator is probably correct.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I suppose the Senator means that he moves to refer the bill to the Committee on Appropriations, with instructions to consider this amendment.

Mr. PHIPPS. I should like to perfect my motion in the manner suggested by the Senator from Alabama.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator state the motion?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. To refer the District bill to the Committee on Appropriations, with instructions to consider amendment No. 1.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Colorado, as modified.

The motion, as modified, was agreed to.

FISCAL AFFAIRS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to report back favorably from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate without amendment Senate Concurrent Resolution No. 23, introduced by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], authorizing the appointment of three Senators and three Representatives as a joint committee to inquire and determine what, if any, indebtedness there may be owing to the United States from the District of Columbia, or what, if any, indebtedness there may be owing to the District of Columbia from the United States, growing out of transactions or relations existing between them since the passage of the organic act of 1878. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the concurrent resolution.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, if there will be no discussion of the matter, I have no objection to its being immediately considered; but if it should evoke discussion I shall have to ask that it go to the calendar.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will say that various Senators who are interested in the measure have been consulted, and they have no objection to its passage.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the concurrent resolution.

The Assistant Secretary read Senate Concurrent Resolution 23, submitted by Mr. JONES of Washington on April 29, 1922, as follows:

Whereas the people of the District of Columbia have paid into the Treasury of the United States during the last few years nearly $5,000,000 more than they have been required to pay toward the expenses of the District; and

Whereas the use of this money by or on behalf of the District is denied for the reason, among others, that advancements have been made without interest from time to time during the last 50 years by the National Government for the benefit of the District, and that revenues which in equity belong to the United States have gone to the credit of the District; and

Whereas for these reasons and others it is claimed that the District of Columbia, instead of being entitled to a credit of nearly $5,000,000, is in equity indebted to the United States: Now, therefore, for the purpose of ascertaining and determining the amount, if any, to which the District is entitled from the United States, or the amount, if any, which it may owe to the United States, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That a joint committee of three Senators, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, and three Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, is hereby created and authorized and directed to ascertain and determine what, if any, indebtedness there may be owing to the United States from the District of Columbia, or what, if any, indebtedness there may be owing to the District of Columbia from the United States, growing out of transactions or relations existing between them since the passage of the organic act of 1878. The committee in reaching a conclusion shall consider not only legal but equitable claims and obligations, and shall report its conclusions and recommendations to each House of Congress, on or before the first Monday in January, 1923. The committee is authorized to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ such stenographic, clerical, and expert assistance as may be necessary, and to pay for the same upon vouchers signed by the chairman, one-half out of the contingent fund of the Senate and one-half out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives. The committee is authorized and directed to avail itself of the services of the Bureau of Efficiency and such expert and legal help of the Treasury Department and of the District of Columbia as it may deem practicable so to do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TOWNSEND in the chair). Is there objection to the present consideration of the concurrent resolution?

There being no objection, the concurrent resolution was considered and agreed to.

THE TARIFF.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7456) to provide revenue, to regulate commerce with foreign countries, to encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the next amendment of the Committee on Finance.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 2, line 11, strike out "1½" and insert "2," so as to read:

Lactic acid, containing by weight of lactic acid less than 30 per cent, 2 cents per pound.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I must again express my surprise at the failure of the chairman of the Finance Committee, or some member of that committee, to give to the Senate some reason why this amendment is proposed. This amendment increases the duty on a very important article, and no word of explanation is offered. It seems to me that when the committee proposes to increase a tax which has not been discussed in any report or in any speech by any member of the Finance Committee, when no testimony has been taken regarding it, the chairman of the committee should at least give some reason for this increase in the tax.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I gladly yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not know just how many times 10,000 items are covered by this bill. I simply know that if we should attempt to explain just what the operation of the tax would be upon every item that is imported into the United States bearing a rate of duty, we would have an encyclopedia which it would take the Senator years to read. If the Senator will look back in the reports which have been made upon tariff legislation by any of the committees, he will find that no one has ever attempted to take the task in hand of explaining the effect of the tariff rates on everything that is imported into the United States and upon everything that is produced in the United States.

The Senator has before him the testimony which was taken before the committee. The Senator has before him the other public documents, in which we find information to guide us in framing a bill, and if we were to take the time to explain in detail every one of these items, as the Senator seems to think we ought to do, we never could pass the tariff bill.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Then may I inquire of the Senator whether he has any secret arrangement with the majority of the Senate as to how they shall vote upon these various items, regardless of any information upon the subject?

Mr. McCUMBER. We are not without information upon the subject. We can take the figures of our exports and our imports for a number of years. We can take the data obtained from the departments as to the amount that is received from the imports during the various years. We can judge what the effect of the importations from foreign sources must be upon the American market, and those facts we have before us at all times.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, there was not a line of testimony taken, either before the Ways and Means Committee of the House or the Finance Committee of the Senate, regarding this item, and there is no information in any of these documents, which were formally presented by the Tariff Commission, which comes down nearer to this date than the year 1919.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator will turn to page 14 of the Summary of Tariff Information of 1921, he will find considerable information on the subject right there, and there is additional information which can be found in a great many of the public documents. I simply call attention to one. The Senator said there was no information, no record before the committee. This entire volume was before the committee at all times. The daily reports of prices were before the committee all the time it was considering these matters. We have all the information that has been made public upon this item, and the Senator has the same.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I will ask the Senator to point out what there is in the book to which he has just referred which he considers as justifying an increase in the duty on this item?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield.

Mr. LODGE. I did not mean to take the Senator from the floor. I thought he had concluded.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. No; I just asked the Senator from North Dakota a question.

Mr. LODGE. I did not mean to say that I entertained any hope that the Senator had concluded his speech, but I thought he had concluded his question.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Not at all.

Mr. LODGE. Then, when the Senator has concluded his question, I will try, in my feeble way, to reply to him. There is plenty of information about it, if the Senator cares to have it.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Is the Senator from Massachusetts asking that I yield for a question?

Mr. LODGE. No; I do not want to ask the Senator any question. I wanted to answer his. Of course, if he wants to hold the floor and ask questions, that is all right. He gave me the impression that he was after information.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I am after information, and if the Senator from Massachusetts can furnish any, I would be glad to hear from him.

Mr. LODGE. I can furnish some information about it.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I will be very glad to get it.

Mr. LODGE. I do not want to take the Senator's time. I am prepared to discuss this question when I can get the floor in my own right.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. If there is anyone who wants to give any information on which this change in the duty on this item is based, I will be glad to get it. The Senator from North Dakota stated, just before the Senator from Massachusetts rose, that he had a book which gave the information, and I asked him to point out what there is in that book on which he feels that the increase of this duty is justified.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator will allow me, I can point it out. I gave the Senator the name of the report and called attention to the page, and the Senator himself can easily see just exactly what that report shows.

I will tell him one thing it shows. It shows that in 1908 we imported only 82,671 pounds of this article, while in the first nine months of 1921 we advanced from the 82,000 pounds of 1908 to 853,545 pounds, as against an entire output in the United States of 1,900,000 pounds. I think that of itself shows the necessity of some kind of protection to the American industry. We thought it was a sufficient showing.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator could also have given the information that the whole of the importations for the year 1920—not back in 1908, but in 1920—were 134,000 pounds, but in the first nine months of 1921 those importations increased to 854,000 pounds. If the proportion of increase between 1920 and the first nine months of 1921 continued even at the rate of 20 per cent, it would not be long before every pound used in the United States would be imported. That is the reason why the increase was made.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I gladly yield.

Mr. LODGE. I will wait until the Senator gets through. I would like to take the floor in my own right, if I could. I can explain this subject, and what the condition of the industry is, but I do not care to do it by asking questions of the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I do not suppose the Finance Committee fixed the rate of duty on information from the Senator from Massachusetts. Nowhere in the hearings do I find that the Senator from Massachusetts appeared before the Finance Committee.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I should like, if the Senator will allow me a moment, to say that I do not see that it makes any difference whatever whether I appeared before the Finance Committee as a witness or not. This item is before the Senate. I am prepared, when I can get the floor, to discuss it, and I think I know the case. I do not have to go before the Finance Committee in order to get permission to discuss a tariff item.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Certainly not; but what I was complaining of, if the Senator will permit me, was the fact that the Finance Committee has come before the Senate now with a proposition to increase this duty, and has furnished no information to the Senate whatever as to the basis for the increase. It has attempted to give no reasons for it.

Mr. LODGE. They have furnished information to the Senate, in my opinion. I do not say they have furnished it to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I would like to have the Senator advise us how they could furnish the information to the Senate and not furnish it to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. LODGE. They furnished a great deal of information in the Summary of Tariff Information, which has been cited.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Is the Senator from Massachusetts willing to say that that book contains sufficient information to justify this increase in duty?

Mr. LODGE. In my judgment, it does, and I can show it, and add to the information, possibly, in greater detail. I dislike to take the time. I dislike to waste time as I am wasting it now.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I would like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts if he considers that the information which the Senator from North Dakota read from that book is sufficient to justify, in his mind, the increase in this duty?

Mr. LODGE. Yes; I think it is, when it is properly understood.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Then I am very glad to know the basis of the preparation of this bill, and that that is sufficient for it. What we have is the bare fact that since the war the importations of this article have increased to some extent. That is all we have, and we are given to understand that the Finance Committee of the Senate in making these recommendations has not considered in the slightest degree the prices prevailing in the United States which would warrant an increase of the rates under existing law.

Are we to be told that the American producers can maintain prices as high as they want, regardless of the cost of production or any other element entering into the question; that they must be protected in the maintenance of their prices, although the prices may be several times higher than they should be in order to cover the cost of production either in the domestic market or abroad? I expect to discuss that matter. I have been able to find a little information, which comes to us in the official documents, which to my mind does not justify the increase in this rate of duty.

Reserving the right to resume the floor——

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Does the Senator from New Mexico understand that the Senator from Massachusetts said to him that he would give him information if he would afford him the opportunity?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I was just going to say that, as a matter of courtesy to the Senator from Massachusetts, if I may do so without yielding the floor for the day on this subject, I should be very glad now to yield the floor, to let the Senator in his own time give the information. But I should like to ask the Presiding Officer if under the rule I would be prohibited from again discussing the question on the present calendar day?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TOWNSEND in the chair). The Chair desires to state that the Senator is speaking against the rule all the time. The rule is that a Senator may speak twice on a subject on the same legislative day, and every time he yields to another Senator for a speech he yields the floor. But that rule has not been enforced; it has not been invoked, and the present occupant of the chair would not feel like invoking it against the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Then I gladly yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I may be running counter to the wishes of my friend, the chairman of the committee [Mr. MCCUMBER], but I want to serve notice that from this time on the rules of the Senate are going to be enforced, not as against the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] at this time, but they are going to be enforced in regard to Senators speaking more than twice on the same subject on the same day. They are going to be enforced as to all matters that originate here which require unanimous consent for consideration. I shall not give my consent to the consideration of any other proposition until the tariff bill is out of the way.

Nor do I intend that the rules of the Senate shall be violated with regard to miscellaneous, promiscuous speeches. Everybody understands the whole situation. There is a filibuster on here. It has no other object. It has no other purpose. We might pile information hill upon mountain, we might add to it Ossa upon Pelion, but it would not make the slightest difference in the world to our friends upon the other side of the Chamber. No matter how many facts are given, no matter how much information is adduced, my friend from New Mexico would not vote for this item, nor would he give his consent to the passage of this schedule, nor would he vote for the bill. The sole object of all this talk day after day is to filibuster, to postpone, to procrastinate, to delay, to put off the passage of this bill just as near election day as is possible. Everyone understands that, and none of us are being fooled about it for one second.

So far as I am concerned, within the limitations imposed by the rules of the Senate, they shall be enforced, and if I have my way about it our sessions will begin at 11 o'clock in the morning and will run until 11 o'clock at night. We intend to put this bill through in accordance with the rules of the Senate, after legitimate debate has been had. So far as I am concerned, I am not going to be a party to cutting off legitimate debate. Item after item can be legitimately debated, but that item after item has been legitimately debated I deny. Any Senator can stand upon the floor and ask questions.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I yield to my friend from Georgia.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. My friend the Senator from Indiana is entirely mistaken. I will tell him this fact, and I know he will take my word for it. When the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] selected a few of us to help discuss this measure and present our views to the country, almost the first statement that he made was that there was no intention whatever to unduly delay action at all, that there should be no undue discussions, but that he did want to have presented as fully as possible the views of the Senators on this side.

I remind the Senator from Indiana that on yesterday extraneous matter got into the debate and occupied a great deal of time because of the speech of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK]. Another extraneous matter got in because of an attack made upon the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] by the Attorney General. Those were the only two instances, I think.

Mr. SMOOT. What about the speech of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN]?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. My friend will remember the discussion this morning of an appointment in St. Louis, and it was all extraneous matter. Not only that, but, with the permission of my good friend from Georgia, we spent six days debating the tariff on vinegar.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. The junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] gave way to the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] to read a letter from the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board. In that letter the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] was mentioned by name, and the Senator thought, as he had been mentioned by name, that he had a right for a short while to give his views concerning the statement of the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board. Those are the three instances, but I can assure Senators on the other side that there is no concerted action to delay the bill unnecessarily.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Of course, I am always willing to accept the word of my friend and namesake from Georgia on almost any proposition. It is not a question as to what the Senator from North Carolina agreed with his colleagues on the other side of the Chamber. They may have entered into an agreement, as he has said, and if they did it in good faith, of course I accept it at par value; but the truth is that there has been delay, and the truth is that there has not been an expression of opinion on the other side as to this proposition.

Why should a Senator come here and read an article taking an hour or an hour and a half on one of the little items of the tariff bill? The information is all here, it has been dug up by the Tariff Commission and has been printed in these reports.

It has been adduced before the committee, page after page, day after day, week after week, and is all printed. The information is here. The facts are here.

If my friend from New Mexico will take the trouble to read the reports of the Tariff Commission and to read the evidence given before the committee, he will find no difficulty in coming to some sane conclusion about the proposition.

Anybody can stand up and ask questions about an item. My friend from Georgia, with his versatile genius, could stand here and ask questions for a whole day about any one of the items. But that is not legitimate debate. It is not honestly seeking information. Such things are done for the purpose of delay and filibuster; nothing else; and, so far as I am concerned, it will not be tolerated in the future if there is any way to prevent it. If the Republican Members who are responsible for legislation and who in a short time must go to the country and answer for their conduct of the affairs of the Government, have in mind to do the things they were elected to do, they will stay here, if necessary, to the extent of physical endurance and pass the bill.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I may remind the Senator of another extraneous matter brought in here by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] on yesterday. He brought in the Russian matter.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I understand that.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. No other Senator took any time on that proposition. Nobody criticized the Senator from Idaho about it, and nobody has mentioned it until now. I merely mention it to show that the other side of the Senate has done quite as much in that line as this side has done. If the Senator from Georgia could ask questions all day, he certainly has not done it and he will not do it.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I thank the Senator. If we could get the same concession from all other Senators on the other side of the Chamber, we would make commendable headway in the passage of this legislation.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I feel that I must——

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I had the floor when I yielded to the Senator from Indiana, and the Senator from New Mexico is now about to speak for the fourth time on this one subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. LODGE. If I have the floor, I should like to proceed. I will yield to the Senator if he wishes to ask me a question, of course, but as I have said nothing yet the question is easily asked.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I simply want to take exception, in a courteous manner, to what the distinguished Senator from Indiana has just said.

Mr. LODGE. I do not yield for the purpose of having the Senator from New Mexico reply to the Senator from Indiana. That is not asking any question.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I shall not further trespass upon the good nature of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts will proceed.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the manufacture of lactic acid, both technical and edible, is being rapidly destroyed in this country by the German competition. There were four companies, I think probably five—the American Alkali & Acid Co., of Bradford, Pa., which went out of business; the Atlantic Chemical Co., of Mansfield, Mass., which failed; the Avery Chemical Co., of Lowell, Mass., which failed; the Westchester Chemical Co., of Pelham, N. Y., which found it unprofitable and discontinued business; and the same statement was made before the committee by the Du Pont Co., which had a branch which made lactic acid and had given up because it was rendered entirely unprofitable.

I have here a letter from the Bureau of Customs Statistics showing the importations of lactic acid entering the United States during the year 1921 and the month of January, 1922. I will ask to have that printed in the RECORD.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will ask the Senator if he will have it read, as I desire to say something on this question myself, and I would like to have the information which he has in hand.

Mr. LODGE. This is simply to show the increase in importations, and I will state the figures. For the year 1921 the figures are as follows, and I will read only the round numbers: January, 14,000 pounds; February, 23,000 pounds; March, 22,000 pounds; April, 78,000 pounds; May, 20,000 pounds; June, 22,000 pounds; July, 94,000 pounds; August, no transactions; September, 83,000 pounds; October, 100,000 pounds; November, 77,000 pounds; December, 62,000 pounds; a grand total of 603,385 pounds for 1921; and in January, 1922, there were 72,325 pounds.

The companies which I have enumerated and which I think are all the companies, certainly all producing in any quantity, have all gone out of business except one new company, which took over the Avery Chemical Co., of Lowell, and which has made an effort to carry on the business. The last I have heard, they had practically closed down.

The technical lactic acid is used in tanning; the edible lactic is used in certain beverages, also in baking, and it is all made from vegetable materials. The company to which I have referred, as to its returns, says:

> In 1919 we exported 970,444 pounds of 44 per cent acid, in 1920 we exported 92,449 pounds of 44 per cent acid, and in 1921 and thus far in 1922 we have exported nothing at all.
> Upon investigating we find that the exceedingly low cost of labor (about one-twentieth of our cost) and the extremely depreciated value of the currency, which is now over 2,000 per cent below normal in Germany and other foreign countries of manufacture, make it possible for the foreign manufacturers to produce and sell in this country far below our cost of production and, of course, at a price at which we can not compete. To these facts is also attributable our loss of all of our export business.
> We also attach a certified copy of our balance sheet, showing our operations during the first six months of 1921, the last period for which figures are available, showing a loss to our company of $10,709.
> Our foreign market has been taken away from us absolutely and our domestic market is rapidly disappearing.

That is the situation. The industry, which reached very considerable proportions during the war, is practically being destroyed, and the question is whether it is worth while to keep that industry in existence.

As this particular company happens to be in my State I naturally take an interest in it. It seems to me if it is a valuable industry that it is worth keeping in existence. If we are left wholly to the tender mercies of the German manufacturers, we shall find the prices rise when they have a complete monopoly of the market.

I have given the figures for the imports. That seems to me to make a sufficient case. Unless Senators are wholly opposed to any protective duties and to the whole protective policy it seems to me to make a very strong case for protection.

I ask that the table to which I referred may be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the table referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

We hereby certify the above to be a true copy of the original in our possession.

WAMESIT CHEMICAL CO.,
JOHN H. MURPHY, Treasurer.

Mr. LODGE. While it is not a larger industry, it is a valuable industry; and there seems no good reason for its destruction. It was for that reason that I urged upon the committee that they should consider this increase over the House rate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I have listened with interest to the argument of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] in reference to this matter, but I am not sure that he has placed his argument in reference to this particular rate of duty on the right basis. In this case, although an increase has been made in the rate, a protective duty has not been asked for, and it is a case in which, strange to say, the House adopted the rate in the present law and levied on lactic acid the same tariff duty, so far as rate is concerned, as is provided in the present Democratic statute, which was supposed to be levied on the basis of a competitive tariff.

Mr. President, I do not believe that there is any real necessity for the increase of this rate, but the increase provided by the Senate committee is not a very extreme one. Under the House bill the tax on the lower grades of the material, which contain less than 30 per cent of lactic acid, is 1½ cents a pound and under the present law it is 1½ cents a pound. The bill as reported by the Senate Committee on Finance proposes to increase it by one-half cent a pound.

For the sake of comparison, however, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the production in this country in 1919 by American manufacturers amounted to 5,054,500 pounds, valued at $781,500. I quote those figures from the Summary of Tariff Information printed by the Senate committee. From their standpoint, those figures are not subject to dispute, and I have no doubt they are correct. The figures which they give as to the amount of the importations vary from those given by the Senator from Massachusetts. The Summary of Tariff Information, as published by the committee, reports that the quantity of lactic acid imported in 1921 for nine months was 853,000 pounds, in round figures, valued at $29,000. The figures presented by the Senator from Massachusetts, however, show that there were only 603,000 pounds imported for the same year, valued at $44,000.

Mr. President, it is difficult, of course, to ascertain what classes of lactic acid the figures cover; whether they refer to the class of material which contains above 55 per cent of pure acid or whether they refer to that class which contains below 30 per cent of pure acid, on which the rates vary. There is no information contained in this publication as to what the figures refer.

However, the value is governing, as the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] suggests. According to the value given by the Senate committee, $29,000, assuming that the imports would average the same for the remainder of the year, the value of the imports for last year would be about $36,000, as against a production in this country valued at over $781,000.

Mr. President, by taking a pencil and figuring the percentage it will be seen that, taking $36,000 as the amount of the imports which came in as compared to the American manufacture, the imports amount to about 4½ per cent of the American consumption of this article.

Mr. LODGE. But the Senator has not the American consumption for the last year. Our factories are closed down.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Undoubtedly; but the Senator from Massachusetts knows that they are not only closing down here, as is shown by the production, but are closing down abroad. This country to-day is in an era of depression—I will not say panic, I will not say stagnation, but of depression—and it has been so for over a year, entirely irrespective of the tariff. That is true. The factories have closed down. Why? Because the leather manufacturers are not making leather here and they are not making leather abroad.

Of course, I am perfectly familiar with the class of testimony which comes before a committee which is considering a tariff bill. I do not challenge the integrity or the character of the witnesses; I do not challenge their veracity; but, after many years of experience, I can say, without the opportunity for anybody to challenge the statement, that when the average man comes before a committee which is considering tariff legislation to testify as to his own business, he comes there to testify with a biased mind.

Mr. SMOOT. And so does the importer.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. And so does the importer, as the Senator from Utah says. That is true. So when you get from the manufacturer testimony to the effect that he can not with profit sell a product and that it should be placed under the protection of a higher tariff duty, without some corroborative testimony it is idle to rest the case there when we know that nobody is doing business or has been doing business during the last year. I think in the last few months conditions have somewhat improved, and I hope they will continue to improve; but I know that great business industries in my State with which I am familiar have been dead not on account of a tariff but because there was no demand for iron and steel products. When I say "dead," of course I mean relatively speaking. There is no market for lactic acid when everybody knows that the tanning concerns of the country have been largely shut down.

Mr. LODGE. That is not the principal use of the acid, as I think the Senator knows. Quite as much is used in connection with beverages and in the making of bread.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am sure the Senator is wrong, for there is a vastly greater quantity used in tanning than there is in the making of bread.

Mr. LODGE. I think not.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am sure the Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. LODGE. I think the larger part of the commodity is edible lactic acid.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have not the figures before me as to that.

Mr. LODGE. I have them here.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think a vast deal of lactic acid, in substance, is required in leather, but when it comes to bread, which goes to the stomach, it takes very little. However, be that as it may, their own figures presented to the Senate show that the imports coming into this country are about 4½ per cent of the domestic production, as shown in the summary printed by the Senate Committee on Finance, and 5 per cent as shown by the figures presented by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. President, I presume that to allow 5 per cent of foreign production to come into the American market to compete with the American producer, according to the theory of the high protectionist, is all wrong. I recall that on one occasion when the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill was under consideration by the Ways and Means Committee the head of a great manufacturing concern in this country was contending for a higher rate on manufactured iron and steel products. He insisted that the rate then existing was not high enough. When he had finished his main testimony, I asked him if he was not selling his products in Canada. He replied, "Yes." I then asked him to what extent, and he answered to the extent of about one-fourth of his production. I asked him if he did not meet competition from English iron and steel articles of the same kind. He said he did. I asked then, if in the Canadian market the English article was not given a rebate on the Canadian tariff of one-third; in other words, if he did not have to pay a tariff one-third higher than his English competitor, and he said he did. Yet he competed with them in the Canadian market. I asked him if he could do that in the Canadian market, why he could not compete with them on the same rate in the American market, where there was no discrimination against him. He said he could, and he would, but it would reduce his price, and that the American manufacturer and the American workingman were entitled to the entire home market. I asked him where would the Government get its revenue from if such a high rate were imposed so that no importations could come in, and he replied that he did not know—the testimony is in the record, and I will not put his name in here, although I can show it to the Senate—but that the Government ought to get its money from some other source than the American manufacturer.

Of course, that is an extreme statement of the case, but it was made by a reputable man. It is, however, often the viewpoint of the high protectionist who comes before committees demanding a certain rate. He does not want to divide anything with the Government, and unless some importations are allowed to come through the tariff wall, the Government gets nothing in revenue and the manufacturer gets it all.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield, if the Senator desires me to do so.

Mr. LODGE. I do not want to break in on the Senator's argument, but I do want to draw the distinction between the two cases.

In the first place, I think the Senator is wrong about the percentage of the imported material.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am quoting the Finance Committee's own statement.

Mr. LODGE. As to the consumption in this country, in the first place, the Senator has not got comparative figures of consumption in this country for the same period.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, but I will tell the Senator; I am not reading from my own analysis. What I read to the Senator was the Summary of Tariff Information, 1921, relative to the bill H. R. 7456, prepared by the United States Tariff Commission for the use of the Senate Committee on Finance.

Mr. LODGE. I am not questioning that. I repeat, however, that I think the Senator got his percentage wrong.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think the Senator did get his percentage of importations wrong.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, now, just let us see. I will make it right. As to the amount of importations, I said that if you took the figures here of $29,000 of importations for nine months in 1921——

Mr. SMOOT. That is not fair.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Wait a minute, now. The Senator says I am wrong in giving the figures. I said that if you took $29,000 for 1921, and made that for 12 months instead of 9 months, it would be about $36,000. Now, take 5 per cent. The total amount of American production, as given by your own book——

Mr. LODGE. For what year?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. For 1919.

Mr. LODGE. That was two years ago, when the Senator knows that prosperity was high, and on his own statement it is now very low.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, if you want to compare 1919, in that year the value of the importations was $3,000. I was making the comparison on a high year for importation and a low year for production.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator makes the mistake in this way—that he compares the value of the property rather than the pounds. It is not fair to take the value of the property and compare two years, when in 1919 the value of it was 36 cents, and in 1921 the value of it was 8 cents.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, but wait a minute. Hold on. Wait a minute.

Mr. SMOOT. That is four and a half times the price.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; but if the Senator knows anything about this bill, he knows he is wrong.

Mr. SMOOT. Well——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Wait a minute; I will tell the Senator. Just a minute ago I said that you had importations here—the Senator was standing at my elbow, and I repeated it in the record—that you had importations in 1920 of 133,000 pounds, and in 1921 of 853,000 pounds. I said that the discrepancy was no doubt in the fact as to the quality, whether it was a high-grade lactic acid or a low-grade lactic acid, and the Senator agreed with me, and said, "Yes; take the value"; and then I turned around and took the value, and now he is prepared to repudiate the value because it does not make his case.

Mr. SMOOT. No, Mr. President; that was about the percentages. If the Senator will take the pounds in 1919, the production in 1919 was 5,054,500 pounds. The importations for the first nine months of 1921 were 853,545 pounds.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Undoubtedly.

Mr. SMOOT. That is only for nine months. Therefore there would have to be one-quarter added to it. One-quarter of that would be 1,060,000 pounds. One million pounds, in round numbers, is 20 per cent of five million. We can not get around it. That acid came into this country; but if the Senator goes back to 1918 he will find out that that very lactic acid during the war was $2.20 a pound, foreign valuation, not American valuation at all.

Mr. LODGE. You must take valuations and pounds for the same year, of course.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; but if the Senators will yield a minute, that is a very amusing argument—an attempt to shift this question.

Mr. SMOOT. There was only 200 pounds of it imported in 1918. All that came into the country in that year was 200 pounds.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no doubt that that is true, with Europe shot to pieces in 1918, when they were not making any and we were making it; but the importations commenced coming the next year. Of course, the proof stands on the face of these figures that the 853,000 pounds imported in nine months in 1921 was a very much lower grade lactic acid than the 133,000 pounds that was imported in 1920, because the unit value of the lactic acid imported in 1920 was 49 cents, nearly half a dollar a pound, and in 1921 it was 8 cents.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, all through this chemical schedule I can point to prices that have declined comparatively as much as that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course, the Senator can.

Mr. SMOOT. But I say to the Senator that I do not know, and no one else can tell from any Government report, the strength of that acid.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. To be sure; and you bring a bill before the Senate making a material change in the rate of taxation on the American people, and admit that you do not know the critical facts. That is the truth.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, when I get a chance I will state to the Senator some facts. I have them here—facts that the Senator has utterly overlooked.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I listened to the Senator, and I assumed, of course, that he had given me the facts that he had in his possession.

Mr. LODGE. I did not give everything I knew; no.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But I know this, Mr. President—that this rate of 1½ per cent on lactic acid remained in this bill. It never was over 2 cents that I know of in any Republican tariff—I mean, the basic rate.

Mr. LODGE. This bill proposes 2 cents.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I know, but I am talking about the basic rate. Of course it raises it from the low grade of lactic acid that is below 30 per cent to a higher rate, and then another higher rate.

Mr. SMOOT. Under the Payne-Aldrich bill it was 2 cents below 40 per cent, and 3 cents above 40 per cent.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course, I am talking about the basic rate. All of the tariff rates go up in accordance with the grade, and there is no use of our arguing it.

Mr. SMOOT. Two cents is more than 1½ cents.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But, I say, your basic rate was never over 2 cents before, and the basic rate under the present law is 1½ cents, and under the 1½ cents it continued from 1913 on down, before we got into the war. It was never driven out of business. It finally had a production at home here of over 5,000,000 pounds. I think these gentlemen just want a little more graft for their own pockets. It is not serious, because even with this half cent it will not be a protective tariff.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It will not be protective very much more than the 1½ cents of revenue tariff that is in the present law. It will not exclude importations, and I am not seriously against it. I do not think it is of vital importance if this is given; but, as I said in the beginning to my friend from Massachusetts, if he had said that this is only a little increase, and not making it a protective, exclusive tariff, we might have stopped the argument in the very beginning.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, one thing I want to say is that I hardly think it fair for the Senator to refer to this as "graft." Under this German competition every lactic-acid factory in this country except one has closed, so far as I know. They are certainly not making "graft." If they were making money it would be honest money, but they are not making anything; and when I get an opportunity I will show just how prices are.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will yield to the Senator in just a second.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Just let me answer the Senator. When I say "graft," of course I do not mean that in the offensive sense. I mean the graft of the manufacturer who wants the power of the Government used to increase a price in order that he may put it in his pocket. I am not using the word "graft" in the sense that I am charging them with stealing or with any other offense, but I mean the graft of getting something for nothing. That is the kind of graft I mean.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I did not go into the question of prices or the details. To tell the truth, I wanted to shorten the matter as much as I could; but I have here the figures, and I think this is a perfectly honest statement from an honest man, although he happens to be interested in making lactic acid.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no doubt of that. I do not question that.

Mr. LODGE (reading):

The German imported acid rated as 80 per cent by weight is quoted to-day at 10.80 cents per pound. Add to this the proposed duty—

That is, the House rate—of 7 cents, and his selling price will be 17.80 cents, which is to be compared with our American producers' price of 17.50 cents. The point I wish to raise is that the margin of 0.30 cent between our home retail price and the imported price under the new tariff is insufficient in view of the practical certainty that the German price will automatically be lowered below our figure and that importations will continue uninterrupted, thereby forcing the abandonment of the lactic-acid production by American industry.

The Senator was quite right about the technical acid. I made a mistake as to that.

We also consider it important that the edible lactic acid should carry a flat duty of 15 cents per pound. The present tariff bill includes the edible under the general headings of lactic acid. It should be referred to specifically, as it is to all intents and purposes a separate article of commerce from the technical lactic acid. It is a form of acid that is certain to be extensively utilized in trade, and it is our expectation and hope that the market for edible lactic can be widely expanded to the advantage of the great mass of the people in this country. In short, the edible lactic industry in this country is in its infancy. Germany is sending in edible lactic acid to-day equivalent to that produced by us, and is selling it at 17.40 cents, as against our lowest price of 25 cents. If we add the 7 cents duty to the 17.40, we still give the Germans 0.60 cent as a differential in their favor. Once again I would like to point out that no one knows how much lower this German imported acid can and will be sold as compared to the present price.

The Wamesit Chemical Co. is closing down its plant to-day, having its tanks filled to overflowing with manufactured lactic acid which we have been unable to sell in any great quantities, largely because of German competition. We are willing to make due allowance for hard times, but it is the German competition which strangles our industry, whether times are good or bad.

I do not think there is any doubt whatever of the fact that this industry is being extinguished by the German competition. One after another has closed down. I think this is an industry that it is to the interest of the United States to preserve, although it is a small industry, I am quite aware. I do not think the amount asked is unreasonable. We are selling now, as he says, the technical acid slightly below the German price. The German price is lower than ours on the edible lactic. The competition is such that it is destroying the business, and they wish—there is only one concern—a sufficient protection to be enabled to maintain their industry.

That is the whole case; and I beg the Senate's pardon for having taken so much time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I do not want to dispute with my friend from Massachusetts, and I am not seriously resisting this proposition. I am trying to explain this bill to the Senate. Explanation did not come from the other side of the Chamber, and I have risen to explain the bill.

The Senator has just said that this information, coming from men in the business whose credibility he guarantees, is to the effect that German importations are coming in at 17 cents per pound and that their lowest price is 25 cents. The present tariff law provides a tax of 1½ cents a pound on this article, the low grade.

Mr. LODGE. The German importations come in at 17 cents, not counting the duty.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understood it was 17 cents without the duty. The present duty would make it 18½ cents.

Mr. LODGE. No; the present duty would make it 24.40.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The present duty is 1½ cents a pound.

Mr. LODGE. This is a different grade.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The present duty is on all grades.

Mr. LODGE. The duty proposed in the House was 7 cents.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am talking about what it is now.

Mr. LODGE. That is correct, under the present law.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It would add 1½ cents. The highest grade of lactic acid provided in this bill is 55 per cent lactic acid, on which the House bill placed a duty of 5 per cent, which the Senate committee has raised to 9 per cent, raising the rate, according to the Senator's own figures, to 24 cents. His informant says they can not make it for less than 25 cents. I say it is very clear that neither the Senate nor the House accepted the opinion of these gentlemen as to their ability to compete, because even according to their own figures, and if you give them the highest rate provided in this bill, it is still below the cost of production in the United States.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator from Alabama is mistaken. The Senator from Massachusetts did not say they could not make it for less than 24 cents; he said they were selling it at 25 cents. I make that distinction, because the Senator will see that what the Senator from Massachusetts has said better illustrates than anything which has been said yet what the provisions of the bill mean.

The Germans are selling at 17 cents, the Senator says, and the American producer is selling for 25 cents; therefore, we must put enough duty on the German product to bring it up to the selling price of the American product, without considering the question whether the American price covers a small profit, which he would be justified in asking the American people to pay, or an enormous profit, which he is not justified in asking the American consumer to pay. The point I make is that the Senator from Massachusetts has demonstrated what I have contended all the while, that this is a bill intended to maintain the present wholesale prices in our American markets.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Undoubtedly.

Mr. SIMMONS. Here he practically confesses that he wants a duty which will enable the American manufacturer to maintain his present prices without reference to whether those prices involve a moderate and a just profit or an extortionate profit.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I did not intend to yield to the Senator from North Carolina, because I wanted to finish this sentence, and if the Senator from Kentucky will pardon me, I want to carry out my argument.

Of course, the Senator from North Carolina has been speaking to the merits of the bill. I was merely arguing this case on the assertion of my friend from Massachusetts. I know these manufacturers boost their prices, and I have no doubt in the world that the cent and a half provided in the bill would take care of this industry properly; but, even accepting their own figures, the committees did not agree with them, because they put the figures 1 cent lower than the lowest price these manufacturers said they could sell for.

Now I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

REGENT OF SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

Mr. STANLEY. I did not wish to break into the course of the argument, but I desire to ask unanimous consent for the consideration of a joint resolution, which will require no debate and take up no time whatever.

The Board of Directors of the Smithsonian Institution has just suggested the name of Mr. John A. Roebling as a Regent. It is necessary to have the Senate act upon that matter, and I wish to have action on the joint resolution now.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I have served notice that after to-day no unanimous consent of that character shall be given. I will yield to my friend from Kentucky to-day, but ask him not to request unanimous consent to-morrow on any proposition.

Mr. STANLEY. This is just a formal matter. I introduce the joint resolution and ask for its present consideration.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 194) providing for the filling of a vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution of the class other than Members of Congress was read the first time by its title, the second time at length, and considered as in Committee of the Whole, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, of the class other than Members of Congress, be filled by the appointment of John A. Roebling, of Barnstable, N. J.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RECLAMATION IN IRRIGATION DISTRICTS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. McNARY. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on House bill 4382.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the conference report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4382) to provide for the application of the reclamation law to irrigation districts, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the Senate amendment and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That the term 'first mortgage,' as used in section 12 of the Federal farm loan act, approved July 17, 1916, shall be construed to include mortgages on farm lands under United States reclamation projects, notwithstanding there may be against such lands a reserved or created lien in favor of the United States for construction or other charges as provided in the act of June 17, 1902, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto, known as the reclamation law: Provided, That such lands are otherwise eligible for loans under the Federal farm loan act: And provided further, That the amount and date of maturity of such lien shall be given due consideration in fixing the value of such lands for loan purposes."

And the Senate agree to the same.

CHAS. L. McNARY,
W. L. JONES,
MORRIS SHEPPARD,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
M. P. KINKAID,
N. J. SINNOTT,
CARL HAYDEN,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. McNARY. I ask for the adoption of the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

THE TARIFF.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7456) to provide revenue, to regulate commerce with foreign countries, to encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that we take up the question of cyanide, which was taken up out of order two days ago.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator does not expect to get a vote upon the cyanide item to-night?

Mr. ODDIE. No; I do not.

Mr. SMOOT. Instead of asking to have the item under consideration laid aside, the Senator could make his speech upon the item, and there would not have to be any record made of the pending item being laid aside and the cyanide item taken up.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to inquire if we are ready to vote upon the lactic acid item?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I desire to make a few remarks on it.

Mr. McCUMBER. All right. Then the Senator from Nevada can proceed.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, two days ago the question of the duty on cyanide was discussed at some length, and I now want to make a few observations in support of the amendment which I introduced on April 18 to restore cyanide to the free list. This item was on the free list in the bill as it came from the House, but was changed by the Finance Committee to an ad valorem duty of 10 per cent. It has been on the free list for some years, and I am asking that it be continued on the free list. In doing this, I maintain that a duty on cyanide violates the principle of protection, which is the basis of tariff legislation.

Because of the unique position of gold in the monetary system and the present critical condition of the gold-mining industry I would like to submit for the consideration of the Senate some important reasons for retaining cyanide on the free list.

When Congress enacted the law establishing gold as the monetary unit, the price of gold automatically became fixed. While the Nation derives the benefits from the adoption of the gold standard, it nevertheless imposes upon the gold-mining industry the heavy burden of Government price fixation. Gold is the only commodity whose price can not respond to the law of supply and demand. Gold is the only commodity upon which a protective tariff can not be levied.

For example, the proposed duty on sugar will enable the sugar producer to readily absorb the proposed duty on potash fertilizer, but there is no means of levying a duty on gold by which the gold producer can absorb a duty, however small, on cyanide, which is as indispensable in the recovery of gold as potash is to the grower of sugar.

It would seem incumbent upon the Government, having arbitrarily fixed the price of gold, to render the largest measure of protection possible to the producers of gold, by imposing no duty upon cyanide. A cyanide duty neither can be absorbed by a tariff on gold nor passed along to the consumer of gold.

The following statement will show the difficulty of attempting to compete with the one company in this country manufacturing cyanide:

PATENT CONTROL BY THE ROESSLER-HASSLACHER CHEMICAL CO. PROHIBITS COMPETITION IN THE MANUFACTURE OF CYANIDE IN THIS COUNTRY.

[Memorandum re monopoly of American manufacture of cyanide by Roessler & Hasslacher Chemical Co.]

1. The Roessler & Hasslacher Chemical Co. is now and always has been the only producer of sodium cyanide in the United States. Ever since sodium cyanide replaced potassium cyanide in the market this company has enjoyed an absolute monopoly, so far as American manufacture is concerned. Sodium cyanide replaced potassium cyanide, except for certain small uses, because sodium cyanide can be produced at less cost per unit of cyanogen.

2. Practically all cyanide now produced in the world is manufactured by the process used by the Roessler & Hasslacher Chemical Co. except the cyanide produced by the American Cyanamid Co. at Niagara Falls, Canada. This Canadian manufacture uses different raw materials, but is dependent upon very cheap water power, which is the reason for its location on the Canadian side of the Niagara River. Therefore so long as the Roessler & Hasslacher Chemical Co. continues its monopoly of the process it will continue to be the only American manufacturer of cyanide.

3. This monopoly was originally based upon patents. The basic patents have expired. Roessler & Hasslacher Chemical Co. have obtained patents upon improvements in the process. Several of these improvement patents, having many years yet to run, are mentioned in the hearings before the Finance Committee at page 4824. Representatives of Roessler & Hasslacher testify that they are not using these improvement patents, but they admit quite frankly that any other company would have a very hard time competing with them. In their brief before the Finance Committee, at page 4844 of the hearings, Roessler & Hasslacher Chemical Co. admits the firmness with which it is intrenched in its monopoly by making the following statement:

"The experience of the United States Government in its attempt to manufacture cyanide under the Bucher process at Saltville, Va., is proof positive of the fact that the construction and operation of a plant for the satisfactory production of cyanide is no small task and can not be accomplished within a short time. The United States Government spent several million dollars in the construction and operation of the Saltville plant, and up to the close of the war had never turned out cyanide in commercial quantities."

Of course, when making this statement Roessler & Hasslacher Chemical Co. did not mean to support the contention of the gold miners that it had a strangle hold upon the business of producing cyanide in the United States. The company intended rather to paint a horrible picture of what would have happened to the United States during the war if it had not been on hand to make the necessary cyanide for the many industries dependent upon this material. But no matter what was the point sought to be proved by this testimony, it certainly establishes the fact, from the admission of the company itself, that it is, and for years will be, in monopolistic control of the manufacture of cyanide and of the American cyanide market in case the production of other countries is excluded by a protective tariff.

This proves that a duty on cyanide would merely intrench the monopoly in a still stronger position, eliminate the only domestic competition that now exists, and expose the consumers of cyanide to all of the ills which accompany monopolistic control, both as to price and terms of contract for delivery.

Mr. President, at this point I ask permission to insert in the RECORD a statement showing the gold production for the years 1915 to 1921.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE CRITICAL CONDITION OF THE GOLD-MINING INDUSTRY OF THE WORLD AND THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. ODDIE. The gold production of the world has declined from $468,724,918 in 1915 to $320,471,441 in 1921, an amount of $148,253,477, or 31.6 per cent.

The gold production of the United States has declined from $101,035,700 in 1915 to $49,105,500 in 1921, an amount of $51,930,200, or 51.4 per cent.

Of the total decline in the gold production of the world, the decline in the production of gold in the United States contributed 35 per cent.

On July 19, 1919, England removed the war embargo on the exportation of gold to the extent of permitting exportation under license. This action enabled the South African and Australian gold producers to sell newly produced gold in London for delivery in New York at $20.67 per fine ounce. The dollars converted into paper pounds sterling at the current rate of exchange provided a paper pound premium to those producers and offset to a considerable degree the diminished purchasing power of the pound sterling in terms of wages and supplies entering into the production of gold in South Africa and Australia.

The paper pound premium fluctuates from day to day with the depreciation of sterling exchange as quoted. From a gold par of about 85 shillings per fine ounce, the paper shilling quotation rose to over 128 shillings, an increase of about 50 per cent in price, but averaged for 1920 and 1921 about 30 per cent. With the recent improvement in sterling exchange the paper pound premium has been reduced to about 10 per cent.

This fact has forced the South African operators to reduce operation costs by substituting native for European labor. The recent strike, which has shut down many of the mines, resulted from this substitution. The operators won the fight, but the reduction of the exchange premium by the improvement of the sterling rate has been so great that many mines will be unable to continue operations.

The following comment from the report of the Low Grade Mines Commission should be an accurate survey of the conditions in South Africa:

A thorough investigation made by the Low Grade Mines Commission in 1920 indicated that when the "price of gold" falls to 100 shillings per ounce, 16 out of 39 operating mines would show losses. At 90 shillings 26 mines and 12,000 white men would be affected. With gold at par 31 mines could not be operated at a profit, affecting 14,400 Europeans.

It may be anticipated that the gold production of the world will be less this year than last, due to the marked reduction of South African production, which is reflected in the recent arrivals of gold in London from that country, as shown in Table I accompanying, entitled "London gold movements."

The reason for the heavier decline in the domestic production of gold whereby this country contributed only 15.3 per cent in 1920 and 1921, as compared with 21.5 per cent in 1915, to the world's production is clearly set forth in the following quotation from the report of President Harding's Conference on Unemployment submitted October 13, 1921:

Gold mining suffers from the excessive cost of supplies and other items, and the value of the gold output being fixed as against material advances in cost has operated to restrict the employment of labor in gold mines.

The American producers of gold have received no assistance as did the South African producers, due to exchange conditions, and have been forced to bear the full burden of inflationary wages and prices. This has forced many mines to suspend operations and fill with water, with the consequent impairment of investments and possible loss of ore reserves through caving.

Legislative aid was requested in behalf of the gold-mining industry to compensate for the increasing costs of production which have prevailed since 1916 and has been denied. This makes it even more necessary that no additional or inequitable burdens, such as a duty on cyanide, be levied against the gold-mining industry at this time.

THE EFFECT OF A CYANIDE DUTY UPON THE PRODUCTION OF GOLD IN THE UNITED STATES.

The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] has made a statement before the Finance Committee in opposition to the proposed tariff on cyanide, citing some of the conditions which prevail in the gold-mining industry of South Dakota. However, the conditions which pertain in the State of Nevada with reference to the consumption of cyanide and the dependence of the gold-mining industry upon its use in the recovery of gold will make the tariff on cyanide a still more severe penalty upon the production of gold in that State. From the practical experience I have gained in the operation of gold mines in my State, I can speak with confidence on this subject.

For example, at one of the largest mines in Nevada—the Tonopah-Belmont—in 1916, before the costs of supplies had increased so greatly, the cyanide consumption was 3.52 pounds per ton of ore, costing $0.601. The cyanide cost in this case is 28 per cent of the total milling cost. All supplies purchased by the mill cost $1.318 per ton, including cyanide of $0.601. In other words, the cost of the cyanide represents nearly half of the cost of all the supplies purchased by this large mill.

At the Churchill Milling Co., of Nevada, it was reported in 1916 that the cyanide cost was $0.375 per ton, while all of the supplies consumed in the milling of the ore cost $1.445. The cost of cyanide therefore represented approximately 25 per cent of the total cost of all supplies. The total labor of all kinds in this mill cost $0.857. The cost of cyanide represents 43 per cent of the total labor cost.

Gold production in Nevada has declined from $13,576,000 in 1912 to $3,214,000 in 1921, a decline of 76.3 per cent for the decade. The production of gold in the United States during the same period declined from $93,452,000 in 1912 to $49,105,500 in 1921, or 47.5 per cent. The decline in Nevada, therefore, has been greater than that of the United States generally, which is evidence of the serious effect of the increased cost of cyanide upon the production of gold in my State, which is so largely dependent upon the cyanide process for its recovery.

In many of the properties of the United States the cyanide process is used to recover only a small percentage of the values contained in the ore. Many gold ores yield their major values in the process of amalgamation. This is true of the Homestake Mining Co., whose brief has been filed.

I have here a letter recently received from my State which presents the problem of treating one lot of 1,500,000 tons of tailings, which are to-day lying idle. Figuring cyanide at the present cost, without a duty, these tailings can be treated at a profit of 20 cents a ton. Many unforeseen things can happen which might cut that profit to practically nothing, and I am satisfied that if any duty is levied on cyanide these tailings will not be treated, which will mean the loss of a great deal of money to our State, the loss of employment to many men, and the loss of this newly produced gold which is needed in circulation.

The investments that have been made in the last 20 years in the gold-mining industry, however, have been based upon these additional values which are recovered by the cyanide process. In many cases the tailings which are treated by the cyanide process are extremely low grade, running as low as 80 cents to the ton, and yet the recovery of such small amounts is essential to the profitable operation of many of our important mines. In such cases the increased cost of cyanide resulting from the imposition of a duty may force the abandonment of the cyanide process, which will compel the shutting down of the entire operation.

There is no way that the gold producer can pass this proposed duty on cyanide to the consumer of gold, and therefore it becomes a direct burden upon the cost of production, which the industry is not now prepared to sustain and which will further delay the reopening of many properties which have been forced to shut down during this period of high costs.

I ask permission at this point to insert in the RECORD a statement of the London gold movements.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. ODDIE. I ask permission to insert in the RECORD at this point a table showing the imports and exports of gold by months from August, 1921, to March, 1922.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

March	33,488,000	986,000	32,502,000

[1] These figures reported by the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce.

THE MARKED CHANGE IN THE WORLD'S GOLD MOVEMENTS.

Mr. ODDIE. The London arrivals of gold from South Africa show a marked decline from £1,510,000, February 8, 1922, to £71,600, March 1, 1922—Table I. While the amounts of gold exported from London to the United States as recorded in Table I show that no gold was exported on February 22 and March 1, previous single shipments from London have reached a high point on September 14, 1921, of £3,387,000.

The imports of gold to the United States show a continuous decline from $86,240,000 for August, 1921, to an average of about $30,000,000 for the four months of December, 1921, January, February, and March, 1922.

With the appreciation in sterling exchange South African mines are finding difficulty in maintaining production, which forecasts a decline in the amount of gold which London will receive from its principal source of supply. This also forecasts a decline in the imports of gold into the United States, indicating that the end of the period of heavy gold arrivals in this country is in sight, with a possibilty in the not distant future that the gold tide will be going out.

Confronted by this condition, it becomes necessary now to consider the restoration of the gold-mining industry of the United States which is now in so critical a condition. It will take several years to restore normality to the industry, and any burdens, such as the imposition of a duty on cyanide, will materially delay the return of the industry to normal production.

There is little question but that the United States during this period will be losing a large portion of the gold acquired from foreign sources since 1914. It will safeguard our own financial position as a creditor nation if we have a normal production of new gold to compensate for these anticipated gold-reserve losses.

RESTORATION OF WORLD'S NORMAL GOLD PRODUCTION ESSENTIAL ELEMENT IN FINANCIAL RECONSTRUCTION PROGRAM.

Since excessive credit and currency expansion, both here and abroad, have caused the serious condition in the gold-mining industry of the United States and foreign countries, it follows that normal production can not be restored until the credits and currencies of the principal countries of the world are made interconvertible and redeemable in gold.

In addition, therefore, to all the other arguments in favor of a return to the normal functioning of the gold standard in all countries, there is this most potential argument arising from the need to restore normal gold production as a most invigorating element in financial reconstruction.

The Roessler & Hasslacher Co.'s testimony before the committee claims that there are 250 men employed by them in the manufacture of cyanide in this country. The American Cyanamid Co., manufacturing cyanide in Canada, imports all of its raw materials from the United States—coal and coke from Pennsylvania, limerock from Michigan, and salt from New York. The imposition of this tariff, therefore, would terminate the purchase of limerock, coal, coke, and salt in this country by the American Cyanamid Co., used in the manufacture of cyanide for this market, and create unemployment to this extent.

The Bureau of the Census in its report giving the figures for 1920 states that there are over 20,000 miners and millmen engaged in the precious-metal mining industry in this country. The employment of these 20,000 men will be seriously affected by a tariff on cyanide. The precious-metal mining industry, in accordance with a statement of the United States Bureau of the Mint in cooperation with the United States Geological Survey, shows figures of production of precious metals for the year 1921 in 22 States, the Territory of Alaska, and the Philippines, while the operations of the Roessler & Hasslacher Co., producing cyanide, are limited to Niagara Falls, N. Y., and Perth Amboy, N. J.

CANADIAN IMPORTS OF CYANIDE.

Mr. President, the question was raised in the debate on Wednesday, May 3, by myself regarding the report from the Tariff Commission. I stated that I was under the impression that an error had been made.

The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] expressed concern lest if cyanide should remain on the free list the German manufacturer would destroy first the German-American manufacturer, Roessler & Hasslacher Chemical Co., and then the Canadian manufacturer, which is an American-owned company. I called the Senator's attention to the fact that the Tariff Commission's report contained in Summary of Tariff Information at page 1434 was in error. I knew it was in error because it indicates that imports of cyanide while this material has been on the free list have come mostly from Germany. I knew that in recent years these imports have come very largely from the American Cyanamid Co. plant in Canada, which has not shown any signs of being destroyed by German competition. I wrote to the American Cyanamid Co. for a statement of the amount of cyanide imported from their Canadian plant for the years 1919, 1920, and 1921, and I find that in each year the amount of Canadian cyanide imported is in excess of the total imports reported by the Tariff Commission.

The fact is, as I understand the situation, that the Tariff Commission obtains its figures from customs records which are not as carefully compiled for items on the free list as for items that pay duty. I will insert in the RECORD a table showing the Tariff Commission's report of the amount of cyanide imported from all countries and the amount actually imported from Canada.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Imports of cyanide into the United States.

PROFITS OF ROESSLER & HASSLACHER CHEMICAL CO.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, with regard to the profits exacted from the precious metal industries by the Roessler & Hasslacher German-born monopoly, there has been a great deal of effort to confuse the issue. This effort has gone even to the extent of the circulation by this company to Members of the Senate and to others of copies of a letter of the present Alien Property Custodian, dated January 7, 1922. That letter was signed by the Alien Property Custodian—by whom it was actually prepared I would hesitate to say—at a time when negotiations were closing under which the Americanization of the Roessler & Hasslacher Cehmical Co. was accomplished, for a period of five years at least, by placing the controlling stock in a voting trust. The letter was prepared for the purpose of being inserted in a brief to be filed by the Roessler & Hasslacher Chemical Co. with the Senate Committee on Finance, but before that brief was filed the Alien Property Custodian reconsidered the matter and had this letter ripped out of the brief and a statement substituted in place of it, so it is not a part of the official hearings.

In preparing this statement he recognized that it was no duty of his to pass upon any issues involved in the tariff question, but merely to make clear to Congress the exact relations between the Alien Property Custodian's office and the company. This is the statement which was substituted for the letter referred to two days ago by the Senator from New York and which I agreed to place in the RECORD. I offer the statement now and ask permission that it be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

The statement referred to is as follows:

[From tariff hearings before Senate Finance Committee, free list, pages 4845–4847.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 20, 1922.

Memorandum re Roessler & Hasslacher Chemical Co.

Capital stock, authorized and issued, 13,000 shares (par $100). Enemy shares reported by Roessler & Hasslacher Chemical Co., 5,934. Reported by Bureau of Investigation, Alien Property Custodian office, 3,800.

Demand for the shares reported by the Roessler & Hasslacher Chemical Co. was served on April 4, 1918. The certificates were transferred to the name of the custodian and deposited with the Alien Property Custodian depositary. Demands for the 3,800 shares reported by the Bureau of Investigation were served April 7, 1919. Pursuant to such demand certificates for 3,585 shares were turned over to the Alien Property Custodian and deposited with the Columbia Trust Co. as Alien Property Custodian depositary. Certificates for the remaining 215 shares were never turned over to the Alien Property Custodian. Demand for 100 of the 184 shares reported by Speyer & Co. was subsequently withdrawn, and certificates for the 84 shares remaining were afterwards issued in the name of the Alien Property Custodian and deposited with the Bank of Manhattan Co. as Alien Property Custodian depositary. Thus the Alien Property Custodian was in undisputed possession of certificates for 6,018 shares in his name and had physical possession of certificates for 3,585 shares, and, further, had demanded 215 additional shares for which no certificates were surrendered and none issued in the custodian's name.

The determination that the 3,800 shares reported by the bureau of investigation were enemy property was disputed by the corporation and by certain American citizens who had certificates for various portions of this 3,800 block registered in their respective names. The investigation showed that an agreement had been made between the enemy and Franz Roessler for the latter to purchase from the former 3,800 shares of stock, same representing the control of the company. These negotiations were started in 1916 and resulted in the issuance of a certificate of stock for 3,800 shares in the name of Franz Roessler in February, 1917. The custodian's investigators were not satisfied that Franz Roessler had acquired good title to these shares and considered that the transfer was made in contemplation of war and was but a temporary arrangement. The Roessler & Hasslacher Chemical Co. and Franz Roessler contended that the transfer was a bona fide sale. Franz Roessler and certain American registered owners of this 3,800 block subsequently filed notice of claim and suit under section 9 to recover these shares. These suits were filed in the United States district court of New York and New Jersey. To determine the question of ownership required that the courts issue letters rogatory for the taking of testimony and the examination of the enemy's books in Germany. This the court refused to do, stating, it is said, that the matter could be determined at the end of the war. The matter was in this situation when the present Alien Property Custodian took office. With a view to having the matter determined, it was decided to institute court proceedings under section 17 to require the issuance of new certificates of stock for the disputed 3,800 shares. However, this came to the attention of the attorneys for the corporation, and they secured an injunction restraining the Alien Property Custodian from instituting such suit. At this juncture it was decided to avoid future litigation, and many hearings were had in the matter before the Alien Property Custodian, his general counsel and assistant general counsel, and other members of his staff, as well as outside counsel. The result of these hearings was the release by the Alien Property Custodian of his demands for the 3,800 shares, on the understanding that the same be placed in a voting trust for a period of not less than five years, and the placing of certificates for 6,018 shares, to which the custodian holds undisputed title, by the custodian in said voting trust. This voting trust was executed on October 3, 1921, for a period of five years, the stock pledged therein representing control of the corporation in the hands of the voting trustees to be voted by such trustees. These trustees, five in number, were selected, two by the Alien Property Custodian, two by the Roessler & Hasslacher Chemical Co., and these four selected the fifth. In this manner the control and supervision of a majority of the outstanding shares of the corporation was vested in five American trustees for a period of not less than five years.

PERTH AMBOY CHEMICAL WORKS.

Outstanding capital, 4,000 shares (par $100).
Shares reported by company, 1,960.
Shares reported by Bureau of Investigation, Alien Property Custodian office, 80.

These 80 shares represent a control of the corporation and were treated in the same manner as were the 3,800 shares in the Roessler & Hasslacher Chemical Co.

NIAGARA ELECTRO CHEMICAL CO.

Outstanding capital, 1,000 shares (par $100).
Shares reported by company, 110.
Shares reported by Bureau of Investigation, Alien Property Custodian office, 240.

The custodian demanded but 35 per cent of the outstanding stock of this company and at no time was in a position to control its management. The 240 shares reported by the Bureau of Investigation were treated in the same manner as were the 3,800 shares of the Roessler & Hasslacher Chemical Co.

All of these shares, namely, 3,800 shares Roessler & Hasslacher Chemical Co., 80 shares Perth Amboy Chemical Works, 240 shares Niagara Electro Chemical Co., are to-day in the indisputed possession of their American registered owners, the demands made for such shares by the Alien Property Custodian in 1919 having been marked "satisfied" by reason of the voting trust agreement of October 3, 1921, aforementioned.

The Alien Property Custodian was represented on the board of directors of the Roessler & Hasslacher Chemical Co. by two out of six directors; in the Perth Amboy Chemical Works by two out of seven directors; and had no representative on the board of directors of the Niagara Electro Chemical Co.

Respectfully submitted.

THOMAS W. MILLER,
Alien Property Custodian.

Mr. ODDIE. The statement is illuminating and shows how this Roessler & Hasslacher monopoly was born of German parentage and that undisputed possession of a substantial part of its stock was obtained by the Alien Property Custodian during the war, and a demand made for a sufficient amount of additional stock to constitute a control not only of the Roessler & Hasslacher Chemical Co. but of its subsidiaries engaged in the cyanide business.

The company sought to camouflage its character as a really American company by a very remarkable transaction in accordance with which it was claimed that the control had suddenly passed from Germany to the United States in February, 1917, on the eve of the outbreak of hostilities between this country and Germany. This transfer of control the Alien Property Custodian claimed was not a genuine sale, but was made for the purpose of defrauding the United States Government.

The German-Americans engaged in the management of the company commenced litigation against the Alien Property Custodian, questioning his right to the possession of the control of the company. That litigation, the successful prosecution of which in behalf of the Government would have required the taking of much testimony in Germany, was ultimately compromised by the creation of a voting trust. That voting trust is made up of five men, two of whom were named by the Alien Property Custodian, two by the company, and the fifth by the four. During the existence of this voting trust, of course, the company is in American hands, but what will happen at the expiration of the voting trust five years hence is another question.

Meanwhile the relations of the Roessler & Hasslacher Chemical Co. with its German parent, the Schiede-Anstalt, have been fully reestablished. Over in Germany they have a Fritz-Roessler of the Schiede-Anstalt; in the United States they have a Franz Roessler of the Roessler-Hasslacher Chemical Co., and Franz and Fritz are brothers.

I have in my hand, and would like to offer for the RECORD, a photostatic copy of a letter from the United States Department of Commerce, based upon its investigation of cyanide manufacture in Germany. In that letter it is pointed out that the investigations of the Department of Commerce were not successful because whenever they went to the German manufacturer for information they were directly referred to the American representatives of the German manufacturer, the Roessler-Hasslacher Chemical Co.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the entire letter may be placed in the RECORD at this point.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
BUREAU OF FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC COMMERCE,
Washington, March 10, 1922.

AMERICAN CYANAMID CO.,
511 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y.

(Attention Mr. E. J. Prank, Commercial Research Bureau.)

GENTLEMEN: With further reference to your request of October 14, regarding the production of cyanide in several European countries, I am pleased to furnish you herewith the information which we have received from Mr. Herring, American commercial attaché in Berlin. Extracts from Mr. Herring's letter follow:

"I wish to say that we have endeavored to obtain information on the processes in use here for the production of cyanide, but have been unable to get anything very specific. The production of this product is practically a monopoly in the hands of the Deutsche Gold und Silber Scheideanstalt, Frankfurt am Main. This concern is said to control 95 per cent of the grade of cyanide of soda, containing 50 to 51 per cent cyanogen, which is the product most in demand. An inquiry made direct to these manufacturers elicited the reply that any information desired could be gotten from their American representatives, the Roessler & Hasslacher Chemical Co., New York City, 709–717 Sixth Avenue, corner Forty-first Street, box 119, Times Square.

"In regard to the methods of production, I quote as follows from a letter of a dealer in cyanide of soda:

"'The process usually is simply a mixture of soda crystals, cyanamide, and a particular grade of charcoal which leaves practically no trace of ash. This is electrolytically treated and comes out in the form of cyanide of soda, and the purity depends upon the grade of cyanamide used, the quality of the charcoal, and there seems to be a very great knowledge needed of exactly the electrolytical treatment required to give the desired result. It is certain that very few manufacturers have succeeded in producing the pure article in a commercial way and at a low price, but a very well-known chemist with whom I talked several times about this product maintains that in a properly directed commercial laboratory the cost should not exceed 14 cents per pound, packing included.'

"As regards export, these mostly go to the Netherlands, Baltic States, Far East, and the United States. The export of potassium cyanide and potassium ferricyanide, both yellow and red, for the months of September, October, and November were as follows:

"'September, 2,444 double centners (100 kilograms).
"'October, 4,503 double centners (100 kilograms).

Mr. ODDIE. Regarding the profits of the Roessler & Hasslacher Chemical Co., it is quite true that the enormous percentages, such as 900 per cent mentioned here in debate two days ago, are profits of subsidiary companies upon their limited capitalization, but the Senate Committee on Finance was unsuccessful in its efforts to extract from the Roessler & Hasslacher Chemical Co. exact information as to the real amount of capital that had been put into these subsidiaries.

It was pointed out by an official of the Roessler & Hasslacher Chemical Co. at these hearings that the Niagara Electro-Chemical Co., one of the subsidiaries, had a capital of but $100,000, whereas its fixed assets were as much as $3,000,000; and the Senator from New Mexico endeavored to ascertain whether the $100,000 was all the money that was actually put into the company by the Roessler & Hasslacher Chemical Co. and whether the remainder of the $3,000,000 was simply the accumulation of profits.

I will read that part of the hearings in which the Senator from New Mexico endeavored without success to obtain this information:

Senator JONES. You say the capital stock of that American company is $100,000?

Mr. RIGNEY. Yes, sir.

Senator JONES. How much capital was actually put into it in the beginning—at the time of its organization?

Mr. RIGNEY. I presume not more than $100,000 at that time, but the Niagara Electro Chemical Co. is simply a subsidiary of the Roessler & Hasslacher Chemical Co., and is only considered as a branch for Roessler & Hasslacher.

Senator JONES. What I am trying to get at is this: How much additional money has been put into it by the parent company, if any?

Mr. RIGNEY. That I would have to get the records for. I could not give you that statement offhand, sir.

Senator JONES. I should like to know whether or not, with that original capital of $100,000, the profits of that concern have built it up to its present state, where its assets amount to $3,000,000.

Mr. RIGNEY. That, I think, could easily be given you, sir. I want to say this, that when this company was organized——

Senator JONES (interposing). Will you furnish that statement, please, for the record?

Mr. RIGNEY. We will furnish you any figures that the committee desire.

Senator JONES. I would like to know the amount of money which has actually been put into that subsidiary company by the parent company.

Mr. RIGNEY. We have no desire to hide anything.

Senator JONES. I am sure of that.

The statement on this subject which Mr. Rigney promised to file, supplying the information we would like to have bearing upon this question of profits, has never been filed, so far as I can ascertain from a complete examination of the records of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I should like to propound an inquiry to the Senator from Nevada touching the matter to which he referred in his remarks.

Mr. ODDIE. I will be very glad to answer the Senator, if I can.

Mr. WILLIS. I desire to ask the Senator what response he makes to the argument such as I am about to indicate to him. I have before me letters not from the producers of this material but from users of it. There have come to me in the last day or so some 50 letters from such concerns as the Cleveland Tractor Co., of Cleveland, Ohio; the Ohio Foundry & Manufacturing Co., of Steubenville, Ohio; the White Sewing Machine Co., of Cleveland, Ohio; the Robbins & Myers Co., of Springfield, Ohio; the White Motor Co., of Cleveland, Ohio; the De Vilbiss Manufacturing Co., of Toledo, Ohio, and other companies of Ohio. I ask to put the names of the other companies in the RECORD, consisting of probably 50 of the most important manufacturing concerns in the State of Ohio, written apparently on their own motion, and urging that a fair protective duty shall be placed upon cyanide.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the names will be printed in the RECORD.

The names referred to are as follows:

The Cleveland Twist Drill Co., Cleveland, Ohio.
The Torbensen Axle Co., Cleveland, Ohio.
The Imperial Underwear Co., Piqua, Ohio.

The Steubenville Pottery Co., Steubenville, Ohio.
The H. N. White Co., Cleveland, Ohio.
The Althoff Plating & Polishing Co., Columbus, Ohio.

Mr. WILLIS. I quote the letter of the Barnes Manufacturing Co., as follows:

MANSFIELD, OHIO, April 27, 1922.

Senator F. B. WILLIS,
Care of Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: We understand the Canadian manufacturers of cyanide are attempting to influence tariff legislation so that cyanide salts may be admitted free of duty.

During the war the manufacture of cyanide was declared an essential industry, and it is certainly essential in time of peace. As this is an important industry, it should receive proper protection, and it would seem to us that 20 per cent would be none too much.

We trust that you will give this matter the necessary attention.

Yours very truly,

THE BARNES MANUFACTURING CO.,
T. R. BARNES,
Secretary and General Manager.

I ask leave to insert in the RECORD two more letters, which are typical of the others.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letters referred to are as follows:

STEUBENVILLE, OHIO, April 25, 1922.

Hon. FRANK B. WILLIS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

SIR: As an American manufacturer we desire to register our protest against the propaganda of the Canadian manufacturer of cyanide in its attempt to influence tariff legislation so that cyanide salts may be admitted free of duty.

During the war the manufacture of cyanide was declared an essential industry, and is equally essential in time of peace. The future can best be judged by the history of the past; therefore, it is easy to see what will happen to the American consumers of cyanide when the American producer is driven from the market by unrestricted foreign competition.

In order that this industry may be preserved in the United States and the American consumer assured of an uninterrupted supply of a high-grade material, we respectfully request that you support the application of the American manufacturers for a substantial duty on cyanide salts.

Very truly yours,

GILL BROS. CO.,
D. R. BROOKE, Secretary.

SANDUSKY, OHIO, May 2, 1922.

Hon. FRANK B. WILLIS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. WILLIS: As consumers of cyanide salts we are very much in favor of a substantial protective duty on that material. We have no interest in the cyanide business, but appreciate the position of the American cyanide manufacturers, and as a regular consumer urge you to favor proper protection.

Yours very truly,

THE HORD COLOR PRODUCTS CO.,
By C. H. RICHARDSON.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, the question I wish to propound to my friend from Nevada is this: Here is a substance which apparently we are producing in this country economically and in sufficient quantity to supply the market, and numerous consumers of the commodity, including, as I have said, 50 of the greatest manufacturing concerns in my State, which buy this material, are urging that the protective-tariff principle shall be applied to it. How does the Senator answer that argument?

Mr. ODDIE. I will state, Mr. President, to my friend from Ohio that only one concern appeared before the Finance Committee and asked for a duty on cyanide, and that it has been carrying on a very extensive propaganda all over the United States. I have seen a number of letters from splendid and responsible concerns in which practically the identical language is used. If the Senator will examine a number of the letters he will see that in many of them the same phrases occur; and I am firmly of the opinion that the request has gone out from the Roessler & Hasslacher Chemical Co. to very many concerns in the United States.

Mr. WILLIS. I am, of course, familiar with the methods which are used to induce the writing of letters, and all that sort of thing, but here is what strikes me as being peculiar: The concerns which write to me—and the Senator recognizes that they are great business concerns—and are known all over the country——

Mr. ODDIE. Undoubtedly they are.

Mr. WILLIS. Can not be influenced by mere child's play; yet they write me and say that this material is being sold at a reasonable price, and that they think the industry is entitled to protection the same as is any other American industry. I care nothing about the Roessler & Hasslacher Chemical Co.; I never heard of them until this question arose; but I am interested in the viewpoint of these concerns in Ohio which are asking for a reasonable protective duty upon this material.

Mr. ODDIE. I will say that I believe the concerns referred to by the Senator from Ohio are reputable and are perfectly honest in their requests; they are perfectly honest also in their belief; but I have studied this matter very carefully, and I think I may venture to say that those who are writing in advocacy of a duty on cyanide, as indicated by the Senator from Ohio, are probably not aware of the fact that cyanide has been on the free list for a number of years. Since 1917 the American Cyanamid Co., an American company, has been operating on the Canadian side and using raw materials produced in America. This company has been furnishing cyanide to this market in competition with the Roessler-Hasslacher Co. I know that last year in my State contracts were made with the American Cyanamid Co. at about 4 cents a pound lower than the Roessler-Hasslacher Co. asked, the latter company having advanced their price very materially from 1920 to 1921. So our people were forced to make contracts with the American company in Canada.

I will state emphatically that the gold-mining industry, which has been suffering so severely since the war, needs free cyanide. A duty on cyanide will mean that many properties will have to go out of business. I am a thorough believer in the principle of protection. The gold-mining industry needs protection as no other industry needs it, because since the war it has had to bear the full burden of high operating costs without any compensating increase in price. Operating costs are still over 50 per cent higher than in 1915 and the industry can neither absorb a duty on cyanide nor pass it along to the consumer.

Mr. President, I should like to say, further, that I have a high regard for my friends, the Senators from New York and from

New Jersey. I admire the splendid fight they have made for this industry located in their respective States, but I ask them to study carefully the facts I have submitted, and I think if they will examine them they will see the question in a somewhat different light and realize its broad significance to the financial reconstruction of the world and its importance as a national issue. I realize also the thorough work which has been done by the Finance Committee in formulating this tariff bill. They have been almost persecuted by details and conflicting interests. I hope that this question will be reconsidered carefully by the committee and the Senate in the light of my presentation. I am sure that free cyanide will not only save the gold-mining industry but invigorate our whole financial structure.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its session to-day it shall take a recess until to-morrow at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, May 5, 1922.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O God, Thy touch is full of health and Thy heart is full of mercy. They move over the battle fields of life, guiding us along in our silent hurry. We thank Thee for these unbroken providences, which deepen the quiet that flows beneath the turbulent stream of life. O lead us behind the vision of things, setting our lives in a constantly richer soil. Help us more and more to be on earth what we hope to be hereafter. May all our homes be under the curtain of Thy refuge. Let the lights of heaven shine upon them. Bless them with the chair of peace, the cot of ease, the words of wisdom, and with the bonds of undying love. In Thy name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

PENSIONS.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 11427, an omnibus pension bill, and ask unanimous consent that it may be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the general pension bill, H. R. 11427, be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to make this inquiry of the majority leader. My understanding was that the militia pension bill, which was unanimously reported by our committee some time ago, would be brought up to-day. If it so happens that the situation is such on account of the gentleman's program as floor leader that that can not be done to-day, I would like to inquire of him when we can bring the bill up without interfering with this program. Of course, I realize that there is great responsibility resting on the majority leader, and I do not want to interfere with that in any way, but there are many of us interested in this other bill. The measure has been pending in Congress for many years. The old militia soldiers are rapidly dying, and if we are going to do anything for them I think the time has arrived when it should be done without further delay. The bill is privileged under the rules, but I want cooperation and the help of the gentleman.

Mr. MONDELL. There is a considerable amount of public business that is crowding at this time and should be disposed of immediately. I would very much prefer to take that bill up a little later. It is not necessary to take it up on Friday; in fact, it can not be taken up. It should go to a convenient season a little later on.

Mr. LANGLEY. If I may be permitted further, does the gentleman think we might be able to find room for it some time next week?

Mr. MONDELL. I think that is altogether possible.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I very much doubt that.

Mr. LANGLEY. I am very glad to hear that assurance from the gentleman from Wyoming. With the understanding that that is likely, I will not press the matter further to-day, and I withdraw the reservation of the right to object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FULLER]?

There was no objection.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the formal committee amendments may be submitted en bloc after the reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the committee amendments may be submitted en bloc after the reading of the bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk will report the bill.

APPOINTMENT OF JUDGES.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I submit a privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kansas submits a privileged report from the Committee on Rules which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 329.

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 9103, with Senate amendments thereto, disagree to the Senate amendments, and request a conference with the Senate, which motion shall be agreed to without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, the House passed a bill creating some additional judges. The Senate, in the consideration of the bill, struck out all after the enacting clause and passed a bill of different import. The difference between the provision of the House and the Senate bills is material, but such as is usually worked out in conference between the conferees representing the House and the Senate. It is the desire of the majority members of the Committee on the Judiciary that the bill be sent to conference.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Several days ago I introduced a resolution asking for the appointment of a committee for the purpose of investigating the Veterans' Bureau——

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I can not yield now for an interruption of that kind.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. I have been trying to get action on that resolution, and desire information as to progress.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I did not yield for that purpose.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] to be disposed of as he may direct.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, the desire of quite a number of those who have given attention to this bill creating new judges was that it should go to the Committee on the Judiciary and be there considered. As the gentleman from Kansas has stated, the Senate has changed the character of the bill, changed its fundamental character in many respects, and what we had desired was that it should go to the Committee on the Judiciary and be there again considered. When it goes to conference we have no idea what will occur. That is the position, which is not a political position; no politics occurs in regard to a judge's bill, or ought not to.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. I believe the gentleman from Tennessee is a member of the Committee on Rules. I interrupted the chairman of the Committee on Rules a moment ago for the purpose of obtaining information from him regarding the probability of action upon a resolution that I introduced several days ago seeking the appointment of a committee for the purpose of investigating the Veterans' Bureau. Perhaps the gentleman can give some information about it. You are reporting out many rules from that committee, are you not?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The committee is reporting out a good many, but you do not mean that we Democrats, innocent bystanders, are? [Laughter.]

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Several days ago I spoke to the gentleman from Tennessee concerning the resolution, and he said he would do what he could to get action on it. I have also written to the chairman of the committee, but for some reason—the chairman seems so busy—he does not have time to reply to the letters I write. I thought he might have time to answer orally.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I took the advice of Seth Thomas. I never answer a letter when I can answer it in person. [Laughter.]

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. The trouble with the gentleman from Kansas is that he neither answers orally or by writing. [Laughter.] I trust the gentleman from Tennessee can give me some information as to what the probabilities are for receiving action through the committee on the rule.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman surely will not hold Democrats responsible for the failure of Republicans to do what he wants done?

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. I certainly would not.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, may I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Some time ago I introduced a resolution proposing an investigation of what I consider a very outrageous transaction, the removal summarily of the responsible chiefs of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, which would involve an inquiry into the character of the persons who have been placed in the positions from which the occupants were removed. Subsequently I addressed a very respectful letter to the chairman of the Committee on Rules, asking when the resolution would be considered, to which I have received no reply, either in writing or personally.

My friend from Kansas is in a most Sphinxlike attitude. I believe the Tennyson line says that even the Sphinx becomes vocal when "smitten by the morning sun." But nothing persuades the gentleman from Kansas to become vocal about any resolution which a Democrat introduces. I would like to ask my friend whether he has ever heard the gentleman from Kansas or any of the members of the majority on that committee mention that resolution or mention the very important resolution introduced by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LARSEN]?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I will yield to the gentleman from Kansas. [Laughter.]

Mr. SNELL. He did not ask you to yield to him.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I am very grateful to my friend from Tennessee, and I thank him for returning the time, but I have time at my disposal that I shall use later on.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Well, you will answer the question in your own time?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Now, shall I be the medium for any other inquiries? [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS].

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. May I ask the Chair how much time is left from the various matters that have been submitted?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has 12 minutes.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, as has been said by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], the bill which comes back to the House is very materially different from the bill which received the indorsement of the Judiciary Committee of the House and was approved by the House. This bill is what I assume may be designated, and properly designated, as an omnibus judgeship bill. It may be said to the credit of the American Congress that in its history there have been very few bills of this sort.

It will not be possible in the brief time at my disposal to discuss in detail the important differences between the Senate bill and the House bill; but, illustrative of the differences, I direct the attention of the House to the fact that with regard to five districts in the United States the legislation which comes from the Senate is entirely different from the legislation which came from the House. Two judgeships provided by the House were stricken out by the Senate and three additional and different judgeships incorporated by the Senate.

When those changes are measured proportionately with reference to this bill they may not seem important, but when Members of the House consider the proposition of dealing primarily and originally with five independent and distinct judicial districts of the United States they must realize that they have a matter before them so important that in the first instance at least the House would not undertake to pass upon it without having in advance the benefit of independent investigation and deliberation on the part of its agent, its Committee on the Judiciary of the House.

If this bill does not go to the Committee on the Judiciary of the House, when you come finally to pass upon the conference report you must do it without the benefit and the persuasive force of a deliberate determination with reference to those five districts on the part of the Committee on the Judiciary of the House.

I have stated already to the gentlemen of the House that this difference that I cite is merely by way of illustration and not by way of discussion of the differences. There are differences which are fundamental between the bill of the House and the bill of the Senate; differences which have to do with the governing of the whole judicial machinery of the United States and in the most important way. But there is another reason, gentlemen of the House. It may be a reason which will present itself to the House as a belated reason perhaps, but I again direct the attention of the House to the fact with regard to this tremendously important bill that the Committee on the Judiciary of the House in presenting this bill to the House was not able to support it by a statement that this bill rested upon an independent investigation by the Committee on the Judiciary of the House or represented its deliberate judgment, based upon a knowledge of the facts.

Now, briefly, this is the history of this legislation: We had heard much with reference to the congested condition in a number of the districts of the United States. That matter had been discussed by Members of the House and discussed informally by members of the Committee on the Judiciary of the House, and as a result of that discussion the matter was taken up by a special committee from the House, a subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee, with the Attorney General. From that time on, save for the very beneficial work of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], the chairman of the committee, and perhaps another gentleman or two, the Committee on the Judiciary of the House lost contact with that proposed legislation until it came back in the form of a bill, resting then upon an investigation conducted by a special committee named by the Attorney General of the United States, of which special committee the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States was the presiding officer.

When that bill had been reported out and came before the House—I say it with due respect to the gentlemen who constitute that committee—there was not one single member of the committee who could call the roll of these districts for which these judges were provided, and state to the House that upon any investigation conducted by the House, or any information which had come to the membership of that committee, it was his solemn judgment based upon a knowledge of the facts that a judge ought to be provided for each of the districts, as provided in the bill. Now, when we consider the debate in the Senate and the debate on the floor of this House we must realize that we are placed in the position of having passed this tremendous bill, dealing with the Federal judiciary, a bill not fashioned by the Members of Congress upon their individual responsibility, based upon their independent knowledge, but a bill based upon an investigation conducted by the Attorney General and the members of the Federal judiciary, providing for the appointment of 23 judges at one time. I believe that is the number. I say that this bill ought to go to the Judiciary Committee of the House. Even though this reason may now be considered by the House, if it will, late in the proceedings on this bill, this House ought to take advantage of the opportunity which this situation presents, and legislate with regard to this important matter in a regular and orderly way. In the Senate it was developed that in the first circuit, with three judges, they were able to dispose of, and did dispose of, only 57 cases in the course of a year. Yet we are providing district judges for that same circuit. When the question was asked on the floor of the Senate, where opportunity is afforded for deliberation, when it was asked there why it was that these judges, who in the course of a year decided only 57 cases, did not relieve these circuit judges for which we were providing district judges, not a man on the floor of the Senate could answer the question. That is merely by way of illustration. That shows how in the dark we are putting this tremendous burden upon the Public Treasury, and how we are putting through this omnibus judgeship bill. There ought never to be an omnibus judgeship bill. If it can be avoided this number of judges ought never to be appointed at one time by a Democratic or a Republican President, or a President of any other political party. You, gentlemen, will remember that in the last session of the last administration some bills were presented to this body providing for some of these districts, and to the Senate one nomination of a Democrat, and every one of those cases was held up—even though the facts showed that beyond a doubt some of them were needed for the discharge of the public business—in order that the appointments might be made by a Republican President. Now, I do not mean to say that a Democratic Congress might not have done the same thing, but if it had done the same thing it would not have been the right thing, and the country ought to rebuke that sort of political traffic in Federal judgeships.

How much more time have I, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has two minutes remaining.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman state to the House whether or not, in his judgment, any places provided in the House bill are unnecessary?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Ah, Mr. Speaker, that is the point that I am trying to make. I do not know, and not a man can stand on the floor of this House and say upon his independent judgment that he does know.

Mr. DYER. If the gentleman will yield——

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Gentlemen have their own time. I have only two minutes. I just want to make this further statement. The truth of it is, Mr. Speaker, that the Judiciary Committee of the House are not entirely to blame for this situation. I had the honor, with the distinguished chairman of the Judiciary Committee and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER], of going up to the Attorney General's office. We met the genial Attorney General. He set us down in his nice chairs, and we almost chummed a little bit, and then he sent us on back down here. We thought we were going to be called in about the thing again, but we found out pretty soon that he had taken the whole business and run off with it. Every once in a while I would ask something about it, but it was evident that the Attorney General was doing this whole business. Mr. Speaker, finally we got the bill back, and were advised that we would be told about it, and there we were in the Judiciary Committee room. The way things were fixed up it looked somewhat like the Supreme Court. Of course, we did not have on any robes, but the Attorney General came in down there before us. We were sitting up in that big high place, and he had to address us very deferentially from below. Pretty soon the Chief Justice of the United States himself in his own proper person came before us. Well, of course, we were not robed like members of the Supreme Court. It gave us a sort of insufficiently dressed feeling sitting up there without any robes and the Chief Justice down there telling us about it. He told us we needed these judges. The Attorney General told us we needed them. I am afraid we were just a bit flabbergasted, so we accepted; at least, we were much persuaded by their judgment and a very promiscuous and imposing array of figures furnished—they were somewhat secondhand—by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH]. We have not had a fair shake at this thing. We Democrats voted against reporting the bill out and also voted against it when it came up for passage here. I believe our Republican colleagues on the committee have sort of recovered now, and if you can get this bill back before the Judiciary Committee of the House, I think we can conduct an investigation and report a bill back that we can support with our own judgment based upon our own investigation. I hope the House will send the bill back to the committee. [Applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the most persuasive speech of the very able and genial gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS], I will move the previous question.

Mr. WALSH. Before the gentleman does that will he yield me five minutes?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I withhold the motion and yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the courtesy of the gentleman from Kansas in yielding me five minutes, and I think I ought to make just a few statements, lest the very persuasive eloquence of our friend from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] should sink in and convince people of a few things which I think are not entirely accurate. The fact of the matter is that a number of the judges who are provided for in the House bill had been provided in individual bills which had either been reported and placed upon the calendar or passed upon by the committee and authorized to be reported.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield for an inquiry?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. How many bills for individual judges have been approved by the Judiciary Committee of the House?

Mr. WALSH. I think there were 12.

Mr. MONTAGUE. As many as that?

Mr. WALSH. I believe so.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Approved or introduced?

Mr. WALSH. Twelve had been heard by the subcommittee.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Perhaps I did not express myself accurately. How many individual bills have been favorably reported by the Judiciary Committee of the House?

Mr. WALSH. I think six had been favorably reported, and five or six, as I recall, had been authorized to be reported and were withheld pending the introduction of the omnibus bill.

Now, I happened to have been charged with the duty of sitting as one of the subcommittee that held hearings on individual bills. I recall the conversation we had at the Attorney General's office, and I am very glad indeed if the call at the office of one of the Cabinet officers created such a deep impression on my friend from Texas, and I wish that more of his side of the House would make these calls, because I think it would be very beneficial to them. I understand that the gentleman from Texas is to be suggested as one of the conferees. I am sure his ideas will not be entirely discarded, and I think that he will find that possibly the conferees who will represent this side of the House will be in accord with them. But the bill was not reported without consideration. Consideration was given in each individual instance in the House bill where additional judges were provided, and it was felt that it was unfair to have poor people charged with crime, without means of providing bail, kept in confinement because they could not have a speedy trial, to which they are entitled under the Constitution.

The bill provides for a designation or transfer or assignment of judges from one district to another in order that all the courts may be able to keep business fairly current.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Will the gentleman indicate what investigation was had as to each judgeship provided for in the bill?

Mr. WALSH. We had hearings, Members presented the condition of business in their districts which were affected, and they presented petitions by the members of the bar. We had a report from the Attorney General, and also information secured by the Attorney General by telegraph from each of the 86 Federal districts. They were all considered by the committee.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I will.

Mr. MONTAGUE. To give a concrete instance, does the gentleman recall that these hearings were of the same sort that was accorded to the eastern section of the Commonwealth of Virginia? The Attorney General recommended there should be an additional judge for the eastern district, and the judge for the eastern district reported that there was no necessity for a judge in that district, and that part of the bill was abandoned.

Mr. WALSH. The Attorney General presented no statistics with reference to the eastern district of Virginia.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I think they recommended a judge for that district.

Mr. WALSH. I think the gentleman is in error. He stated that the business in the district was growing in importance and it was the great admiralty section of the east coast; but as between West Virginia and Virginia, if the committee decided to recommend an additional judge, he would recommend the eastern district of Virginia, giving it the preference.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I will.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Is it not a fact that the information before the Judiciary Committee in regard to the condition of the courts was made up largely of figures—the numbers of cases, without any indication as to whether the cases were dead cases, cases that had been long on the docket, or live cases; does not the gentleman remember that when the Chief Justice came before the committee he stated it was not known by him how large a percentage of cases on the docket were dead cases?

Mr. WALSH. I do not recall any such instance. The Chief Justice may have said so; but the information from the Attorney General shows the number of cases begun for the last five years and the number of cases pending in each of these years.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT].

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts a question. The gentleman from Massachusetts said, as I understood him, that there are many poor people in jail who will be relieved by the passage of this bill. Did I understand the gentleman correctly in that regard?

Mr. WALSH. Yes; I will state that in many districts the criminal business is so large and there are so many cases pending that people who are not able to furnish bond are compelled to wait their turn because the judges are not able to hear cases.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I understood the Attorney General was very much interested in keeping poor people out of jail. [Laughter.]

Mr. WALSH. Poor people?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes. Now, I want to ask the gentleman this question: If there was any particular thing in the discussion at any time about keeping some poor people out of a judgeship, or anything of that sort?

Mr. WALSH. No; not to me. Perhaps the gentleman from Texas may have had some such conversation. I do recall one instance where a certain person was kept out of a judgeship, and I speak only personally when I say that I would have been very glad if the other branch could have confirmed the nomination for judge in the State of Tennessee of a certain distinguished Democrat who I know would have adorned the bench, and I would be glad to see him receive one of the appointments under this bill.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. My understanding is that it was felt that it would be very undesirable to do that, because it was thought that the gentleman to whom he refers would be needed here to support the present administration. [Laughter.]

Mr. WALSH. The person who got that idea was somewhat bewildered. [Laughter.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee) there were—ayes 56, noes 34.

So the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 9103, providing for the appointment of additional district judges for certain courts, and so forth, with Senate amendments thereto, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motiton of the gentleman from Minnesota to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 9103, disagree to the Senate amendments, and request a conference.

The motion was agreed to.

The Speaker appointed the following conferees: Mr. VOLSTEAD, Mr. WALSH, and Mr. SUMNERS of Texas.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had concurred in the amendments of the House of Representatives to bills of the following titles:

S. 1813. An act for the relief of the owner of the steamer Mayflower;

S. 1814. An act for the relief of the owner of the steam lighter Cornelia; and

S. 1817. An act for the relief of the owners of the schooner Horatio G. Foss.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION AND BILL SIGNED.

Mr. RICKETTS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution and bill of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. J. Res. 268. Joint resolution extending the operation of the immigration act of May 19, 1921; and

H. R. 10730. An act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes.

FISCAL AFFAIRS OF THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10442, to amend an act entitled "An act to declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands, and to provide a more autonomous government for these islands," approved August 29, 1916, as amended by an act to amend said act approved July 21, 1921.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10442, with Mr. STAFFORD in the chair.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Tennessee use some of his time?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Box].

Mr. BOX. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, many people who are interested in the immigration problem and believe in restrictive laws have urged that our examination and selection should be made in foreign ports. Steamship lines and opponents of restrictive legislation argue for foreign selection. Their reason for this contention is easily understood, but my main purpose is to explain to those who favor restriction why they can not depend upon such a system. If I am able to state these reasons in their full force I will in so doing explain why those who oppose restriction clamor for something other than rigidly restrictive laws firmly enforced at home.

First, let us understand that the maintenance of embassies and consulates in foreign countries is a matter of diplomatic usage and treaty agreement. We could not maintain an ambassador, a consul, or any kind of an official representative in any foreign country without its agreement. Diplomatic usage sanctions the maintenance of embassies and consulates which promote ends desired by both parties to the arrangement. Their establishment and activities are wholly subject to treaty agreement with foreign powers, or their consent in some form. Their withdrawal may be demanded and enforced by such power at any time.

The scope of the activities of consuls, ministers, and ambassadors is fixed or limited by usage and agreement and can be extended only by such consent. The selection of would-be immigrants is not one of the usual functions performed by consuls or diplomatic representatives. The treaties under which such representatives are maintained do not authorize the establishment or maintenance of immigration stations of any kind, nor the performance of any of their functions, on foreign soil. Neither does diplomatic usage sanction it. These officers and the performance of these functions within the territory of a foreign sovereignty is not possible unless such countries would give their consent.

The motives which prompt them to consent to the establishment and maintenance of consulates and embassies is mutual commercial and diplomatic interest. But this mutuality of interest does not exist as to immigration. Japan, China, England, Spain, Italy, Poland, and other Old World countries usually want a place to which they can send their surplus or undesirable population. Our immigration laws are designed to prevent their unloading this surplus and burdensome population on us. We want to prevent the very thing they want to do. Instead of mutuality of interest there is conflict. Generally speaking, they will not go beyond the limits of diplomatic usage to agree with us upon our establishment upon their soil of agencies by which we can accomplish that which it is their desire to prevent. This is not merely natural and logical; it is actual.

The Immigration Commission created by the act of Congress of February 20, 1907, consisting of nine members, three of whom were appointed by President Roosevelt, three by the Vice President, and three by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, were charged with the duty of making a full investigation of the whole subject of immigration. It was given full authority and provided ample means to travel either in the United States or in any foreign country and otherwise to carry on its investigation. Its membership consisted of such men as Senator Dillingham, Senator Lodge, Senator McLaurin, and Hon. John L. Burnett, Prof. Jeremiah W. Jenks, and other men of legislative experience, great learning, and familiarity with immigration problems and legislation.

Among the questions which it studied and upon which it reported was the one now under discussion. On pages 26 and 27 the commission discussed this problem. I ask to have the Clerk read what it said on the point.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

> It has been strongly urged by immigration officials and other students of the question that the embarkation at foreign ports of persons not admissible to the United States because of their physical condition would be more effectually prevented by a medical inspection by American officers at such ports. This plan was so strongly urged that this Government a few years ago made official inquiry respecting the probable attitude of European Governments toward it. At that time one or two Governments expressed a willingness to permit such an inspection by American officials; others made indefinite replies to the inquiry, while others were positively opposed. No attempt was thereafter made to further the plan. After an investigation by the commission of the situation at all the principal ports of Europe it is clear that even were its consummation possible such an arrangement would not materially improve conditions. * * *
> It has been suggested that some system ought to be devised by which intending emigrants could be physically examined as to their admissibility to the United States before leaving their homes for ports of embarkation. While an effective arrangement of that nature would be of great benefit to the many thousands annually who are turned back at foreign ports of embarkation, it is a matter over which our Government has no jurisdiction. (Reports of the Immigration Commission, Vol. I, pp. 26–27, presented December 5, 1910.)

Mr. BOX. The House Committee on Immigration and Naturalization has given much consideration to this subject, continuing its investigation and study from time to time. In its report to the Sixty-seventh Congress (No. 710) accompanying House Joint Resolution No. 268, the following appears, which I desire to have read from the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

OBJECTIONS TO EXAMINATIONS OVERSEAS.

> The hearings of the committee have covered all phases of the subject. Considerable time was spent in attempting to develop a plan of examination of immigrants at ports of embarkation, but these efforts were met with a letter from the Secretary of State as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, December 28, 1921.

MY DEAR MR. JOHNSON: I inclose copy of a memorandum of September 15 from the chargé d'affaires ad interim of Italy, in which he discusses certain bills which have been introduced in Congress providing for the examination in American consulates of aliens desiring to emigrate to the United States.

Informal objections to the proposed legislation have been made by representatives of other countries, and I shall endeavor to keep you informed as to any further objections which may be received by this department from representatives of interested foreign countries.

As this matter touches upon the foreign relations of the United States, I would ask that you be so kind as to keep me informed concerning the progress of the proposed legislation.

I am, my dear Mr. JOHNSON, sincerely yours,

CHARLES E. HUGHES.

MEMORANDUM FROM ROYAL ITALIAN EMBASSY.

The royal chargé d'affaires for Italy presents his compliments to his excellency the Secretary of State and has the honor of bringing the following to his attention:

During the special session of this Congress there have been presented bills—one in the Senate and two in the House of Representatives—by the terms of which, among other provisions, it is proposed to have United States medical and immigration officials in the United States consulates, or elsewhere, to exercise functions not purely informative in character but of direct action in the medical examination and definite selection of the emigrants, connecting such functions with that of the granting of the consular visé to passports.

Such action, even if exercised in the interior of the consulate offices, would go beyond the usual consular functions recognized by treaties and pertaining, as it does, to interests connected with emigration whose regulation is reserved to the sovereignty of each State could not be considered as conforming with either treaty or law on emigration in Italy.

It is true that this is a matter relating merely to proposed legislation; nevertheless, the intense desire to avoid later any possible motive for discussion between our two countries inspires the friendly intention of the present recommendation, especially since it has been stated to the Secretary of State that the Italian Government would be most willing to meet the wishes of the United States in conforming the action of its emigratory services so as to satisfy the reasonable requirements of the American regulations if both can be made the subject of a specific agreement beforehand, as already suggested.

The embassy would certainly have hesitated to approach the Secretary of State on this matter were it not that the Secretary of Labor, in recommending the above-quoted bills according to public press statements, had not made it felt that the measures before Congress probably expressed views not contradictory to those entertained by the United States Government, whereupon any assurance on the subject, if possible, on the part of the Department of State, so that in time it be forwarded to the Italian Government, would be highly appreciated by the Italian Embassy.

WASHINGTON, D. C., September 15, 1921.

The committee in this connection was reminded that the Immigration Commission of Congress, after exhaustive investigation, dropped the matter of inspection at foreign ports. (See p. 26, vol. 1, Abstracts and Reports of the Immigration Commission, 1911.)

Mr. BOX. It will be noted that Mr. Secretary Hughes, in the second paragraph of his letter to Chairman JOHNSON, informs him that "informal objections to the proposed legislation have been made by other countries," which is in line with the statement made by the Immigration Commission in the quotation given above. It must not be understood that Italy is the only country making these objections. The country which does not make them is an exception.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOX. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. If the gentleman will permit me to say so, as chairman of the present House Committee on Immigration and Naturalization I congratulate the membership on the work the gentleman from Texas has done on the committee and the study which he has given to this particular phase of the matter. I would suggest that he do not omit from his present discussion the fact that other Governments are at this time making protests quite similar to the one that he has just read from the Italian Government, against proposed provisions in the so-called shipping bill, clauses of which would authorize investigation overseas. I am told that these present protests against that new legislation, now being considered before another committee, are much stronger than have been made heretofore.

Mr. BOX. I thank the gentleman for his suggestion, because it helps to present the problem which I want the House to see.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. And, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, in that connection I would say that, as I recall now our hearings on the passport control bill, it developed that practically all of the foreign countries objected to the setting up in their countries of agencies for the investigation and examination of immigrants.

Mr. BOX. I thank the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY]. The viewpoint of these people on our immigration policies is very different from ours.

America is the last country where there is room and opportunity. They nearly all want to get rid of their surplus population. That is and has been the cause of trouble. We have the land to which they want to come. Nations and races have struggled for a place in which to exist and enlarge since before the years covered by human history. We are trying to maintain a place here for us and our children to which the crowded-out, hungry, unhappy millions of the Old World are struggling to come. Our right to guard it must not be impaired. That would be perilous. It would be ruinous. If we make treaties at all we will have to make them on terms satisfactory to the people who want to unload their surplus population on America. The regulation and control of this world-wide movement toward America must be retained unimpaired by Congress.

I invite special attention to the polite, diplomatic phraseology used by the representatives of the Italian Government in which it says that the Government of Italy would be "most willing to meet the wishes of the United States in conforming the action of its emigratory services so as to satisfy the reasonable requirements of the American regulations if both can be made the subject of a specific agreement beforehand, as already suggested." Note the requirement that our regulations must be made the subject of a specific agreement with Italy beforehand. This makes it plain that any effort to bargain with foreign powers about foreign inspection and selection, if inaugurated, would at once place them in a position to claim a voice in the making of our immigration regulations. That is the very thing that America must not do. That is the very thing that the friends of restriction do not want. Even the opponents of restriction certainly would not favor the adoption of a policy by which we surrendered our right to deal with the subject in our own way. The right once lost would be hard to regain. The permanent loss of that right would be an irreparable calamity to America.

Very definite conclusions necessarily follow the existence of this situation. Since we can not maintain such agencies in foreign countries without their consent, and such consent has not been and probably can not be obtained, it is vain to depend upon foreign examinations.

If possible and desirable, such examinations would be impracticable because of the expense and other administrative difficulties attendant upon an effort to maintain immigration stations or an immigration inspection force at all the sources of immigration. The immigrants come from 10,000 places—throughout Mexico, Canada, and beyond, for myriads come from those countries and through them. Can we maintain immigration stations or agencies at the door of every would-be immigrant? Such a plan would be like the effort of a farmer, whose field was surrounded by an open range, trying to build inclosures around the live stock on all the range to avoid maintaining a fence around his own field. From Japan, China, India, much of Asia, much of Africa, and from all of Europe men are coming to Mexico and Canada for the purpose of gaining access to the United States. Where would you establish your stations and guard lines against them? At their homes? At a thousand places in Mexico and Canada?

Immigrants come to America on irregular and tramp ships from all the ports of the world. This, and their coming through Canada and Mexico, would force us to maintain our seaport and land frontier stations and to turn back many from them. Establishing foreign stations would merely add a great system of distant stations without eliminating home stations or avoiding the necessity of rejecting great numbers of immigrants at them. If foreign countries would permit it, which we have found they will not do, the plan is impossible. Of course, the only place for our stations and guards is at our own ports and on our own frontiers.

It is urged that if prospective immigrants were inspected and selected abroad, they would be protected from the hardship resulting from their selling their effects and breaking themselves loose from their homes and sources of livelihood, expecting to be admitted to the United States only to find themselves denied admission and be thrown adrift penniless, friendless, and far from home. Unless the stations were located, at prohibitive cost, in hundreds of places, the prospective immigrants could not be selected near their present homes. The establishment of immigration stations in a few great cities on the coasts in Europe, Asia, and Africa would not meet this difficulty. These seaports are hundreds of miles from the present homes of most of the immigrants and in countries foreign and strange to them. They would have to go in families hundreds of miles, often across national boundaries, necessitating passports, and a great part of the travel, expense, and difficulty which they now meet.

The average immigrant can not, without selling all, carry his family from the center of Europe to the seacoast for examination. If he could, he would not know how long it would require him to return to his home with his family to sell out and return to the immigration station on the coast. The uncertainty, delay, expense, and other difficulties of such a course would forbid its adoption by the immigrant, who usually has little or nothing. He sells all, and even under the proposed plan would sell all and break up completely, before leaving his old home to go to the place of inspection and embarkation. The risk and loss of this breaking up would have to be incurred under any system except one that sent the inspector to the prospective immigrant at or near his present home, which is manifestly impossible.

The steamship companies, relatives, and other opponents of restriction are all talking much of regulating immigration by treaty agreements. I have shown that this plan of foreign inspection depends upon treaty agreements. I suspect that their agitation for foreign inspection is prompted by the desire to have the control of immigration away from Congress and give it to the treaty-making power. It is certain that the adoption of the system of foreign inspection would have that very effect. Treaties establishing such a system, if made at all, could be made only upon such conditions as were satisfactory to foreign Governments, so that the whole system of immigration control would pass to the treaty-making power. Treaties made on the subject would become the supreme law of the land. Immigration regulation would pass to the President as the treaty-making power, subject to the ratification or the rejection of the Senate. The House would lose all voice in this question of the greatest importance to the people, who are most directly and truly represented in the House, and whose desires on this subject they have so much more frequently and truly voiced.

I have stated other vital reasons why we must never let the control of immigration become a matter of treaty making. For that involves the surrender by us of our present sole right and power to regulate it. Confessedly, we now have this right and power regardless of the wishes of foreign countries. When immigration control is passed to the treaty-making power we will have surrendered this right and consented that we must consult foreign countries in fixing our immigration regulations. Foreign countries such as Germany, Japan, Italy, Poland, and Spain want to unload their unfortunate, starving surplus population on America. When through the surrender of our sovereign right to control it we agree to make it subject to the approval of foreign countries, they get the right to reject our plan for dealing with it. We will thereby become helpless to prevent their hungry and wretched millions from coming to America at will. Our complete and overwhelming ruin would follow inevitably and soon.

Moreover, our experience as to the attitude of our Presidents toward this problem should warn us of the great danger of passing absolute or chief control of it to him.

The President's constant contact with delicate and difficult questions of our foreign relations and the necessity of maintaining cordial diplomatic relations with foreign countries expose him and his advisors and agencies to the constant tendency toward too great liberality in immigration regulations.

Our own people now almost uniformly confess that we have in the past been liberal to the point of ruinous looseness in our immigration policies, but even such restrictive measures as have been adopted in the past have nearly all been enacted in the face of Executive opposition. Nearly every step forward in the policy of restriction has been taken by overstepping the President's veto of restrictive laws.

In 1879 President Hayes vetoed the first Chinese-exclusion act (2 l. C. R. 580). In 1882 President Arthur vetoed an act suspending Chinese immigration for a period of 20 years (2 l. C. R. 581). On March 3, 1897, President Cleveland vetoed an immigration act excluding illiterates (2 l. C. R. 573). President Taft vetoed an immigration bill in 1913 containing a restriction against the admission of illiterates (p. 101, Rec., special sess., 59th Cong.). In 1917 President Wilson vetoed an act excluding illiterates, but Congress passed it over his veto.

In 1868 the Burlingame treaty between the United States and China declared it to be the inalienable right of men to migrate and emigrate at will. California had then been, for 15 years, alarmed and in trouble on account of the coming of great numbers of Chinese. The California Legislature had passed laws in efforts to protect the State. Pacific coast cities had passed ordinances for the same purpose. Congress itself, in 1862, had taken note of the degradation and slavery of Chinese coolie laborers, and had forbidden American ships to transport them. This was seven years before the Burlingame treaty was made by the President and ratified by the Senate, declaring the right of such people to migrate to the United States to be "inalienable." So aptly did the treaty-making power deal with the problem in that instance.

Conditions in California and on the Pacific coast were then and soon afterwards so bad that, in 1872, California was pleading with Congress for the exclusion of the Chinese; that is, for the deprivation of the "inalienable right" of Chinese to come to America in tens or even hundreds of millions.

A congressional committee was sent to California, where it found conditions very bad. In 1879 Congress passed what was practically a Chinese exclusion act and undertook to abrogate the obnoxious sections of the Burlingame treaty of 1868.

Here another unfortunate incident to immigration regulation by treaty developed.

President Hayes vetoed the exclusion act, giving as one reason his contention that Congress had no right to abrogate a treaty. His action illustrated the fact that the President can nullify an exclusion act of Congress passed by any majority less than two-thirds, and that Congress has no power to relieve the country of a treaty so dangerous as was that one by any majority less than two-thirds of both branches. President Hayes claimed that Congress had no power to abrogate a treaty at all.

The President can make such a treaty with the approval of two-thirds of one branch of Congress.

A new treaty was made by the United States and China in 1880, in which China succeeded in limiting the freedom of the United States to deal with Chinese immigration in its own way. This treaty stipulated that the United States might limit or suspend the coming of laborers only and prohibited the United States to forbid general Chinese immigration.

In 1880 Congress passed an act suspending Chinese immigration for 20 years. President Arthur vetoed the act, chiefly on the ground that a 20-year suspension of Chinese immigration was not "reasonable" within the meaning of that term in the clause of our treaty with China permitting the United States to limit or suspend the coming of laborers in such a manner and to such extent as "shall be reasonable."

It was soon found that this immigration treaty was unwise, and the United States asked China to agree to its abrogation. She objected and delayed until Congress passed a drastic Chinese exclusion law, from which the President withheld his approval until he became convinced that China would not enter a new treaty abrogating the treaty of 1880, of which the United States was now anxious to be rid.

President Roosevelt made an agreement, which he insisted on having treated as valid and binding, as being supreme law, without even consulting the Senate about it. He called it a "treaty."

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOX. I will.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Is there, or is there not, some embarrassment at this time due to the fact that an agreement exists between this country and another nation in respect to immigration, and is not that a fact that has impeded the committee in bringing in permanent legislation on this subject?

Mr. BOX. I will answer the gentleman first by saying it presents a very knotty problem which will nevertheless have to be solved.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman allow me to answer?

Mr. BOX. Let me dispose of this and then I will be glad to yield. I doubt, if I may be permitted to say so, whether the gentleman's agreement made by President Roosevelt, to which the gentleman evidently refers, has any force or has ever had any force that America ought to recognize. To say that the President can by some secret understanding hidden in his bosom or by some written memorandum hidden in the archives of the Department of State, never submitted to the Senate, establish a law, a supreme law of the land binding on the legislatures of States, binding on this body and the whole country would be most extraordinary. That is the construction given to the gentleman's agreement. President Roosevelt, who made it, based his action on the facts as he saw them then. He would unquestionably say now that it did not work properly. I ask that in my time a statement by President Roosevelt in his memoirs on this subject be read by the Clerk.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

ROOSEVELT ON THE GENTLEMEN'S AGREEMENT.

After a good deal of discussion, we came to an entirely satisfactory conclusion. The obnoxious school legislation was abandoned, and I secured an arrangement with Japan under which the Japanese themselves prevented any emigration to our country of their laboring people, it being distinctly understood that if there was such emigration the United States would at once pass an exclusion law. It was, of course, infinitely better that the Japanese should stop their own people from coming rather than we should have to stop them, but it was necessary for us to hold this power in reserve.

* * * * * * *

Unfortunately, after I left office, a most mistaken and ill-advised policy was pursued toward Japan, combining irritation and inefficiency, which culminated in a treaty under which we surrendered this important and necessary right. It was alleged in excuse that the treaty provided for its own abrogation; but, of course, it is infinitely better to have a treaty under which the power to exercise a necessary right is explicitly retained rather than a treaty so drawn that recourse must be had to the extreme step of abrogating if it ever becomes necessary to exercise the right in question. (Theodore Roosevelt; An Autobiography, p. 414.)

Mr. BOX. The facts are now plain that the Japanese did settle in mass in California, and the California people know it, and we can say as much as we please about their not being there; but the things we can proclaim in this House do not change the facts as they exist, and the capable, hard-headed people of California know the facts. So they have come. He said that if these terms were not met that the country would be free to legislate on the subject and that it would be our duty to do it. He said himself that the terms on which the President met the situation and on which California relied and acted have been changed by subsequent treaty made by President Taft in 1911. The original agreement was evidently different from the arrangement now in force, because it was said to be designed to prevent exactly what has occurred. I quote from President Roosevelt's letter to Speaker Stanley of the lower house of the California Legislature under date of February 8, 1909. (Autobiography, pp. 416–417.) Note that President Roosevelt called this a "treaty":

I trust there will be no misunderstanding of the Federal Government's attitude. We are zealously endeavoring to guard the interests of California and of the entire West in accordance with the desires of our western people. By friendly agreement with Japan we are now carrying out a policy which, while meeting the interests and desires of the Pacific slope, is yet compatible not merely with mutual self-respect, but with mutual esteem and admiration between the Americans and the Japanese.

The Japanese Government is loyally and in good faith doing its part to carry out this policy precisely as the American Government is doing. The policy aims at mutuality of obligation and harmony.

In accordance with it the purpose is that the Japanese shall come here exactly as Americans go to Japan, which is in effect that travelers, students, persons engaged in international business, men who sojourn for pleasure or study, and the like, shall have the freest access from one country to the other, and shall be sure of the best treatment, but that there shall be no settlement en masse by the people of either country in the other.

During the last six months under this policy more Japanese have left the country than have come in, and the total number in the United States has diminished by over 2,000. These figures are absolutely accurate, and need not be impeached. In other words, if the present policy is consistently followed, and works as well in the future as it is now working all difficulties and causes for friction will disappear, while at the same time each nation will retain its self-respect and the good will of the other.

But such a bill as this school bill accomplishes literally nothing whatever in the line of the object aimed at, and gives just cause for irritation; while in addition the United States Government would be obliged immediately to take action in the Federal courts to test such legislation, as we hold it to be clearly a violation of the treaty.

On this point I refer you to the numerous decisions of the United States Supreme Court in regard to State laws which violate treaty obligations of the United States. The legislation would accomplish nothing beneficial and would certainly cause some mischief, and might cause very grave mischief. In short, the policy of the administration is to combine the maximum of efficiency in achieving the real object which the people of the Pacific slope have at heart with the minimum friction and trouble, while misguided men who advocate such action as this against which I protest are following a policy which combines the very minimum of efficiency with the maximum of insult, and which, while totally failing to achieve any real result for good, yet might accomplish an infinity of harm.

If in the next year or two the action of the Federal Government fails to achieve what it is now achieving, then through the further action of the President and Congress it can be made entirely efficient.

I am sure that the sound judgment of the people of California will support you, Mr. Speaker, in your efforts. Let me repeat, that at present we are actually doing the very thing which the people of California wish to be done, and to upset the arrangement under which this is being done can do no good and may do harm. If in the next year or two the figures of immigration prove that the arrangement which has worked so successfully during the last six months is no longer working successfully, then there would be good ground for grievance and for the reversal by the National Government of its policy. But at present the policy is working well, and until it works badly it would be a grave misfortune to change it; and when changed, it can only be changed effectually by the National Government.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

The conditions which President Roosevelt said would furnish good ground for a different course if they should thereafter come into existence have arisen, and his expectation that the "United States would at once pass an exclusion law" in such event has been disappointed.

The plain truth is, California and the Western States are now getting a bad deal, just as they once before got the worst of it because of complicating agreements in treaties with foreign powers who are bent on placing the children of their races where Americans want theirs to live.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I yield the gentleman five minutes more time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for five additional minutes.

Mr. BOX. This is the result of the operation of the treaty-making power in dealing with this problem. There are other instances; in one case during President Johnson's administration a treaty was made with China which solemnly recited that the people of one nation had an inalienable right to move into any other nation when they saw proper. That applied to 400,000,000 Chinese.

I now call attention to a new proposition, which is made in the interest of the Shipping Board, or of the people who are to buy our ships from the Shipping Board and be subsidized in their operation. It is solemnly proposed in that bill to give the Shipping Board a voice in our immigration policy, when its only possible interest would be to enable it, or the subsidized private purchasers of ships, to get financial returns from the handling of immigration. I have no objection to American ships handling their share of such immigration as comes to the United States. I hope the volume of that business will not be large. I do not want to put the United States, nor any agency belonging to it, where it will be tempted to increase its financial returns by increasing the volume of immigration.

Managers of the Shipping Board apparently know nothing about shipping. The shipping bill which they are sponsoring proves that they know nothing about our immigration laws. The pending shipping bill contains a provision that they can do certain things in handling immigrants "anything in the immigration law of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding." It gives the United States Shipping Board, whose only interest is in financial returns from handling immigrants, a voice in making of the rules and regulations governing immigration, some of which may be made "anything in the immigration law of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding."

Immigration legislation should be handled by Congress, through the agency of its appropriate committees, and by itself. It will be dangerous, indeed, to turn over this important subject to a committee not familiar with its difficult details and to the Shipping Board and others, whose knowledge of the subject is superficial and whose interests are divergent from the great public interest to be served by proper immigration legislation.

The statement just made by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] to the effect that the provisions of the shipping bill relating to immigration have provoked emphatic protests from foreign Governments is not surprising. Orderly legislation can be obtained and the best public interest promoted by having immigration legislation reported by the proper committee. The policies behind it should be prompted by the public interest, and not by the financial gains of Shipping Board vessels or of subsidized American shipping.

Mr. Chairman, I insist that Congress must retain unimpaired its full power to deal with this great problem. It must not be admitted that foreign powers have any right to a voice in dealing with it through a policy of treaty making. Foreign inspection necessarily involves that idea. This great question must not be, wholly or partly, passed to the Shipping Board or to subsidized American vessels to be handled for the purpose of money-making. The present and future welfare of American men and women, of this and future generations, must be the supreme consideration in the mind of all who deal with it. Congress must not lose its supreme control over it. [Applause.]

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KETCHAM].

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, the biennial battle for political control of the House of Representatives is rapidly getting under way if we may judge by the strong political flavor noticeable in debates on the floor or by banquet utterances of leaders of the respective major parties. I realize fully the desperate situation of the minority in settling upon an issue that will create more than passing interest in the country, but I particularly protest against two utterances of Democratic leaders made recently seeking to fasten the blame for the economic depression of the past two years upon the Republican Party. The first was made by the distinguished minority leader in the course of a bitter attack on the majority in the minority report on the adjusted compensation bill. Said he:

Incapable of dealing with the economic situation, they—the Republicans—have directly brought upon the American people the worst depression that ever came upon them.

The second was made by the chairman of the Democratic National Committee at a dinner given in his honor recently by the women members of his organization. Said he:

When the Democrats went out in 1920 we left 100 per cent employment at high wages, farmers thriving with wheat bringing high prices, commerce flourishing, and prosperity on all sides.

These are serious charges, indeed, and coming from such outstanding and responsible leaders of the minority should be fairly met and answered. Naturally, three questions arise in attempting to ascertain where the truth in this whole matter lies:

1. When did the depression begin?
2. To what extent did it go?
3. Where does the blame really lie?

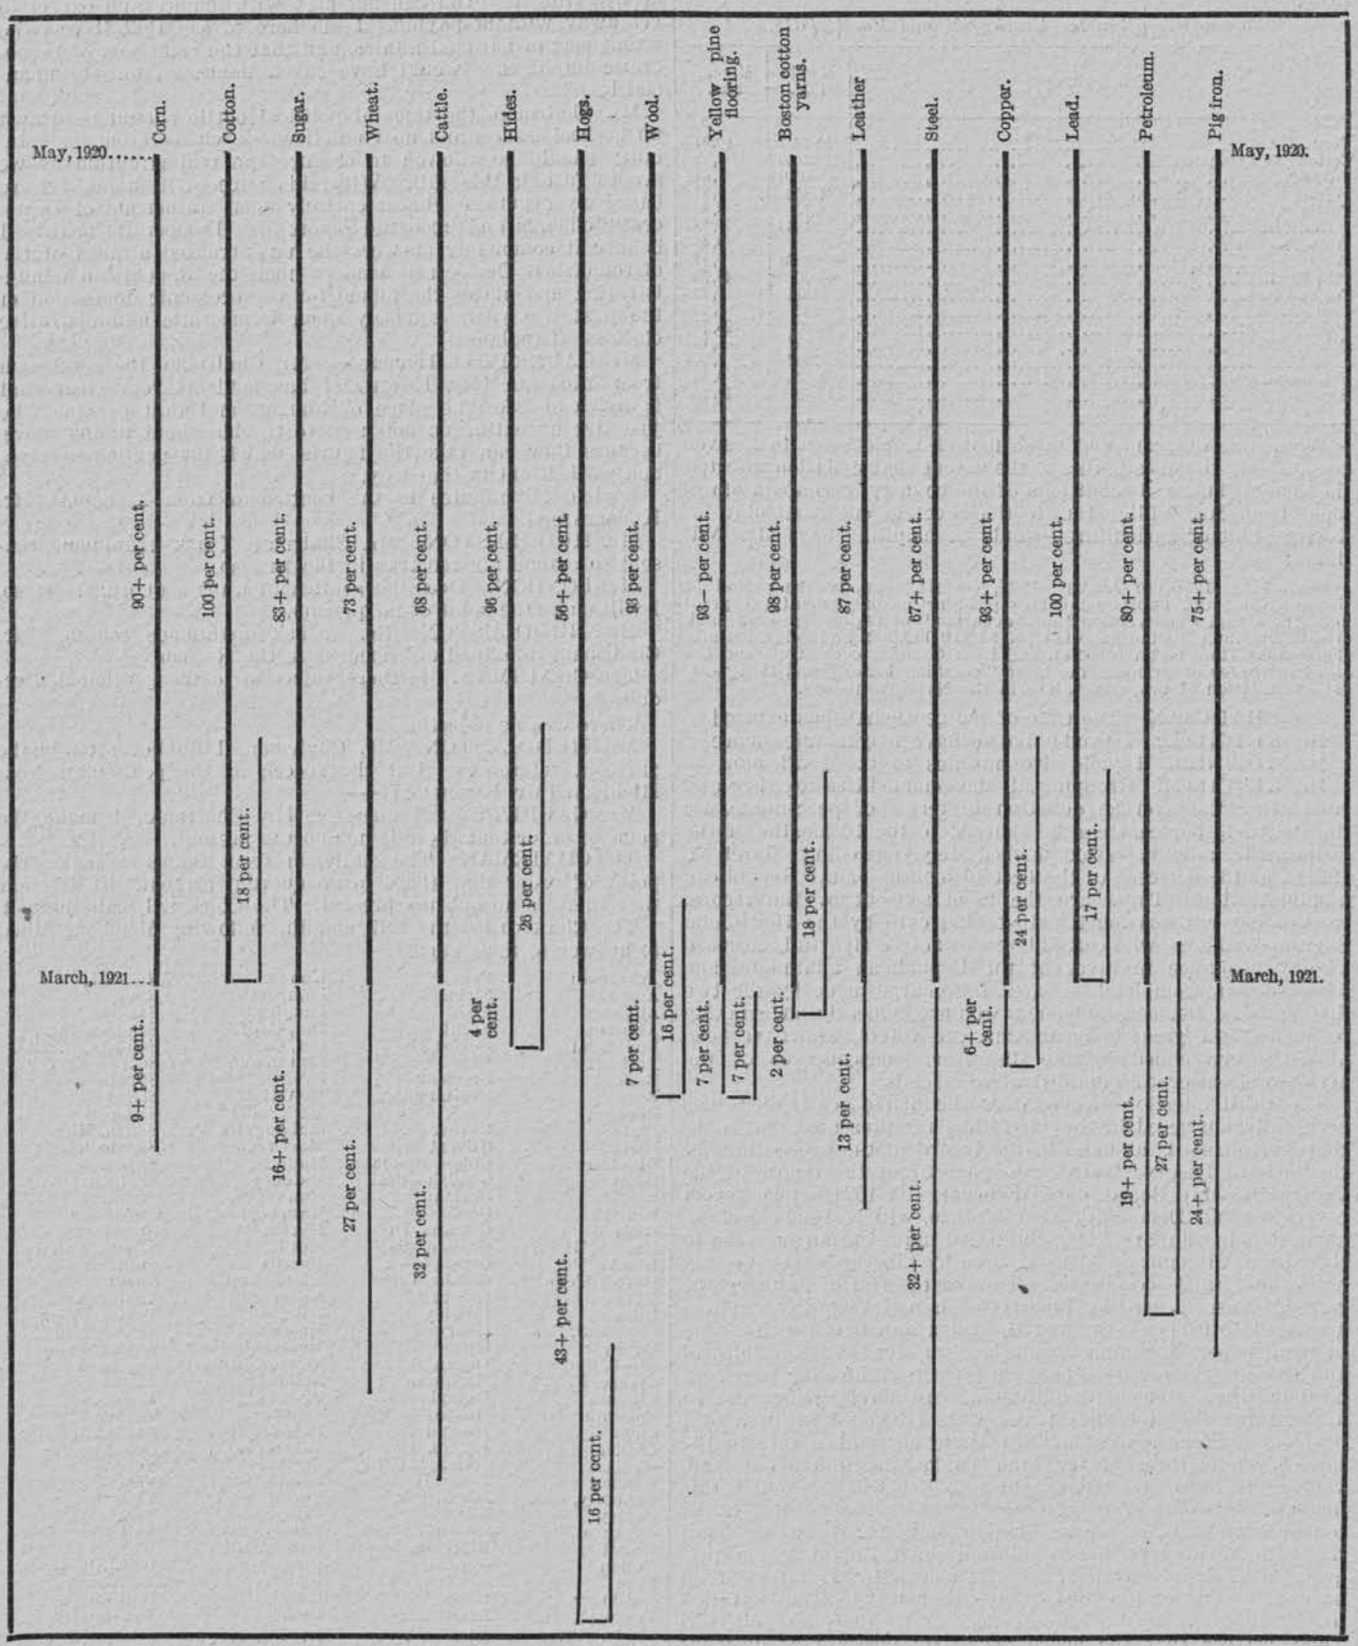
Addressing ourselves to the first of these questions, attention is invited to the price situation in the early months of 1920. From late January to early May there was a general increase in commodity prices. Corn at Chicago averaged $1.47 in January and advanced to $1.98 in May. Wheat advanced from $2.63 in January to $2.97 in May. Cotton maintained its level at $0.40. Cotton yarn advanced from $0.72 to $0.76 per pound. Copper was fairly steady. Beginning with May disquieting reports began to be spread as to the deflation policies to be put into operation by the Federal Reserve Board and the downward slide in prices began to get under way. Corn, which had averaged $1.98 in May, declined to $1.53 in August, and this proved to be but a beginning of the later and more disastrous price drop in this great crop. Cotton dropped from $0.403 in May to $0.338 in August. Wheat dropped from $2.97 in May to $2.47 in August. Wool, which averaged $1.16 in May, dropped to $0.87 in August. Various other commodities such as hides, cotton yarns, and leather barely held their own; in fact, shaded off in price slightly.

It may fairly be said, in view of these facts, that the depression deplored by the distinguished Democratic leaders began in May, 1920, 10 months before the administrative functions of the Government were assumed by the Republicans. The second question, to what extent did the depression go, is exceedingly interesting. I have prepared a diagram (see p. 6413) which shows this matter clearly, and also indicates with equal clearness in which administration most of it occurred. The inspiration for this diagram comes from a poster recently distributed to Members of Congress, entitled "The tragedy of artificial 'deflation,'" which was compiled from official sources by Hon. John Skelton Williams, former Comptroller of the Currency, whose authority, I take it, will not be disputed by the minority because of his holding so prominent a place in the official family of former President Wilson.

Mr. Williams selected 16 commodities for the purpose of his argument. He carried his comparisons from the beginning of the period of deflation, in May, 1920, down to August, 1921. His figures were secured from the Federal Reserve Bulletin, a monthly publication issued by the Federal Reserve Board. This publication carries tables of various kinds of interest to the business world. The particular one used in preparing this diagram is "The average monthly wholesale prices of commodities." For the purposes of comparison I have carried the figures in Mr. Williams's chart down to January, 1922. This, it will be observed, will afford a 10-month period in each administration, which, in my opinion, makes the comparison a fair one. Corn, it will be observed, was quoted at $1.98 in May, 1920. It reached $0.61 in March, 1921, and dropped to the lowest point in the whole 20-month period in October, 1921, when it reached $0.46. It will readily be observed, therefore, that 90 per cent of the depression in corn occurred before the expiration of the term of President Wilson, while 9 per cent plus took place after the Republicans assumed power. A slight increase had taken place in the price of corn before January, 1922. Cotton is exceedingly interesting. In May, 1920, the price on middling New Orleans was $0.403. It reached its low point, curiously enough, in March, 1921, when the quotation was $0.11 per pound. In January, 1922, this price had advanced to $0.165. In terms of percentage, therefore, 100 per cent of the deflation in cotton occurred during the Democratic administration, while an 18 per cent increase, using the same basis of reckoning, has occurred during the Republican administration. Sugar was quoted at $0.2247 in May, 1920. In March, 1921, it had reached $0.078, and finally touched its low point in January, 1922, the price at that time being $0.048. The percentage of deflation in sugar was, therefore, 83 per cent under Democratic administration and 16 per cent under Republican. No. 2 red wheat was quoted at $2.97 in Chicago in May, 1920. It reached $1.67 in March, 1921, and struck its lowest level for the 20-month period in January, 1922. The percentage of deflation for the respective administrations was 73 per cent Democratic and 27 per cent Republican.

Chicago cattle were quoted at $12.60 in May, 1920. They dropped to $9.56 by March, 1921, and reached their low level, at $8.15, in January, 1922. The percentage of deflation here is 68 per cent for the Democratic administration and 32 per cent for the Republican. Hides, packers' heavy native steers, which were quoted at $0.35 in May, 1920, dropped to $0.11 in March, 1921. They reached their low point in April, 1921, which was $0.10, when they advanced to $0.165 in January, 1922. In terms of percentage, therefore, 96 per cent of the deflation in hides occurred during Democratic administration and 4 per cent under Republican administration. An increase of 26 per cent occurred during Republican administration, after the low point was reached. Light hogs sold for $14.75 in Chicago in May, 1920. They were quoted at $10.30 in March, 1921, having gone down to $9.66 in the preceding December. They reached their low point of $6.86 in November of 1921, from which they advanced to $8.15 in January, 1922. In terms of percentage 56 per cent of the deflation in this commodity occurred during the Democratic administration and 43 per cent during the Republican administration. The advance registered under the Republican administration from the low point reached in November is 16 per cent. Ohio grades of wool were quoted at $1.16 in May, 1920. This price dropped to $0.52 in March, 1921, and to the low point of $0.47 in August, 1921. They were quoted at $0.58 in January, 1922. Ninety-three per cent of the deflation occurred during the Democratic administration and 7 per cent during the Republican administration. Using the same basis of reckoning, the recovery under Republican administration is 16 per cent.

The New York price on yellow-pine flooring in May, 1920, was $160 per thousand. The quotation in March of 1921 was $95 and that of January, 1922, was $95.50, while the low point was reached in October of 1921, when the quotation was $90 per thousand. The deflation here in terms of percentage was 93 per cent under the Democratic administration and 7 per cent under the Republican administration. The advance in price from the low point upon the same basis of calculation is 7 per cent. Cotton yarns, Boston, were quoted at $0.76 in May, 1920, $0.24 in March, 1921, and $0.23 in April of 1921, when they reached their low point. In January of 1922 they were quoted at $0.325. In terms of percentage the deflation was 98 per cent during the Democratic administration and 2 per cent during the Republican administration, while the advance in price from the low point amounts to 18 per cent. Sole hemlock leather was quoted at $0.57 in Chicago in May, 1920, reached $0.37 in March, 1921, and $0.34 in August, 1921, at which price it has remained constant to the end of the 20-month period. Eighty-seven per cent of the deflation took place during the Democratic administration and 13 per cent during the Republican administration. Bessemer steel billets were quoted at $60 per ton at Pittsburgh in May, 1920. They dropped to $38.40 in March, 1921, and reached their lowest level, at $28, in January, 1922. Sixty-seven per cent of the deflation in this commodity took place under the Democratic administration and 32 per cent under the Republican administration. Copper was quoted at $0.19 per pound in New York in May, 1920. It dropped to $0.122 in March, 1921, and reached its low point of $0.117 in August, 1921. The price in January, 1922, was $0.135. Ninety-three per cent of the deflation, therefore, occurred during the Democratic administration and 7 per cent during the Republican administration. Since the low point was reached in this commodity an increase of 24 per cent of the total deflation has taken place. Lead was quoted at $0.085 in May, 1920. Its low point was reached in March, 1921, when the quotation was $0.04. An increase to $0.047 occurred up to January, 1922. One hundred per cent of the deflation here is marked against the Democratic administration, while an increase of 17 per cent has been registered since the Republicans have been in power. Petroleum was quoted at $6.10 in May, 1920. It dropped to $3 in March, 1921, reached its low point in August, 1921, when the quotation was $2.25. The price in January, 1922, was $3.30. The percentage of deflation was 80 per cent for the Democratic administration and 19 per cent for the Republican administration, while the advance in price since August, 1921, is 24 per cent of the total deflation.



Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KETCHAM. I can not yield.

Pig iron, one of the most representative commodities, was quoted at $43.25 at the furnace in May, 1920. It dropped to $24.20 in March, 1921, and reached its low point at $18.15 in January, 1922. The deflation here is 75 per cent for the Democratic administration and 24 per cent for the Republican administration.

While the comparative prices have been limited to those reported for January, 1922, in order to cover comparable periods of time in the Republican and Democratic administrations it may be of interest to the committee to know the commodity prices for March, 1922, which are the latest procurable

Diagram representing comparative deflation and increases in various commodities from May, 1920, to January, 1922.

While this diagram and these figures would seem to answer conclusively the question as to the extent that deflation affected the general business conditions of the country, perhaps a statement from Mr. Williams as to the effect in one particular industry—that of agriculture—would be helpful. Says Mr. Williams:

From May, 1920, to August, 1921, covering exactly the period of the appalling and unprecedented drop in prices of agricultural products, the actual "contraction" or "deflation" of regional reserve bank credits amounted to the huge sum of $1,410,000,000, and coincidentally the country from ocean to ocean and from Canada to the Gulf and the Mexican border experienced the most "crushing losses" and the greatest annihilation of property values in the Nation's history.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KETCHAM. I would like to have five minutes more.

Mr. TOWNER. I yield five minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. KETCHAM. Grouping all the commodities together and calculating the average deflation in terms of percentage, we find that 84½ per cent can be charged to the 10 months of the Democratic administration immediately preceding March 4, 1921, and 15½ per cent to the first 10 months of the Republican administration. These are the facts set out by the record, worked out with so much painstaking care by the Hon. John Skelton Williams, who certainly could not be rightfully accused of any prejudice in favor of the Republican administration. They seem to completely answer the charge made by the two distinguished Democratic leaders who are evidently undertaking to mislead the great body of American voters, who have been almost overwhelmed by the disastrous consequences of the action of Democratic administrative officials.

The third question—where does the blame really lie?—has been fully answered in the facts thus far presented, but additional emphasis is at hand in the record of the proceedings of the Federal Reserve Board. On page 57 of the report of the Federal Reserve Board, dated February 16, 1921, which report covers the full Democratic year of 1920, will be found a statement that in January, 1920, the board approved an increase in the rate of discount on loans secured by Liberty bonds, Victory notes, and trade acceptances. Toward the end of January the rate on paper secured by Liberty bonds and Victory notes was advanced to 5½ per cent, and the rates on all classes of commercial paper, including trade acceptances and agricultural and live-stock paper, to 6 per cent. On the following page will be found the statement that rates on commercial paper and on agricultural and live-stock paper were advanced in June to 7 per cent by four banks, and the trade acceptance rate to the same level by three of the same banks, the fourth bank advancing it to 6½ per cent. On page 59 will be found this increased discount rate referred to as a means of "credit control," which is, of course, another name for deflation. That the Federal Reserve Board did not start this deflation program in ignorance of its effects is shown by a statement on page 11, in which the board says that it "has never failed to take account of the consequences of its discount policies." Thus, we see that the board began its increase of discount rates early in 1920, and had raised the discount rates on commercial, agricultural, and live-stock paper to 6½ or 7 per cent in June of that year.

It should be borne in mind that this action was taken by the Federal Reserve Board, the chairman of which was Hon. CARTER GLASS, Secretary of the Treasury, and the members, appointees of President Wilson.

Former Secretary of the Treasury McAdoo, commenting on the action of the Federal Reserve Board which led to the drastic deflation, is reported to have said, "One of the slogans of the last campaign was deflation. We got it. Everybody has been getting it. You can not play with finance and expect to get away without paying. I am here to say that it was the wrong sort of national affairs, and that the right sort of Democratic intelligence would have saved immense sums of financial loss."

Mr. Chairman, the lines of political battle should be drawn up on real issues, and no vindictiveness, vituperation, or volubility should be allowed to obscure the real situation as we are to face it this fall. With this purpose in mind, I have based my argument almost entirely upon statements of Democratic officials and upon the report of a Democratic board. I believe it completely answers the unwarranted attacks of the distinguished Democratic leaders upon the Republican administration and places the blame for the economic depression of the past two years squarely upon Democratic administrative officials. [Applause.]

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KETCHAM] has made it very clear that figures can take the place of hunger, and that persons who just live by eating do not need to trouble about it any more, because they can take the figures which the gentleman gives and work it out in that way.

I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON].

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. LONDON. Does the gentleman want a quorum? If so, I will make the point of no quorum.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. No. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I do not often make partisan references. But the speech of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KETCHAM]——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. It is clear that there is no quorum present. The Clerk will call the roll.

Thereupon the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. STAFFORD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill (H. R. 10442) to amend an act entitled "An act to declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands, and to provide a more autonomous government for these islands," approved August 29, 1916, as amended by an act to amend said act approved July 21, 1921, and finding itself without a quorum, he had caused the roll to be called, whereupon 242 Members answered to their names, and he submitted a list of the names of the absentees for printing in the Journal.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] is recognized for 19 minutes remaining.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, partisan controversy is distasteful to me. I do not usually make partisan references in my speeches. But the speech of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KETCHAM] reminds me of a striking dissimilarity between the recent Democratic administration and the present Republican administration.

The country is now in the throes of the greatest coal strike in its history. The way in which the present administration has confronted that situation is in the sharpest contrast with the spirit of the Wilson administration under similar circumstances. We had a threatened coal strike in the fall of 1919. All the powers of the administration were brought into play to prevent the strike. Some of the things which were done I do not approve. I approve the action of President Wilson in inviting the contending forces into a conference and the pressure which was brought to bear to bring that meeting about. I approve of the influences which were then put afoot to induce an amicable settlement. The same spirit characterized the operators then that inspires them now. They successfully resisted efforts of the administration for an amicable settlement. The strike was called. Steps were taken by the Government to throttle it, which, in my judgment, were un-American, and I might well say unconstitutional. But, after all, the influence of the administration was subsequently brought to bear for a peaceable settlement. So that in March, 1920, an agreement was made between the mine workers and the operators; a harmonious agreement covering the period up to April 1, 1922. And under that agreement there was peace. No man, whether he approves the policy of the Wilson administration or not, can say that the administration was not earnestly and sincerely devoting itself to the prevention of the strike, which then would have been what this strike is now proving to be, but little short of a national disaster.

The dark tragedy of the miners' strike is now in its second phase. The supply of coal above ground is greatly reduced and in some sections will soon be exhausted. The operators are growing anxious for developments; not that they are yet suffering in any way, but because they are irritated by the miners' show of courage and endurance. The slender savings of the workers are much depleted. Hunger is already knocking at the door of thousands of homes. The great, dull, stupid public is waking somewhat from its indifference and begins to express its sense of injury and grievance. A universal tension is appearing and the time is not distant when may be heard the rumblings which may mark the threat of storm and disaster.

The stage for the strike has been set for months. It has long been obvious to those informed in industrial matters that the coal operators have been seeking an opportunity to "go to the mat" with the miners' organization. As a backwash from the war has come a resurgence of the old reactionary and illiberal feeling of the employer class toward those who labor with their hands. With it has come an intense class consciousness and the determination upon the part of the employers to stand together in behalf of what the employer calls his "right to run his own business as he chooses." Having made tremendous sacrifices to strike down Prussianism in world politics, our soldiers have returned to find the spirit of Prussianism dominating American industry. Democracy, victorious overseas, has been defeated at home.

PART OF "OPEN SHOP MOVEMENT."

The "open shop movement" is the deceitful name given by its propagandists to the conspiracy to break down and destroy all labor organizations. It seeks to drive men who work for wages into submission to industrial conditions which will soon mark the workers as belonging to a social order which shall have no rights which will interfere with the profits and development of industry. The spirit of this movement is that of the old times of lordly baron and humble serf. It does not belong to this age but to the era of Wat Tyler and John Ball.

The purpose of the coal operators to destroy the miners' organization is merely an aspect of the "open shop movemeent." This fact is universally recognized by the classes supporting the "open shop." They stand like one man behind the operators. Whatever influence they have is thrown on the operators' side. Whatever they may do toward shaping a public opinion hostile to the mine workers, that they are doing. Their parasites of politicians, lawyers, and so forth, are strident. Their servile press is backing them. Their tools in public office are watching for their opportunity. Always lustily decrying class consciousness, the affiliated "open shoppers" show an intense class consciousness. They thereby produce a workers' class consciousness, the very thing that their selfish interests prompt them to prevent.

The solidarity of the employers and their affiliations is so obvious that it is being noted by the wage earners, and is operating toward producing a similar solidarity among the working classes. In a recent editorial in the organ of the American Federation of Labor, referring to the strike, it was said: "All labor is in the fight with the miners to the last, and to victory." Soon the situation will be recognized by all organized laborers.

But labor is always at a disadvantage in such matters, for vast numbers are unorganized and remain uninformed as to the issues, and the vast unclassified masses, whose interests after all are identical with those of the wage earners, are frequently misled by the propaganda and deceitful slogans of their own oppressors.

ISSUES OF THE STRIKE.

Technically speaking, the coal "strike" is not a strike at all. The miners, through their chosen agents, made a working contract with their employers. The contract expired by its terms on April 1. For months prior to that time the miners sought to get the operators to enter into a new contract, but the latter declined even to discuss the matter. When April 1 arrived, the miners' contract of employment having terminated, they stopped work. The operators having been chiefly instrumental in bringing it about, the suspension of work partakes more of the nature of a lockout than a strike.

The working contract which expired on April 1 carried a provision under which it was agreed that, prior to that time, the operators and miners should meet and negotiate a new contract. However, the operators refused to perform this clause of their agreement. From time to time the miners invited the operators to meet with them. The operators either declined or ignored the invitation. It has been evident for months that they had no intention of keeping their agreement. Therefore, placing the blame for the strike, it is clear that the operators are guilty.

The issue between the miners and the operators is not one of wages or working conditions. This is shown by the refusal of the operators to meet with the miners or to discuss such matters. The miners did not want a strike. They realized that, because of the depression, they were at a great disadvantage. Their strike resources were slender. They would have made any reasonable concessions. The chief thing that the miners want is work, steady work, not a mere desultory employment. They want work every day instead of an average of about 125 days per year as at present.

But the operators are not interested in details of wages and working conditions. They want to destroy the union. The charge that the operators are aiming at the destruction of the miners' organization is proven: First, by their refusal to negotiate touching wages and conditions; second, by the unanimous support which they are receiving from the "open shoppers," such support obviously having a union-hating basis; third, by the propaganda issued by the operators which is aimed at union practices, such as the "check-off," and is almost wholly devoted to trying to show the miners' union to be an oppressive, dictatorial, and even lawless organization.

The coal strike is the first great battle of the "open shop" campaign. If the employers win with it to-day, the battle will move to the railroad yards to-morrow and thence to the mills and shops, and so on and on as the "open shoppers" may meet with success, until every labor union in America is crushed and destroyed.

CENTRAL COMPETITIVE FIELD.

What is known as the central competitive field is composed of the bituminous mines of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and one district in Pennsylvania. The working contract, which ended on April 1, covered this field and fixed the wages and working conditions for all mines.

Coal from this field includes the greater part of the entire bituminous production of the United States, and the mine operatives comprise probably three-fourths of the membership of the United Mine Workers. Coal produced in this field comes into sharp competition. Therefore wages and conditions at one mine affect the ability of that mine to compete with other mines in the field. It therefore becomes necessary that the operators should produce coal under fairly equal conditions in order to find a market for their product.

The operators' plea that they can not afford to make a new contract with the miners' organization because such a contract will render them unable to compete with the nonunion West Virginia and Pennsylvania districts discloses at once their purpose to destroy the organization. They wish to place the central competitive field upon the same basis of wages and conditions as the nonunion districts. On the other hand, it is to the interest of the mine workers to include the entire field in a single working agreement, for if separate agreements are made in the various mining districts, each district may be played off against the other, just as the nonunion West Virginia districts are played against the unionized central competitive field. This principle is recognized by the operators. One of their leaders, by way of explaining the miners' object, recently said:

Settlement by States or districts would lessen the effect of their strike weapon, which they do not intend to allow under any circumstances.

WORKERS NEVER WANT TO STRIKE.

Of course the reference to strike is pure "bunk." Miners never want to strike. A strike always costs them more in sufferings and deprivation than it can possibly cost the operator. At its best it costs the miner his time, a segment of his limited period of earning usefulness, a part of his life lost beyond recall. At its worst the strike costs him food and shelter for his family, perhaps even the very lives of himself, his wife, and his little ones. Miners never want a strike for its own sake. It is entered upon even as would be a dangerous surgical operation. A strike is war and may be justified only upon the same ground as other wars, that it is necessary in defense of liberty. Miners strike merely to show that there is a limit to what they will endure, a point beyond which they will not be driven. They strike as a punishment to their employers and in order to show them that they will not submit to oppression even though resistance shall cost them everything. Strikes are conceived of as only in part beneficial to the strikers. In the large way they are for the benefit of all labor and are based upon an outraged class consciousness.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 16 minutes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I yield 10 minutes more to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The desire of the operator to deal with the mine workers by separate districts means that the operator intends to play off his district against his competing district—means that he wishes to place his employees in competition for employment in his service with the workers of other districts. This desire of the operator is based upon the same principle as the opposition of the "open shoppers" to all labor unions. The real consideration back of it all is to enable the employer to force separate individual workers into competition with each other in seeking to serve him, so that employment may go to the worker who will accept the smallest return. The philosophy of the "open shoppers" is to get the greatest possible amount of labor for the least possible return. That is the ultimate aim and end of their efforts.

That this end is actually achieved is illustrated by a comparison between mine workers' earnings in union and nonunion districts. I refer to the article "Wages and hours of labor in bituminous coal mining," in the Department of Labor publication, Monthly Labor Review for April, 1922, which shows the average tonnage worker's hourly earnings in the Alabama nonunion district as 46 cents per hour, while the average of $1.03 per hour is earned in the union districts of Illinois, Indiana, and Ohio.

PHILOSOPHY OF COLLECTIVE BARGAINING.

If there were as many employers as workers they might meet upon terms of rough equality, it being borne in mind that the need of the worker to sell his labor is always more pressing than is the occasion of the employer to buy. But apart from this inequality, if workers and employers were equal in number there would be little reason for labor unions. But to the extent that employers are fewer in number as compared with workers, the necessity for organization and solidarity among the workers increases.

In a simple state of industry the employer worked alongside of his hired man. Each knew the other and his problems. There were bonds of sympathy between them and a certain rough justice obtained. The worker could bargain on some sort of fair terms for the sale of his labor. When they disagreed, the worker went to some neighbor's shop and there secured employment from a man whom he knew. There was competition among employers in hiring to a similar degree that the workers were forced to compete in seeking jobs.

The Steel Corporation employs roughly an average of probably 175,000 men. The management of this great concern is in a small group of men. They sit around a table in a banking house and there decide what the wages of their employees shall be. The execution of their decision is probably in the hands of one man. This great interest, with its vast wealth and consequent economic social and political power, is directed by a single head. In its labor aspect it is as though its 175,000 employees had organized into perfect solidarity and submitted themselves absolutely to the direction of a single leader. The manager of this great interest gives his orders, thousands of subordinates respond and devote their energies to carrying out his will. The manager never saw the worker. Perhaps he never even saw the mill, yet he gives the word which determines what house the worker and his family shall live in, what clothes they shall wear, what food they shall eat, indeed whether they shall have shelter, clothes and food at all. Upon his word may depend the fate of thousands of men, women, and children, what shall be their present, what hope of the future they may dare entertain, indeed whether they shall live or die. There is no bargaining either collective or individual; there is only the ukase of an industrial czar.

It is for this power, for the opportunity for autocratic rule over other men, that the antiunionist operators are battling. It is against this dread might of autocracy that the ragged and half-starved mine workers are struggling.

MINERS COULD NOT GIVE UP THEIR UNION.

The mine workers did not want the strike. They had all to lose and nothing to gain. But the operators demanded of them the one thing that they could not afford to give up. They could starve on, they could wear rags, they could live in tents, they might, if need be, tramp the highways and sleep in fence corners, depending upon charity—they might endure all temporarily.

They might not have bread temporarily, but their organization they could not surrender—that would have been a permanent loss. They have been years building it. It has been the shield of their defense. It has protected them from oppression. It has brought fairer wages and better conditions. Thousands who were not members of the union have been benefited. To give it up meant to lose all. It meant a slip back into conditions which remain an awful tradition.

For miners have always been an oppressed class of workers, always poorly paid, always exploited, always the victims of heartlessness and rapacity. Recruited in the main from the alien born, the illiterate, the unfortunate, and the poor, always there has been a surplus of labor. The surplus has been created deliberately by the operators. They have overmanned the industry for their own purposes. There is never enough work for all. Even under the best union conditions, favoritism in the distribution of cars and desirable places to work and other similar matters may be practiced to reward the operator's tools. In districts where the law permits company stores, the miner buys his family supplies from the operator. Usually he rents his dwelling from him. All this, as a rule, means big profits. The more families in the mining camp the more trade for the company store and the more dwellings to be occupied and at a higher rent. There is always a surplus of mine labor whenever the operator can contrive to bring it about. It means more profit to the operator, but not cheaper coal to the consumer.

PROLOGUE SPOKEN BY SECRETARY OF COMMERCE.

The tragedy of the strike moves on. Its prologue was spoken by the Secretary of Commerce on January 20 last. The stage was then set. The operators had expressed their determination not to negotiate a new contract. The Secretary then announced that the administration did not purpose to try to do anything to avert the strike. I was shocked by the complacency which characterized his statement. It was amazing in its implication that the administration regarded with indifference the prospect of this great labor controversy. I was bewildered. I wondered if Mr. Hoover and the advisors of the administration visualized what might be the outcome. I was shocked to realize what a possibly awful price the administration was willing for the Nation to pay for the operators' success in destroying the miners' organization. I lifted my faint voice in a plea that the President might intervene, that he might use the influence of his great office with the powerful interests affiliated with the operators to induce them to negotiate with the workers and to endeavor to make a new contract.

But the pleas of those who sought to avert the struggle were ignored. No real effort was made to stop the strike. The Secretary of Labor gestured in the direction of the central competitive field. But he had no program. The influence of the administration was not behind him. His passes in the air had no effect unless it might be to cause the credulous to believe that the administration deplored the strike. Over against the gestures of the Secretary of Labor were heard the rumblings of the Attorney General talking of "the preservation of order." The miners knew what the Attorney General meant in so far as he meant anything. His threat was not against operators' gunmen nor coal and iron police nor deputies nor the other private armies kept by the operators. It was not against those who would deny to the miners and their friends their constitutional rights of free speech and of assemblage. It was intended to intimidate the miners.

WAGERED UPON OPERATORS TO WIN.

The administration has wagered upon the operators to win, that the miners will not hold out long, that industry will not be seriously disturbed, that the folly and obstinacy of the operators will not greatly harm themselves. But what if the operators do not win? What if the strike goes on and on until industry is quenched and transportation halts for lack of fuel? What if the miners hold out too long? Will the administration continue hands off? Oh, no doubt the operators will be glad enough to have the Government intervene then. Efforts will be made to drag in governmental agencies to their rescue. The courts will be prostituted to miner-baiting. Will the administration use the military for their intimidation?

The tragedy of the strike moves in its second act. What will be its climax? The great, stupid public is awakening. Probably it may soon realize its peril. Will it continue to allow the great coal-mining industry—one of the chiefest in public importance, one upon which depends the very economic life of the Nation—to be manipulated, played with, and arbitrarily directed by weak and foolish men who have shown themselves incapable of performing the trust? Or will the public assert its neglected interest in this vital industry to the end that those who control it shall be made to respond to the general public welfare?

The mine workers may lose the strike, their organization may be destroyed, they may be forced to seek other callings, their sacrifices and their sufferings may gain nothing for themselves, yet they will have won a victory if as the result of the strike the public has been made to learn its lesson—if out of their sufferings and defeat there shall come a solution of the question presented in the coal-mining industry. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON].

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to continue the coal strike discussion. We have, as I pointed out two days ago, in the bituminous industry nearly 10,000 mines owned by about 2,000 operators competing among themselves in exploiting the workers and the Nation. Bad as conditions are in those mines where they had collective agreements heretofore, conditions are altogether impossible in the nonunion fields. There the worker is deprived of all human rights. There we have in effect a feudal system, except that the coal lord is not a nobleman, is not a knight leading his hosts into honorable battle and defending his vassals against oppression, but is a mere exploiter, a moneybag, with gold as his only god, his only religion. It is almost impossible to believe if what one reads is going on in West Virginia is true that West Virginia is in the United States. What distresses me is the utter lack of intelligence with which supposedly intelligent men treat this question. Here you are, 435 Members of the House of Representatives, legislating for the common good of 105,000,000 people. The time when legislating consisted in laying down moral principles is gone. All our legislation is industrial in character. We either promote business or interfere with business. Protection and free trade are economic questions. Subsidies to shipping industries are economic problems. The coal question is an economic question, a bread and butter question for the Nation, for the people. What remedy has been proposed either on the Democratic side or the Republican side to deal with the strike in the coal industry? If you were to-day to begin framing a Constitution of the United States for the present and for future generations, would you, with the experience that you have to-day, permit the coal industry to become the property of private individuals?

Would you permit an unintelligent, selfish, greedy, petty crowd of money makers to control the greatest natural resource we possess? That is what they are—mere money makers. They are incapable even of giving employment. If they make no profits, as they claim, then they are incompetent even as business men. They can not in any event be intrusted with the national wealth of the United States.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Would the gentleman rather turn it over to Lenin and Trotski than to leave it in the United States, as it is to-day?

Mr. LONDON. I would turn it over to a man with an idea rather than to a fellow whose only desire is to make money. The man with an idea may be wrong, but as long as he is inspired by an ideal to serve humanity he will ultimately adopt the right methods, while if he is only animated by the desire to make money—and your coal dealers and owners have shown that during the war, during the world crisis, their only desire was to rob the people and the Government of the United States—if the man is moved, I say, only by a desire to make money, then nothing but disaster can follow. During the war you established a Fuel Administration because you did not trust those rascals and you wanted to control them. I refuse to trust them in time of peace.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If a fellow got busy with an idea and did not give us any coal, then what would we do?

Mr. LONDON. If a fellow got busy with an idea and did not give you any coal, you would not get anywhere; but the man who has an idea, the man whose mind works, the man who applies himself to solve the problems of to-day in the light of modern principles, is bound to get you somewhere. You Democrats offer no remedy. You content yourselves with criticizing the Republicans. You know who they are; you should know that you can not expect anything from them. The Republican Party is a plutocratic soviet. The leaders of it know what they want. The difference between the Republicans and the Democrats is that the Republicans know what they want and the Democrats do not. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yet I heard the gentleman announce a few weeks ago that he was a super-Republican.

Mr. LONDON. A super-Republican or a super-Democrat—both. The Democratic instincts are all right, but they have no intelligence. [Laughter.]

My position is that the Democrats are incompetent for good, and the other fellows are competent for evil only. The Republican side is the conscious organized force of the money power to destroy every vestige of democracy in the United States. That is what the Republicans are. The only trouble they have is how to conceal from the people the truth. So far as the Democrats are concerned, they mean well, but they do not know how to go about it and they are afraid to think. They go to Thomas Jefferson's grave to find what Thomas Jefferson said about 1922, whereas Thomas Jefferson trusted that a Democrat in 1922 would have some ideas of his own, and he did not advise them what to do in 1922. [Laughter and applause.] So we find such an able, such a brilliant, such a brave and really genuine Democrat as HUDDLESTON of Alabama bringing forth as his only remedy that we have a conference.

The wolf and the sheep will meet in conference. Wall Street and Lazarus will meet in conference. They will confer, and they will negotiate, and the wolf will say to the sheep, "I want to eat you up"; and what will the poor sheep do? It will bleat.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. If the gentleman will permit, I desire to say that my remedy is not so meager as the gentleman ascribes to me. I have other remedies.

Mr. LONDON. Now, as to the remedy——

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. What is it?

Mr. LONDON. The remedy is national control of the mining industry. The remedy is to bring the bituminous mines, which underlie a territory embracing 450,000 square miles of the soil of the United States—to bring them under the control of the collective agency known as the Government of the United States. We are the trustees of the American people——

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. They have nationalized their coal mines in Russia. How does the gentleman like the situation there?

Mr. LONDON. What a silly comparison. [Laughter.] I do not like to use strong language, but any man who tries to compare those two countries, the United States, the greatest experiment in democracy, with 400 years of democratic institutions behind it, on the one hand, and unfortunate Russia, with a thousand years of Czardom, struggling from revolution to revolution toward the light—any man who compares those two things is hopeless.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. I yield the gentleman three minutes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Did not we become the great country to which the gentleman pays a tribute by doing exactly what the people of the United States are doing under the Constitution?

Mr. LONDON. The difficulty with the gentleman from Kansas is that he attributes the glory and greatness of the United States in the past to the fact that he is living to-day. He does not know what an impediment he is to the future progress of the United States. [Laughter.] That is all.

I yield back the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back one minute.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LANKFORD].

Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Chairman, some very important questions arise from time to time as to the relative rights of transportation lines and as to whether or not the public can be best served by one line or by a different line. These questions arise as the country develops and new methods of transportation are brought about. The railroads during the past half century have provided the most important rapid method of transportation, and communities, towns, and even great cities owe their phenomenal growth to the railroads. Our Nation owes much of its development to the extension of railroads to every nook and corner of our country.

The short lines of railroads have brought about a most splendid development of the sections of the country where they have been extended. This is especially true in sections of the country where railroads are easily built and where many have been built. This condition exists along the Atlantic coastal plain. A great development in south Georgia is the result of the building of short lines of railroads and of their operation, and I look with great alarm upon the general tendency of railroad legislation, which means the destruction of the short lines in Georgia and elsewhere. The junking of short lines of railroads means a tremendous loss to the sections traversed by the roads so destroyed. Congress and the country should do everything reasonably possible in behalf of the short-line railroads.

Hon. J. A. J. Henderson, of Ocilla, Ga., president of the Georgia Short Line Railroad Association, has devoted much of his useful time to the building of railroads, and through his service to his people in this way he has helped very much in the building of numerous most splendid communities, thriving towns, and cities. His most splendid efforts have benefited many of his fellow citizens, and his State generally, and will live long into the future. Mr. Henderson is devoted to the development of short-line railroads and to their success, and is a close student of all questions concerning them. Any suggestion made by him is worthy of the most careful consideration by the country and the Congress. I am just in receipt of a letter from Mr. Henderson discussing a most important question which I wish to submit for the careful consideration of all, and which letter is as follows:

ATLANTA, GA., May 1, 1922.

Hon. W. C. LANKFORD,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The Georgia Short Line Railroad Association, at a meeting held here recently, passed a resolution protesting against the establishment of mail routes which will result in taking away from the railroads of Georgia the transportation of mails, and against changes in existing mail routes so as to allow individuals or bus lines to carry the mail where the service can be performed by the railroads.

There are in Georgia 39 short-line railroads, traversing 96 counties of the State and having an aggregate mileage of 2,934 miles, serving a very large percentage of the population of our State.

We are sure that you have kept up with the situation and that you realize that a large number of these railroads are at present facing a serious situation, and that if they are not accorded fair and even generous treatment that a great number of them will inevitably have to be dismantled. Should this be done the owners of the railroads would, of course, be heavy losers, but by far the greater loss would fall upon the citizens of the State who are served by the railroads but not directly financially interested in them. Many towns, and even small cities, are served by the short lines only, and these are the railroads which serve the people of the rural communities where the trunk lines do not care to, or can not afford to, go.

A number of railroads in this State have already been junked, and others are certain to be if the conditions do not improve.

Recently, and since the public highways have been paved or improved, a very large number of what are commonly called bus lines have sprung into existence, and these lines have entered into active competition with the railroads, and especially the short line railroads, as carriers of freight and passengers. They charge identically the same rates which the railroads are permitted to charge where they compete with the railroads, and much higher rates where there is no railroad competition. They pay no taxes in the counties through which they operate, although the railroads are required to pay heavy taxes wherever they do business.

We understand that the owners of these bus lines are now making an active effort to secure contracts for the carriage of the mail which is now being carried by the railroads. We do not think that this is fair or right, so long as the railroads furnish convenient and adequate service in this respect.

We ask that you investigate this matter, and if you can consistently do so that you use your efforts to prevent contracts for the carriage of the mails being awarded to the bus lines where adequate service is, or can be, furnished by the rail carriers.

We would be glad to have a letter from you regarding your attitude in this matter.

Yours very truly,

GEORGIA SHORT LINE RAILROAD ASSOCIATION,
By J. A. J. HENDERSON, President.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, this bill provides for an extension of the limit of indebtedness of the Philippine Islands from the present limit of $30,000,000 to a limit of 10 per cent on the assessed valuation of the islands, which would mean an increase to about $75,000,000.

In stating the reasons for this request, it may be of advantage to the committee if I state something generally with regard to the present conditions of affairs in the Philippine Islands.

The Filipinos are, as a rule, exceptionally intelligent and eager to learn. They have made unprecedented progress during the short period of American control. Their support and enthusiasm in building up their public-school system is remarkable. They are naturally an orderly and law-abiding people, and easily adjust themselves to existing conditions. They are for the most part frugal and industrious. At the commencement of American occupancy economically the islanders were poor. Some idea of their progress may be given by some figures:

A postal savings bank was started in 1907. In 1913 it had 40,000 depositors and $1,240,000 in deposits. In 1920 it had 107,000 depositors and $3,327,000 in deposits.

The business of the islands was estimated at $200,000,000 in 1907. In 1920 it was $863,000,000.

The resources of commercial banks were $15,000,000 in 1906 and are now $215,000,000.

Two-thirds of the business of the Philippines is with the United States. In 1920 they sent to this country, measured in value, sugar, $49,619,260; hemp, $35,862,000; coconut oil, $23,268,000; tobacco, $19,927,000; embroideries, $7,811,000; copra, $3,716,870.

Our sales of American products in the Philippines in 1918 was $52,975,000; in 1920, $90,830,000. The total trade with the United States in 1920 was $197,506,000.

In 1915 the revenues of the Philippine Government were $13,905,000; in 1920 they were $43,500,000.

The total assessed value of property in the islands is now about $740,000,000.

The population of the islands is about 11,000,000. There are about 3,000 islands in the archipelago, with a total area of 115,026 square miles. Only about 10 per cent of the land is under cultivation.

The natural resources of the Philippine Islands are great and are largely undeveloped. It is doubtful if anywhere else in the world is to be found a like wealth of undeveloped resources.

Coming now to a consideration of their financial condition and the necessity for the present legislation, we find that the first bonded indebtedness incurred by the Philippine Government was for the purchase of the friar lands in the amount of $7,000,000. This is secured by provisions for repayment by sale of the lands. By the organic act of 1916, the limit of the public debt, exclusive of the friar land bonds, was fixed at $15,000,000. It is proposed by this bill to increase the limit to 10 per cent of the assessed valuation of the property, which would place the limit at about $74,000,000.

The justification for this legislation may be briefly explained. The Philippines, as did the United States, prospered greatly commercially during the late war. There was general employment of labor and wages were higher than ever before. Prices of all the principal products were also higher than ever before. Every project seemed to succeed, and general prosperity prevailed all over the islands. Following the war for a time those conditions continued, but the reaction came there, as it did here, and indeed all over the world. Depression came. The prices of their products rapidly fell. In many instances there, as here, the prices at which they were compelled to sell their products were below the cost of production. Laborers were discharged and many enterprises were abandoned.

These conditions still largely exist. There is some improvement, and if their finances can be placed on a safe and sound basis there is an early prospect of a return to normal prosperous conditions.

An encouraging sign is that notwithstanding the depression and uncertain financial status there is a remarkable state of hopefulness among the people. They are in an optimistic mood. Everybody seems to think the depression but temporary, and that plenty of work, high prices, and better conditions will follow.

Unfortunately, during the period of prosperity the government embarked in business. It bought a railway, built sugar centrals, invested in coal mines, and financed other commercial enterprises.

The Philippine National Bank was established and was made the financial branch and arm of the government. A law was passed making it the government depository and compelling all provincial and municipal governments to deposit their funds in it. The sinking funds, and reserves for the security of the currency, and the proceeds of bonds issued for public works were all deposited in the bank. These funds were used to purchase and finance the government's business enterprises, and much was loaned for uncertain enterprises without adequate security.

When the depression set in the bank became insolvent. It owes the insular government about $45,000,000. It has an outstanding paper currency of over $16,000,000, with nothing to redeem it with. Its securities can not be disposed of, and the property financed or owned can not be sold except at great sacrifice.

When something of these conditions became known a general panic of an extremely disastrous character seemed inevitable. The peso was depreciated in value 17 per cent. An appeal was made for help, and banking experts were sent from the United States to take charge of the bank. This probably arrested the panic. As an immediate necessity and to prevent further depreciation of the currency the experts advised an extension of credit from fifteen to thirty millions. It was thought then that perhaps an early liquidation of some of the bank's assets might be secured and that the extension then granted might be sufficient. The extension granted did greatly strengthen and stabilize the situation. But when Governor General Wood, with his financial advisers and the banking experts he called to his assistance, had made a careful and complete examination of the general financial situation of the government as well as the bank it was found a much larger extension of the limit of indebtedness must be granted in order to liquidate or save the bank and to place the government's finances on a sound basis. The leaders of the Filipino people were called into counsel, and when fully apprised of the situation agreed that it demanded a complete reorganization of Philippine finances. This reorganization required the passage by the Philippine Legislature of several bills which were prepared, agreed upon, and passed almost without opposition. A concurrent resolution was adopted, as follows:

FIFTH PHILIPPINE LEGISLATURE,
Special session of 1922.

Begun and held at the city of Manila on Monday, the 13th day of February, 1922.

Concurrent resolution 36, urging upon the President and Congress of the United States the advisability of increasing the debt limit of the islands in order to make it possible to issue bonds for certain purposes.

Whereas it is essential to the welfare of the government of the Philippine Islands that its currency system be placed on a firm basis, and to that end that there shall now be established and hereafter maintained a treasury certificate fund which shall at all times equal 100 per cent of the face amount of outstanding treasury certificates in circulation, and in addition thereto a gold-standard fund, which at the minimum shall amount to 15 per cent of all outstanding government currency, whether coin or treasury certificates; and

Whereas it is also advisable that certain sums advanced to the government by the Government of the United States be reimbursed and that certain other current obligations of the Philippine government be discharged; and

Whereas it is also essential to the welfare of the government that certain funds heretofore created under Act No. 2908, for Manila port improvements, etc., and Act No. 2940, for irrigation systems and other public works of a permanent character, be made available for the purposes described therein; and

Whereas for all the objects above described the following sums will be needed:

	Pesos.
(1) For the treasury certificate fund, approximately	36,500,000
(2) For the gold-standard fund, approximately	10,000,000
(3) To reimburse the United States Government, etc	10,500,000
(4) For Manila port improvements, etc	12,000,000
(5) For irrigation systems, etc	20,000,000
Total	89,000,000

Whereas the Congress of the United States, by act approved August 29, 1916, as amended, has provided that the entire indebtedness of the Philippine government, exclusive of so-called friar land bonds and other secured obligations, shall not exceed at any one time the sum of 60,000,000 pesos; and

Whereas with the issue of bonds in the sum of 10,000,000 pesos, authorized by act of the legislature No. 2999, approved February 2, 1922, such indebtedness will amount to 60,000,000 pesos: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Philippine Senate concurring), That the advisability of immediately increasing the debt limit of the islands from 60,000,000 pesos to 150,000,000 pesos, so that bonds may be issued to provide funds for the above purposes, in the order stated, should be, and the same hereby is, urged upon the President and the Congress of the United States.

Adopted February 17, 1922.

FRANCISCO ENAGE,
President pro tempore of the Senate.
SERGIO OSMEÑA,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Finally adopted by the senate on February 17, 1922.

F. MA. GUERRERO,
Secretary of the Senate.

This resolution, which originated in the house of representatives, was finally adopted by the same on February 13, 1922.

RAFAEL VILLANUEVA,
Secretary of the House of Representatives.

Approved.

LEONARD WOOD,
Governor General.

Acts were also passed making it obligatory to deposit all insular revenues in the insular treasury instead of the Philippine National Bank; providing a 100 per cent reserve against outstanding government paper currency and a gold reserve of 15 per cent for outstanding silver and paper currency; restoring reserves and sinking funds and avails of bonds issued for public works and municipalities.

This and other legislation has been carefully worked out with the cooperation of all those interested. It must not be understood that there is any considerable opposition on the part of the Filipino people to this reorganization plan. Their leaders are lending it their most hearty cooperation and giving it their entire approval.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It is true, is it not, that during the Harrison administration precisely this same thing in principle was recommended and in part adopted?

Mr. TOWNER. The reorganization of the affairs of the government?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. In part it has been considered necessary for some time. I do not know to what extent Governor Harrison recommended reorganization, but a full realization of its necessity has not been brought to light until within the year.

I believe we all are anxious to avoid any partisan issue arising in the consideration of this question. As long as we have assumed control over the limit of their indebtedness we are responsible for what is done. Our action should be governed solely by what is best for the islands. If at their officially expressed request we should refuse what is reasonable and what is necessary and disaster should follow, it would clearly be our fault and not theirs. On the controverted question of independence it will be necessary and best from either viewpoint that this legislation be enacted. If independence be granted them speedily it will be for their manifest advantage that their finances be placed on a sound foundation. If they are to remain in some relation with the United States for a long, indefinite period the same is true. From either standpoint panic and financial chaos would be disastrous and a permanent injury to the islands.

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. MAPES. Does not your bill provide for an unusually heavy indebtedness? Is not 10 per cent of the aggregate tax valuation more than the limit placed upon most of the municipalities of the United States?

Mr. TOWNER. I think not. I think many of the States have the same limit we have placed upon the Philippine Islands.

Mr. MAPES. Ten per cent of the valuation?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes; of the assessed valuation.

Mr. MAPES. Are not municipalities limited to less than that as a rule?

Mr. TOWNER. My information is that many municipalities have the same limitation—10 per cent. Under this law all municipalities in the Philippines have a 7 per cent limit except Manila, to which we have extended the limit to 10 per cent.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I observe that under the bill the friar land bonds are not to be considered as part of the indebtedness authorized. Has the gentleman any information as to what per cent of the assessed valuation of the property in the Philippines the friar land bonds would amount to?

Mr. TOWNER. Only a very small per cent, I think. The gentleman will remember that when we took possession of the Philippine Islands we purchased the friar lands from their owners and turned them over to the Philippine Government, to be sold by them to the people for farms and homes. These bonds were issued for the purchase price of the lands, and as they are sold the amount received is applied to the payment of the bonds. The amount received from the sale of these bonds will much more than pay for the indebtedness.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. So, as a matter of fact, no assessment will be required in order to pay for these bonds?

Mr. TOWNER. No. Those bonds ought not to be considered as part of the national indebtedness.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. What provision, if any, is there for the retirement of the proposed increase of the bonded indebtedness of the islands?

Mr. TOWNER. In the legislation passed by the Philippine Legislature the most careful provision is made for a sinking fund and for the preservation of the reserves.

Governor General Wood called the legislature in special session to consider the bills that were to carry into effect this reconstruction arrangement and they were all promptly passed. The one which amends the existing law, with complete guaranties for the protection of the reserves and currency, and which establishes a gold standard fund with which to maintain the parity of the Philippine silver and paper peso with the gold standard peso; of establishing a treasury certificate fund to redeem the treasury certificates; and to provide for the issue of bonds for those purposes, has been passed, subject not only to the approval of the Governor General, but also subject to the approval of the President of the United States.

When Congress has acted and the President has approved this legislation the Philippines will have as well devised and carefully guarded a system of governmental finance as can be found anywhere in the world.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. To what extent is the Philippine currency now depreciated, and will the sale of additional bonds provided for materially help to bring such currency back to par?

Mr. TOWNER. The currency was at one time at about 17 per cent discount. After the passage of the first extension act the discount was reduced to 6 per cent. Upon putting into operation these laws it will be at par and as good as any money in the world.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. EDMONDS. Was this depreciation over there the result of the mismanagement of the Philippine bank?

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly; that was one of the causes.

Mr. EDMONDS. Was any of it dishonest?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes; part of it was dishonest. A branch of the bank was established at Shanghai and large losses occurred there because of dishonest practices. The managers of other branches and the president of the principal bank at Manila were prosecuted and convicted for dishonest practices.

Mr. EDMONDS. Who were they? Were they political factors in the Philippines?

Mr. TOWNER. I know the names of very few of them, and do not know whether they were political factors or not.

Mr. EDMONDS. Were they Filipinos or Americans?

Mr. TOWNER. Most of them were Filipinos, as I am informed.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Can the gentleman give us the approximate amount of the loss sustained by the Philippine Government as a result of the mismanagement of the bank?

Mr. TOWNER. At present the loss is about 89,000,000 pesos, or about $45,000,000, as reported by Governor General Wood; but payments are being made from time to time by the bank to the government. The property and security held by the bank can not now be disposed of at its cost or value. It will probably take years to realize on the bank's assets, which are certainly not available now, and eventually when disposed of there will be a considerable loss. How much, it would be impossible now to estimate.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. MAPES. The report says the limit of indebtedness has already been raised from $15,000,000 to $30,000,000?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. MAPES. What would be the limit if this bill were passed?

Mr. TOWNER. Probably $73,000,000 or $74,000,000.

Mr. MAPES. More than twice the present limit?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. My information is that the managers of the bank were Americans.

Mr. TOWNER. I understand they were mostly, at least, Filipinos.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. I think that is very material.

Mr. DE VEYRA. The manager was Mr. Miller, an American.

Mr. TOWNER. The manager of the branch established at Shanghai was an American, a Mr. Miller. The president of the central bank at Manila, General Concepcion, was a Filipino. The managers of other branch banks were Filipinos. Seven or eight have already been tried and convicted, including both Miller and Concepcion.

Mr. EDMONDS. I would like to ask the gentleman further whether there was any connection between the political affairs of the Philippine Islands and the losses of these banks?

Mr. TOWNER. I could not answer.

Mr. EDMONDS. The gentleman does not know that?

Mr. TOWNER. I do not know that.

Mr. EDMONDS. The government was not responsible for this loss on the part of the bank?

Mr. TOWNER. The bank was; but, of course, the government owned 90 per cent of the stock of the bank.

Mr. EDMONDS. And in that case it would be responsible for 90 per cent of the loss.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Insular Affairs have gone into all these matters very carefully before reporting this bill. We had extended hearings. We had before us General McIntyre, Chief of the Bureau of Insular Affairs, who has had intimate knowledge of the financial affairs of the islands for years. We had before us Mr. Herrick, of Boston, a very able lawyer, whose practice has been largely confined to banking and financial matters.

At the request of the Secretary of War he went to the Philippines while in the Far East and advised with and assisted in arranging the details of this reconstruction program. Mr. Herrick was of great assistance to the committee in arriving at a knowledge of the true conditions now existing in the Philippines and as to the necessity for this legislation. All sources of information were sought. The detailed statements and reports of Governor General Wood were before the committee. The committee became convinced that the proposed action was not only wise but necessary.

In a cablegram sent by Governor General Wood, of date April 1, he said:

> Strongly urge you to ask Congress to fix limit indebtedness in the Philippine Islands as it is now fixed for Porto Rico as quickly as possible. Am embarrassed by inability to take advantage of bonds for Manila port works and irrigation works, which were started under approval of former debt limit, and sale of bonds which, due to policy of previous administration, were diverted to currency reserves. Work has been stopped on many necessary public improvements, and others carried on in restricted manner from general fund, which is now overdrawn approximately 10,000,000 pesos, due principally to inability to recover deposits in national bank. Several important irrigation projects nearing completion should be finished during present dry season. Otherwise great loss and damage will be incurred by coming rainy season. Impossible to proceed with other essential approved projects, contracts for which should be made immediately or work will be delayed one year more. Sanitary and other humanitarian work seriously curtailed and impaired. Action of Congress along lines recommended in my telegram of December 19, as modified by your suggestion giving islands same status as Porto Rico, will enable me to carry on necessary public works and place government on sound financial basis by the end of this year and restore credit and confidence both here and abroad. Without such action untold harm will be done, and the possibility of restoring satisfactory conditions, financial and otherwise, will be greatly endangered.

Throughout all these negotiations and arrangements in the preparation of the necessary legislation the leadership, skill, and tact displayed by Governor General Wood have been conspicuous. He has rendered a great service to the Philippines as well as to the United States in thus averting what might have been a catastrophe seriously injuring the Filipinos and greatly discrediting the Americans. We are jointly, perhaps primarily, responsible, and can not avoid discredit if we do not now do our part as promptly and as thoroughly as the Filipinos have done theirs.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Is it the purpose of the present government of the Philippines to continue this bank in which the government owns 90 per cent of the stock?

Mr. TOWNER. The future of the bank can not be determined now. It would not be wise to attempt to wind up its affairs at present. To attempt to realize by forced sale on the assets would occasion great losses. It seems to be the general thought that it will be best to continue its existence at least for a time, until some advantageous disposition of its assets can be made or some method of reorganization agreed upon. If it is continued under its present management, it is safe and its future can be worked out later to the best advantage of all concerned. The funds of the government will no longer be deposited in the bank, as under the new legislation they are required to be deposited and kept in the insular treasury, so they are safe. I think we need not have any particular apprehension regarding the future, so far as the bank is concerned.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] has five minutes remaining, which he has left in charge of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield to me two minutes? I want to make one closing statement.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. The bank is now under the management of Americans?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes. Gentlemen of the committee, everyone who has gone into this question at all carefully approves this legislation. It is not only important, it is essential and absolutely necessary.

The limitation now asked is a reasonable one, especially so for a growing country with a great wealth of undeveloped resources. The Philippines have unlimited iron, unlimited timber, coal in almost every important island, great fisheries, vegetable oils without end, hemp such as is found nowhere else in the world, sugar to an undefined limit, great production and still greater possibilities of tobacco—all the riches of the Tropics and many of the products of the Temperate Zones are theirs. Seventy-one per cent of the land is still public land and subject to settlement and development. Governor General Wood, who knows the islands as well or better than any other American, says the Philippines can easily sustain a population of from fifty to sixty millions of people. To such a people and for such a land a 10 per cent limit of indebtedness is perfectly safe. Since we have assumed the responsibility of limiting their indebtedness, we should be sure that the limit we place does not hinder or prevent the development of their resources and the prosperity of their people. So I believe there ought not to be any hesitancy on the part of the committee in making a favorable recommendation nor on the part of the House in passing the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the Resident Commissioner from the Philippines [Mr. DE VEYRA] such time as he desires.

Mr. DE VEYRA. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD an illuminating comment made by Professor Kalaw, of our Philippine University, on the veto power exercised by Governor Wood. I consider it a very educational document, which ought to be called to the attention of Members of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from the Philippine Islands asked unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing the address indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

VETOES BY GENERAL WOOD ARE DEATHBLOW TO PHILIPPINE AUTONOMY.

Mr. DE VEYRA. Mr. Chairman, Philippine autonomy is threatened by the promiscuous use of vetoes by General Wood, and in this connection I desire to insert in the RECORD an article by Maximo M. Kalaw, dean, College of Liberal Arts, University of the Philippines, as printed in The Philippines Herald on March 19, 1922.

The article is as follows:

[From The Philippines Herald, Mar. 19, 1922.]

GOVERNOR WOOD'S VETOES A DEATHBLOW TO PHILIPPINE AUTONOMY.

(By Maximo M. Kalaw, dean, College of Liberal Arts, University of the Philippines.)

The present government of the Philippines is no longer the government of two years ago. The same law governs us, but in practice and in its workings an entirely different machinery now obtains. One of the factors which has changed the government from an autonomous to an almost autocratic one is the use of the veto power recently exercised by the Governor General in disapproving no less than 16 bills. It certainly is contrary to the spirit of the Jones law.

The Jones law, in the words of its preamble, confers upon the people of the Philippine Islands as large a control of their domestic affairs as can be given them without in the meantime impairing the exercise of the rights of sovereignty by the people of the United States. It creates an entirely Philippinized legislature, leaving in the hands of the Filipinos ample legislative powers. Quoting the author of the bill himself, the late Representative Jones, the act "practically confers all legislative powers upon that people, thus giving to them the control of their domestic affairs in all essential particulars."

The Governor General, on the other hand, is given a limited power to veto legislation, and recently he has exercised this power in vetoing 16 bills. It is evident from their titles that most if not all the bills vetoed are of purely local interest. They do not impair the exercise of American sovereignty. The Governor General himself recognizes this fact in his explanations. Nobody doubts that he has good intentions.

DID WOOD EXCEED AUTHORITY?

It is not our purpose to discuss the merits of the bills vetoed. Nor do we for a second doubt the motives of the Governor General. In the exercise of his veto power the Governor General has really two capacities. When he vetoes a bill which he believes may impair the exercise of the rights of American sovereignty, he is exercising that power as the representative of the American Government in the islands; but if he vetoes a bill of purely domestic concern, he is considering himself a part of the legislative machine. It is evident that the recent vetoes are made in a capacity as legislator. Now, the question arises, How far should the Governor General, as a matter of policy, exercise his veto power in matters of purely local interest? Should he consider himself at all a part of the legislative machine?

We may at the outset safely assume that the veto provision in the Jones Act is an imitation of the presidential veto in America. The original purpose of the presidential veto was not to make of the President a part of the legislative branch. On the contrary, the framers of the American Constitution were so enamored with the theory of the division of powers that they would not have dared have the Executive actively participate in legislation. The veto provision was included "for the sake of protecting the Constitution, and, in particular, the Executive, from congressional encroachments." (Bryce, American Commonwealth, p. 59.) Consequently, the veto power was not intended to be often exercised, and in the early history of America it was very sparsely used. Washington used the veto only twice. It was never used by John Adams, Jefferson, J. Q. Adams, or Van Buren, who served full terms, or by W. H. Harrison, Taylor, Fillmore, or Garfield. In signing bills Presidents have sometimes indicated objections, which Congress has afterwards remedied by supplementary legislation.

HISTORY OF THE VETO.

The use of the veto as an active part of legislation is of but recent date. It took place only after the transformation of the Presidency from a nonrepresentative institution into a representative one. It should be remembered that the framers of the American Constitution did not intend to make the President elected by the people. He was to be elected by a nonpartisan body of men—the electors, the chosen few. The extensive use of the veto was begun by Jackson when he asserted that the Congress was not as amenable to the people as the President, for the President "is the direct representative of the people elected by the people and is responsible to them." From that time on the veto power exercised by the American Executive has been sanctioned by public opinion.

The presidential veto has succeeded because, quoting Bryce, "the President, being an elective and not a hereditary magistrate, is responsible to the people, and has the weight of the people behind him." The veto as an institution has always failed or has become obsolete whenever it is exercised by an authority not responsible to the people. The King of England, ever since the time of Queen Anne, more than 200 years ago, has never exercised it, although theoretically he has still this power. The only probable occasion in which he may veto acts passed by Parliament is when he is so advised by his responsible ministry. This will happen only when the Cabinet is at odds with Parliament. But we do not want to bring an analogy between England and the Philippines.

England is an independent country and her Parliament is a sovereign body. An analogy is closer between the Philippines and an English self-governing colony. In English self-governing colonies the governor represents the sovereignty of the metropolis, England. He has, like our own governor, veto power in legislation. Quoting the rules and regulations issued by the colonial office on legislative councils and assemblies in English self-governing colonies, "in every colony the governor has authority either to give or to withhold his assent to laws passed by the other branches or members of the legislature, and until that assent is given no such law is valid or binding." The colonial legislature, like our own legislature, is limited by the charter, equivalent to our Jones Act.

The extent of the autonomy granted the English self-governing colonies and that given the Filipinos under the preamble of the Jones Act is strangely similar; in English self-governing colonies the rule is that, in all matters of local concern, the local authorities should be given a free hand, and in matters of impartial concern the metropolis, represented by the governor, should act. In the Philippines the purpose is to give the Filipinos as large a control of their domestic affairs as will not impair the exercise of American sovereignty. In pursuance of the English principle, an English governor has refrained from vetoing legislation of purely local concern. Yet it must not be supposed that he is not often tempted to use his veto power when he sees faulty legislation. The mode of correcting legislation in an English colony is different. Says Todd: "Since the concession of responsible colonies of Great Britain, as well as formerly, the Imperial Government, while seldom resorting to the extreme measure of disallowing colonial acts, has repeatedly pointed out, in dispatches from the secretary of state for the colonies to the governor of the colony, errors, defects, or omissions in colonial laws, which required to be remedied by further legislation, and has cautioned the colonial government as to the spirit in which certain exceptional powers, granted by a colonial act, which had been approved by the Imperial Government, should be made use of, so as to avoid abuse or oppression. In this way the paternal oversight of Her Majesty's Government has frequently been exercised for the benefit of the colonies without encroachment."

VETO SHOULD BE USED ONLY TO PROTECT AMERICAN SOVEREIGNTY.

We venture to suggest that our Governor General is not justified, as a matter of policy, to use his veto as an active instrument of legislation. It is the purpose of the Jones Act to give complete legislative power to the Filipino people in their domestic affairs. The Governor's veto is intended to be used only on extraordinary occasions, when the rights of American sovereignty are at stake. To use it as the President of the United States uses his veto power is tantamount to making the Governor General a veritable autocrat. It must be remembered that the President's present influence on American legislation is primarily due to his veto power. In fact, his recognized leadership has been brought about mainly through the exercise of that power. "The President," says Woodrow Wilson, "is no greater than his prerogative of veto makes him." But the success of his exercise of that power has been made possible only by his popular representation; he is the people's national representative. His veto is indirectly the people's own veto. The case of our Governor General is different. He represents external control, foreign to and not representative of the people. Unless advised by responsible Filipino counselors or by an overwhelming Filipino public opinion, his veto can not be said to be the people's veto. Consequently it should be very sparsely used. It would be more fitting for him to adhere to the practice of the early American Presidents who used that power only to protect the Executive and the Constitution from congressional encroachments. Such a practice would be entirely in consonance with the purpose of the Jones Act and totally in accord with the modern exercise of the veto by an executive irresponsible to the people.

The foregoing considerations were undoubtedly the reasons why Governor General Harrison did not often exercise his veto power.

Throughout the five years of his rule under the Jones law he vetoed only five bills. During his first year he vetoed three which were of a domestic nature, but the leaders made such a fight that afterwards he realized the necessity of refraining from vetoing domestic bills. In 1921, just before he left, he vetoed two bills, one providing for compulsory education for children in the mountain Province and the other for the investment of sinking funds of friar lands estates, the bonds of which are held by American investors. It thus appears that Governor General Harrison tried to confine himself to the spirit of the Jones law.

VIOLATION OF SPIRIT OF JONES LAW.

The recent vetoing of the 16 bills by Governor General Wood is decidedly a violation of the spirit of the Jones law. He can not convince us that worse laws have been recently passed than two or three years ago. Some of the 16 laws vetoed carry splendid ideas, as he himself admits, like the laws creating cities. There may be one or two faulty parts, which may be corrected by subsequent legislation.

Our legislature, on the other hand, would do well to have more care in drafting and passing bills. It is often hard to resist the temptations of individual members in favor of local, petty, nonnational legislation. The 48 American legislatures found it so; hence the people got tired of them and began tying their hands. Many States limited the sessions of the legislature to do the least evil. Others limited their functions to certain subjects specified in the Constitution. Still others welcomed the veto of the governor, because the governor represents national interests and sentiments better. Everywhere there seems to be a distrust in legislatures, except in the Philippines, for the simple reason that in the Philippines our legislators are the only elective officials and they represent the national aspirations. This is the more reason why it is absolutely necessary that the proper procedure and care in framing legislative programs should be adopted to avoid the passage of bad laws.

PRINCIPLE OF AUTONOMY DEAR TO FILIPINOS.

But the principle which the Filipinos above all things fight for is autonomy. If the governor does not see his way clear to sign bills without approving every line of them, surely the Jones law should be changed. We believe that he is sincere, but mistakes the spirit of the Jones law; and if he is not in principle against autonomy but simply believes that the Jones law places upon him the responsibility of one-man government, then he should be the first one to recommend for a change. Certainly the present situation can not be tolerated, and with the present rate of the governor's vetoing of bills our autonomy becomes nothing but a shadow, because in matters pertaining to the executive departments he is also a one-man ruler. A great many of the old practices, whereby each secretary is given sufficient freedom of action, is also abolished.

ABUSE OF VETO MAY CAUSE REACTION IN PUBLIC SENTIMENT.

Nothing but the embers of the old autonomy now remain. Many of the practices and understandings which form the warp and woof of our past autonomous government are now gone. We have been forced to take backward steps, and unless something extraordinary is done in Washington, we fear a reaction by the people. That is why it has always appeared to the writer that the fight on leadership was a fight over a shadow, with the substance gone. There was plenty of ground to fight in the time of Harrison's administration, but with this new order of things what is left to our representatives is not worthy of the tremendous upheaval the leadership fight has produced. What is needed, if Governor Wood believes that the Jones law gives him powers which he must perforce exercise, is a change of the organic law, with independence, if possible; without independence, if we must.

The present situation can not long remain without arousing the tremendous opposition of the people.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I shall support this bill, and it will doubtless be generally supported by the Members upon this side. I had hoped that my friend, the chairman of the Committee on Insular Affairs [Mr. TOWNER], would by this time have found an opportunity to deal with the question which is so much broader than the question presented by this bill, the question of granting to the people of the Philippine Islands their independence. I recall the fact that six years ago a Virginia Representative, William A. Jones, a stainless gentleman and a very able statesman, threw his intellect and soul into the effort to have a declaration made by Congress, which was made almost unanimously, that when a stable government is established in the Philippines the people of those islands shall be granted their independence.

Mr. TOWNER. If the gentleman will allow me, an opportunity will be given for discussing that matter very soon and doubtless it will be discussed at that time.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. What time does my friend fix for that?

Mr. TOWNER. Within a month. The commission will be here about the 1st of June.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. The declaration to which I have referred was made in 1916. Two years before that declaration was made a great American, Mr. Roosevelt, stated his strong desire that, because of the circumstances he detailed, the Filipinos should be given their independence. He said, "The Philippines, from a military standpoint, are a source of weakness to us." I have no doubt that he was considering, first, the possibility of being involved in war with some other power, and then another possibility which we trust will never materialize. As to the latter possibility his thought was perhaps in line with the thought of Edmund Burke, who said of a condition which we all remember, "We should reflect how we are going to govern a people who think they ought to be free and think they are not."

The dream of Philippine independence that was expressed in the Jones Act of 1916 now seems to be fading away, and instead of the prospect of that dream being soon fulfilled we find, unfortunately, that there appears to be a sentiment growing in the opposite direction. Yet I believe the evidence fairly shows that what the Jones law anticipated has occurred and that the Filipinos are now entitled to expect a realization of the promise that we made to them six years ago. The best testimony seems to be to that effect. We have all of us received lately recent books containing a discussion of the subject by Burton Harrison and Charles Edward Russell, which is to that effect.

Every bill of this character tends to strengthen the adverse influences, because every such bill when enacted assures a further investment in the Philippine Islands by those who will thus acquire a motive to resist the policy advocated by Mr. Jones, by Roosevelt, and by Mr. Wilson, who during the last Congress, I believe, on two occasions sent a message to Congress urging that the promise of 1916 be performed. I have great confidence in my friend the chairman of the committee. I am glad of his assurance, and I earnestly trust that the result of the investigation which he forecasts will be that the United States should say to these people, "You have a government that justifies and warrants you in calling upon this Government to surrender the control which it now exercises over you." [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The extension of remarks referred to are here printed in full as follows:

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, in support of H. R. 293, a bill to provide for the independence of the Philippine Islands, introduced by me in the House on April 11, 1921, and now before the Committee on Insular Affairs, I desire to insert an article on "The Philippines: Independent or vassal?", written by Charles Edward Russell and published in the Nation on April 26, 1922.

The article is as follows:

NEWS FROM THE PHILIPPINES.

The Herald, a daily newspaper of Manila, owned and conducted by Filipinos, printed a cartoon in which Governor General Wood was depicted as about to stab with a dagger labeled "Veto" a lady labeled "P. I. (Philippine Island) Autonomy." The American colony resented this, deeming it seditious and libelous. Prosecution was threatened. The editor apologized. The incident closed. Give yourselves no concern about it, good people in America. It was but the extravagance of a few hot-headed, misguided youths. All is still well with us in our island dominions.

Thus the dispatches allaying uneasiness and seeking to renew our pleasant belief that aside from a few noisy politicians the Filipinos are blissfully content with their dependent State. Unfortunately the blithesome spirit that seems to animate these dispatch writers is unwarranted. Not all goes well with us in the Philippines. The incident of the cartoon was not a negligible outburst of youth. It was a symptom of a condition, profound and disquieting. Other such symptoms have protruded for our noting. As a rule we have chosen to ignore them. Still other manifestations will follow of the same order. If we choose we can ignore them also. But what we are likely to meet if we press upon that path promises nothing for optimism.

"The Emperor of the French 'walked his own wild road whither that led him,'" observes McCarthy, describing the exploits in Mexico of Napoleon III. In spite of so many warnings, so many solemn facts that pointed him backward, Sedan and ruin were the ending of that road. We might profitably remember that there are moral no less than physical and imperial Sedans. After all our professions of altruism and the better ideals, what shall be our position before the world when we come to the pass of retaining only by superior brute force and the pointed rifles an unwilling nation that shall thrust into our faces meanwhile the dishonor of broken covenants and pledges travestied for the lust of profits and territory?

Toward some such disaster the signs now point us as plainly as those Louis Napoleon disregarded. Yet it is to be assumed that if we progress along a wild road of our own we walk more blindly than deliberately. Very likely the Nation has never considered with attention what is going on in the Philippines; very likely it has had little chance for such considering. As to this judge for yourselves:

The people of the Philippines received with deep resentment the news of the findings of the Wood-Forbes mission. The substance of that report consists, in plain terms, of reasons discovered why we should disregard our promises and should keep the islands. When this fact was understood by the natives, only the swift and skillful efforts of their leaders prevented a popular demonstration that would have left the people of the United States in no uncertainty as to the real temper of the islanders. Of this menacing situation the regular news channels carried not a word. To this day the masses of Americans have no reason to doubt that the Filipinos acquiesced graciously in the unfavorable verdicts of the Woods-Forbes report. The facts as to the popular resentment and its meaning reached Washington in a cable dispatch to the Philippine Commissioners. When because of its grave significance this was offered to the news bureaus none of them would handle it. Yet it was more important to the American people than any news the bureaus sent out that day.

Thus, intentionally or unintentionally, most of the information from the Philippines comes to us filtered, censored, or distorted. A few days ago one of the most reputable newspapers published a special cable dispatch from Manila about the delegation the Philippine Legislature is about to send to Washington to protest against the Wood-Forbes report and to ask for independence. This dispatch observed sneeringly that the delegation was to be composed of politicians only; that in spite of the bankrupt condition of the country great sums of money were to be spent for its luxurious transport and accommodations; that the people had no interest in the mission and none in independence. It would be hard to say which of these assertions was the hardiest adventure in error. We may judge of all by searching as a sample the allegation of Philippine bankruptcy. There is no such thing. The country is rich, resourceful, prosperous. Taxes there are among the lowest in the world. In 1919 they were less than 6 per cent per capita as against 21.41 per cent in the United States and 33.08 per cent in Canada. There is no real shortage of public revenues, and if there were it could easily be remedied by an almost imperceptible increase in taxation and without borrowing a dollar.

The assertion that only politicians desire independence is perilous stuff to be circulating in this country. It is untrue and viciously misleading. These people have a background of 350 years of struggle for liberty. They have their historic heroes of that struggle dear to them as Winkelried to the Swiss and Emmet to the Irish. They have their records of brave deeds, wonderful sacrifices, during revolutions. American history, taught in their schools for 22 years, has fortified and deepened the lessons of their own. They have set their hearts upon freedom and nationality. They will never be satisfied with anything else. We may, if we please, shoot them into submission. We can not kill their aspirations. For all our guns and all our troops they will be henceforth our most reluctant subjects.

Even the Wood-Forbes mission, unfriendly to independence, recorded the evidences it found everywhere, except in the Moro country, of this seated conviction. It was evidence not needed. Since 1916 the Government has been in the hands chiefly of a legislature elected by the people. At every session it has demanded independence and appropriated the people's money to get it. At each succeeding election the legislators that have done the most for independence have won the largest popular votes. No opposition has appeared anywhere to separation; the only criticism of the party in power has been for not doing enough for it.

It is true that the franchise is not universal. As yet women do not vote, and the male suffrage has some moderate limitations for literacy and tax paying. But at the last general election 635,000 votes were cast, and of those that did not vote it is impossible that any considerable number was opposed to independence.

If, then, we believe in popular mandates, here is one from which we have no escape, for it is flawless and final.

Against this is flaunted the terrible Moro, pictured as furious against separation and devoted to American rule. Viewed impartially the portraiture has never been convincing to me. When I was in the Moro country I could never detect that the general feeling about independence was different from that in the northern provinces, and I have letters from representative Moros assuring me that it is not. At Zamboanga in the beautiful public square they were building a monument to Rizal as handsome as any other in the country; in all ways they seemed to have for his memory no less of reverence than their northern fellow countrymen. Rizal is the national hero of the independence cause; hence I am obliged to regard this fact as more significant than any off-hand statements.

But even if it is true that leading Moros are opposed to independence we are to remember that in a total population of 10,500,000 all the Moros number fewer than 400,000. Of these, many live on distant islands or in remote regions, so that their views on the subject have never been learned, and nobody can speak with authority about them. Most important fact of all, the Moros are not racially different from the other Filipinos. We are likely to think they are from what we read about them, but they are not. They are all Filipinos together. The only differences among them are religious. The Moros are Mohammedans (after a modified style of Islam), and most of the rest are Christians; 9,463,751 Christians against 886,999 non-Christians of all varieties—Mohammedans, pagans, Buddhists. It appears, then, that the prominence given to the ideas of the Moros on this subject is fictitious. By no possibility can they number more than 4 per cent of the population, and it would make no difference if they were all antiseparatists.

Of a piece with this is the stress laid on the supposed financial difficulties of the islanders. It is proposed to have Congress raise the debt limit that a new issue of bonds may relieve the stringency—$25,000,000 worth. No country, judged by its resources, is less in need of such help. Yet when the governor general vetoes 16 bills, most of them appropriating money, the fact is used to illustrate the poverty into which the native Government has plunged the country. Plainly, they are unfitted to govern themselves; look at the mess they have made of their finances. One of the vetoed bills happens to be for the benefit of the University of the Philippines, a native institution with more than 4,000 students and an excellent record. This fact is not exploited in the United States, but to the native mind has a certain peculiar sting. The university has long been a target for attack by the American colony, because it trains young men and women not to manual labor but to intellectual pursuits. Here, then, is the same mingling of race hatred and caste prejudice that we have shown so plainly in our dealings with Haiti and Santo Domingo. In the view of the average American in the Philippines the office of the Filipino is menial. The university has thus become to both sides a symbol of combat. It was this blow at the plexus of their ambitions that incited the Filipinos to the "veto" cartoon and will probably incite them to still other reprisals.

One phase of the contest Americans at home will easily understand if they will look beneath the arguments urged against independence. Nothing could be simpler. Under American rule Philippine products are admitted to the United States duty free, with the result that a large trade has been developed in Philippine staples. With independence American tariff duties would be effective against all these, and American capital invested in them would suffer loss. And what are these staples? Tobacco, sugar, hemp, lumber, vegetable oil. And to what doors do these investments lead? To the greatest and most powerful financial interests in America. And how far off are the interests that induced us to intervene in Haiti? Not a block. Should not this open all eyes?

Of two other facts in our relations with these people we can now be reasonably sure: First, the agitation for independence will grow until we can no longer ignore or belittle it; second, if that crisis shall require the armed forces of the United States again to confront a people struggling to be free, it will be no excursion in pleasure. An ill country is this for white men to fight in.

Before long we shall have to come to some definite decision as to these issues. The Filipinos are no fools, but people of swift and alert reasoning powers. They know well enough that all discussion in this country as to whether they are fitted for self-government, whether they govern well, whether the Moros think this or that, is idle and irrelevant. By the act of August 29, 1916, the United States pledged itself to grant independence to the Philippine Islands "as soon as a stable government can be established therein." Of any other condition, not a word, not a syllable, not a hint. For more than five years the people of the Philippines have conducted a government that rests upon their own mandate. Has it been stable? Upon this question and this alone the whole controversy must be judged. Apply to the government thus established and conducted any test of stability known to international practice. Apply the definitions given by President McKinley, by Mr. Root when he was Secretary of State, and note the result.

President McKinley said a stable government was "one capable of maintaining order and observing its international obligations, insuring peace and tranquillity and the security of its citizens as well as our own."

Mr. Root said it was one "elected by the suffrages of its people and supported by them, capable of maintaining order and of fulfilling its international obligations."

Judged by these standards, no more stable government has existed anywhere in these five years.

As to security of life and property, but for the shame involved, I should urge comparison of Philippine conditions with the homicide record of Chicago, 141 in six months, with New York undergoing a crime wave, with conditions in any great American city.

The Filipinos have fulfilled their part of the contract. We must fulfill ours or violate it, and that in short order.

But if for the sake of profits and imperial ambition we purpose to keep the Philippines, contract or no contract, why not say so frankly and prepare to turn to the world's derision whatsoever of brazen brow we can manage? To pretend that we are keeping them for the glory of God and the welfare of the Filipino soul is the style of nauseous hypocrisy at which a disillusioned world now heaves the gorge. Of this pious cocking of one eye to heaven while the other busily scans the balance sheet it has had enough with overmeasure. In such exploits of the commercial Tartuffe it recognizes now the very root and essence of the cause of war—if we care about that. And if our professed aversion to war concerns only war with peoples of our own complexion and we have no objection to bringing it upon brown, yellow, and black men, why not be candid enough to acknowledge that likewise?

The Clerk read the bill for amendment, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands, and to provide a more autonomous government for these islands," approved August 29, 1916, as amended by an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands, and to provide a more autonomous government for these islands,'" approved July 21, 1921, be further amended as follows:

That the proviso of section 11 of said act as amended be, and the same is hereby, further amended to read as follows:

"Provided, however, That the entire indebtedness of the Philippine Government created by the authority conferred herein, exclusive of those obligations known as friar land bonds, shall not exceed at any one time 10 per cent of the aggregate tax valuation of its property, nor that of the city of Manila 10 per cent of the aggregate tax valuation of its property, nor that of any Province or municipality a sum in excess of 7 per cent of the aggregate tax valuation of its property at any one time. In computing the indebtedness of the Philippine Government, bonds not to exceed $10,000,000 in amount, issued by that government, secured by an equivalent amount of bonds issued by the Provinces or municipalities thereof, shall not be counted."

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House, with the recommendation that it be agreed to.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. STAFFORD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 10442) to amend an act entitled "An act to declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands, and to provide a more autonomous government for these islands," approved August 29, 1916, as amended by an act to amend said act approved July 21, 1921, and had directed him to report it back with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

HOSPITAL CONSTRUCTION—UNITED STATES VETERANS' BUREAU.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 11547, for the construction of additional hospital facilities for the United States Veterans' Bureau.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 11547. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill H. R. 11547, making an appropriation for additional hospital facilities for patients of the United States Veterans' Bureau.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. TOWNER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of a bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11547) making an appropriation for additional hospital facilities for patients of the United States Veterans' Bureau.

Be it enacted, etc., That for carrying out the provisions of the act entitled "An act to authorize an appropriation to enable the Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau to provide for the construction of additional hospital facilities and to provide medical, surgical, and hospital services and supplies for persons who served in the World War, the Spanish-American War, the Philippine insurrection, and the Boxer rebellion, and are patients of the United States Veterans' Bureau," approved April 20, 1922, there is appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $12,000,000, and in addition to this amount the Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau, subject to the approval of the President, may incur obligations for the purposes herein set forth not to exceed in the aggregate $5,000,000.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, Congress passed an act, which was approved April 20, 1922, authorizing an expenditure of $17,000,000 for additions and hospitalization facilities now at the disposal of the veterans of all the previous wars. In the consideration of the appropriation bill which is now pending it was ascertained that to-day we have 8,464 general and surgical cases that are being treated under the present hospital facilities; neuropsychiatric cases, 9,104; tuberculosis cases, 11,469; making a total of 29,037. The number of cases in each class expected to be reached in 1926, which is said by those who have experience to be the period of the peak, is as follows: General cases, 7,000, so that there will be a reduced number; neuropsychiatric cases, 15,000, an increase over the number we have now; and tuberculosis cases, 13,000; making a total of 35,000.

Congress authorized 14 months ago the expenditure of $18,600,000 to provide facilities for the care of sick and wounded soldiers. There is $9,161,000 of that $18,000,000 unexpended. That does not mean that the money is not obligated, because contracts have been let which will consume the entire amount. But there is $9,161,000 unexpended. For the period of the last 14 months progress that should have been made in the preparation of facilities for the care of these men has not been made. It is said by the Director of the Veterans' Bureau that if this appropriation should be made he will at once begin the preparation of plans under which contracts will be let, and that within 12 months from the time the appropriation becomes available he will have every facility to meet the needs of the soldiers, and that he will make much more rapid progress in the future than has been made in the past.

The provision for facilities to be placed at the disposal of the wounded veterans under the $18,600,000 appropriation has been under the jurisdiction of a board. That board seems not to have made the progress which it should have made, and hence it is we are short of facilities, particularly for neuropsychiatrie and tuberculosis cases. We have all the facilities and more than we need for general and surgical cases.

There are many facilities now at the disposal of the Government which are in temporary buildings—some of them old, ordinary cantonment buildings in a bad condition; inconvenient, old wooden buildings under the jurisdiction of the Marine Hospital Service. Others are in contract hospitals, many uninviting, and in many such cases the men are not able to get the treatment which the Government wishes to give to them. There are a great many men being cared for in the Naval and Army hospitals. They do not like to go to the Army and Naval hospitals, as the director of the bureau says, because the discipline in these hospitals is more rigid than in the hospitals under the jurisdiction of the Public Health Service. They object to the discipline. The part of the discipline they object to is that which requires them to scrub or polish the floor. They think they are there as patients and not as employees of the Navy, and the director of the bureau thinks that they are justified in that objection. So, while we have many beds vacant in Naval and Army hospitals, it is impossible to get the men to go to these places. Hence the necessity for new and better facilities for their care.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I understand that the bill appropriates $17,000,000.

Mr. MADDEN. The bill appropriates $12,000,000 now and authorizes that contracts may be let for the entire $17,000,000.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That is what I wanted to ask. What is the $5,000,000 for? Is that for the construction of new hospitals?

Mr. MADDEN. The whole $17,000,000 is for the construction of new hospitals, but the director of the bureau says that he will not be able to use more than $12,000,000 of it during the next fiscal year.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Is no portion of the $17,000,000 to be expended, or can it not be expended for the purchase of hospitals already in existence?

Mr. MADDEN. Let me read what the law provides:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau, subject to the approval of the President, is hereby authorized to provide additional hospital and out-patient dispensary facilities for persons who served in the World War and are patients of the United States Veterans' Bureau, by purchase and remodeling or extension of existing plants, and by construction on sites now owned by the Government or on sites to be acquired by purchase, condemnation, gift, or otherwise, such hospitals and out-patient dispensary facilities to include the necessary buildings and auxiliary structures, mechanical equipment, approach work, roads, and trackage facilities leading thereto, vehicles, live stock, furniture, equipment and accessories, and also to provide accommodations for officers, nurses, and attending personnel; and also to provide proper and suitable recreational centers; and the Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau is authorized to accept gifts or donations for any of the purposes named herein.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The word "purchase" answers what I had in mind. It allows him to purchase a hospital.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What is the $5,000,000 specifically appropriated for? How do you divide it up into $12,000,000 and $5,000,000?

Mr. MADDEN. We do not divide it up. We simply authorize the whole $17,000,000, except that we give them only $12,000,000 of cash at this time and $5,000,000 contract authorization.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Then he can do as he pleases with the $12,000,000?

Mr. MADDEN. He can do as he pleases with the $17,000,000.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I presume $12,000,000 would be available until expended?

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. And it is expected that the $12,000,000 will cover all of the expenditures during the next fiscal year?

Mr. MADDEN. We are so advised by the director of the bureau.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Then the director does not expect to have all of these hospitals finished within the course of the year, as he told us?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; he expects to have them all finished within the course of a year, but he will not be required to make all of the payments within the year. He expects to have them all completed, and he says definitely that he will have them completed.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Does the gentleman know how he proposes to proceed, whether he is going to establish an architectual department of his own or let contracts for architectual work, or get that done by the other departments of the Government?

Mr. MADDEN. We have his word to this effect on that question. We definitely have his reply to a question asked by me. We were very anxious that he should not under any circumstances establish a new construction division of the Government, and we wanted to know whether he was going to use the facilities the Government already has or was going to establish a new construction bureau. He promised us positively that he would use the facilities which the Government now has, use them all if it was necessary, through which they will be able to make plans, both in the Army and in the Navy and in the Treasury Department, and to the extent that he can use them, expedite the work. He proposes to use them without putting an additional man on the pay roll anywhere.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Does he propose to let any of the work of the preparation of plans and specifications and supervision of construction to outside architects?

Mr. MADDEN. None at all.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I will say to the gentleman if that had been made clear before the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds we would have saved some time in the consideration of the bill.

Mr. MADDEN. We have his absolute pledge that no part of this money will be used to create any new organization within the Government, and that all of the work to be done, not only as to making plans and specifications, but superintending the work of construction and making the contracts, will be done by the agencies already in existence.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I am glad the Committee on Appropriations got better assurance than the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds could get on those points.

Mr. MADDEN. If we had not had that assurance, we would have written it into the bill.

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. LOWREY. The gentleman says there is room, quite a good deal, in the Army and the Navy hospitals.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. LOWREY. Since we are now cutting down the Army and the Navy, it seems to me that some of those hospitals might be turned to this purpose without enforcing the discipline of which they complain. Has there been any discussion of that?

Mr. MADDEN. That has not been taken up by our committee, but we suggested that we would like very much to take the present facilities and utilize them to the fullest possible extent. We have been assured by the Director of the Veterans' Bureau that it is not possible to use the facilities to a greater extent than they are now being used, and he also says that 13,000 of the beds now available in the hospitals owned by the Government will probably have to be relinquished for the reasons:

(a) Marine hospitals which will probably have to be vacated to make room for beneficiaries of the United States Public Health Service, now hospitalized by the United States Veterans' Bureau.

(b) Leased hospitals which will probably have to be given up upon the expiration of the lease, and hospitals of temporary wooden construction, which in time will have to be evacuated. We have 13,000 beds available that by the time the proposed buildings are completed will probably have to be given up in any case, and hence the necessity for early, immediate, and expeditious action on the work under the bill now proposed.

Mr. LOWREY. My idea is this: Suppose there are three Army and Navy hospitals and that there are patients enough to fill only two of them. If you can not use them, why not temporarily turn over one of them to the Veterans' Bureau and fill the other two?

Mr. MADDEN. There is one more thing that may be said in connection with this, and that is that in many cases where vacant beds exist they are not so located as to be available without compelling the patient to travel from one end of the country to the other.

Vacant beds are not always what they seem, because they are not where they can be used, and while we have a number of vacant beds in a number of places they are so scattered they are really not available.

Mr. LOWREY. And evidently it would not do to transport them an unreasonable distance.

Mr. MADDEN. It looks as if something must be done and be done quickly to meet the present needs.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will permit, during the consideration of the War Department appropriation bill the Army officer in charge of appropriations for Army hospitals testified that there was then and have been for more than a year past 1,200 beds available.

The gentleman has stated one of the reasons why the veterans do not care to go into these Army hospitals is because they are obliged to do charwomen's service, like scrubbing the floor. I wish to inquire whether the committee considered the removal of that objection so as to save money by providing that war veterans in an Army hospital should be relieved of charwomen's service so there would not be any excuse for not being sent to the Army hospitals?

Mr. MADDEN. The Committee on Appropriations not having legislative jurisdiction did not feel that it had the right to report legislation granting that relief; but I think, however, that the act under which the appropriation is contemplated is sufficiently broad to enable the President of the United States to issue any order that he may think proper to issue. I believe we ought not to invade the President's jurisdiction inasmuch as it is set out definitely and clearly in the act itself.

Mr. EDMONDS. I would like to ask the gentleman why the third district seems to be neglected in this matter?

Mr. MADDEN. I will say to the gentleman that I have nothing to do with the fixing of the districts nor had we anything to do with making the table indicating where the buildings are to be constructed.

Mr. EDMONDS. Who did fix them?

Mr. MADDEN. They are fixed by the President and the Director of the Veterans' Bureau, and it is a matter of information which they gave to us.

Mr. EDMONDS. Does the gentleman think the third district is more healthy than the eighth district, which the gentleman represents?

Mr. MADDEN. I have not the faintest idea. I have no more idea where they were to go than the man in the moon. We simply bring to you the information which was given to us by those who are charged with the responsibility of adjusting and locating these buildings and construction.

Mr. EDMONDS. The gentleman would not like to state that the third district is more healthy than the eighth?

Mr. MADDEN. I would not think it is. I do not know anything about the districts. I do not know what district I am located in.

Mr. EDMONDS. In the eighth.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Can the gentleman tell us if it is the policy, where the Government owns ample ground and a well located hospital already established, and additional hospitals are needed in that district, whether these grounds will be utilized or whether new hospitals will be built?

Mr. MADDEN. My understanding from the Director of the Veterans' Bureau is that he has already practically decided upon the location of the hospitals; that every one except one, as far as I am able to say, is to be erected on ground owned by the Government of the United States or on ground to be donated by private individuals, but whether he wants to enlarge existing facilities I do not know, but I should judge not from what he says.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Well, for instance, on ample ground where a hospital is already established, would it be considered advisable that the facilities be distributed or be kept somewhat concentrated in the center of the district?

Mr. MADDEN. I judge from what the Director of the Veterans' Bureau says that he will endeavor to distribute the hospital facilities at the most convenient points, and not to concentrate them in some given place.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. That is what I wanted to know, if the Government already owns the site and a hospital is in the center of the district——

Mr. MADDEN. The director says he is going to erect the buildings on Government lands wherever they are owned, except in one case.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The authority is in the President and the Director of the Veterans' Bureau?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. And they will locate them where they think best.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS] asked a question of the gentleman about the eighth district getting a larger amount——

Mr. MADDEN. He did not say that. He asked if it was more healthy.

Mr. STAFFORD. The fact is, as the gentleman knows, that as far as Wisconsin and Michigan are concerned they had more casualties in the service than any other district. That means the Director of the Veterans' Bureau would provide additional hospitals?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not think he will locate any building except where he believes the necessity is the greatest.

I think I have said all I care to say concernnig the bill.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that I have requests from this side for 45 minutes, of which I would like to have 20 minutes myself.

Mr. MADDEN. I will yield all the time I have to the gentleman from Tennessee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized for one hour.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, there is no objection from any member of the committee, or, I am sure, from any Member of the House, to this bill as reported from the Committee on Appropriations. The committee in presenting this bill has simply carried out the mandate of the House and of the Congress expressed the other day in authorizing the construction of additional hospitals in the sum of $17,000,000 for the disabled veterans of the World War. As explained by the gentleman from Illinois, this bill provides for $12,000,000 in cash and gives to the Director of the Veterans' Bureau full authority to contract for the construction of hospitals to the full extent of $17,000,000, by and with the approval of the President. It does not appropriate the entire $17,000,000 in cash at this time because the Director of the Veterans' Bureau stated that $12,000,000 would be ample for present purposes.

There should never be any hesitancy or delay in providing ample appropriations for the disabled soldier. He is entitled to the very best care and treatment that a grateful Government and country can give him. He freely and patriotically offered his life in behalf of his country, and now that he is disabled as a result of wounds or disease incurred by reason of his service, it should never be permitted to be said that his country was either ungrateful or unmindful of his sacrifices and that it failed to provide for him the very best hospital accommodations and treatment and proper compensation. The American people desire that they be given the very best care and treatment possible, and their Representatives in Congress will, I am quite sure, vote every dollar that is necessary for that purpose without regard to cost. The Director of the Veterans' Bureau states that it is his purpose to begin the construction of these hospitals without delay and that they will be ready for occupancy within nine months after the contracts are let. Only about one-half of the previous hospital appropriation of $18,600,000 has been expended up to this time, the remaining hospitals being now under way.

Colonel Forbes, who has been given direct charge of this appropriation, assures the committee that greater speed will be made under this appropriation. He very fully appreciates the importance of speedy action and is anxious, of course, to see that the disabled veteran is provided with proper hospitalization and that every consideration is given to his comfort. I am glad to give my hearty support to this bill, and I am happy to believe that when the hospitals now under way are completed, and those here authorized are provided, that there will be full and ample accommodations provided for every disabled veteran of the war. If not it is quite certain that additional appropriations will be forthcoming.

I regret personally that this bill was called up at this time without previous notice, because there is no particular urgency for its passage to-day. It could have been passed on Monday or Tuesday, or on to-morrow, without the slightest detriment to the service. In fact, I had understood that it would not be called up for several days, and only yesterday the majority leader stated that there would be only two measures which would be called up to-day. And I want now to protest as earnestly as I can against this calling up of bills without at least consulting or, rather, indicating or giving notice to minority Members that bills will be called up. It so happened when the unanimous consent was requested for the consideration of this bill that I had just left the Chamber for a moment.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. And I had no knowledge of the fact that it was to be called up at this time, and I think I was entitled to the courtesy of being notified that this request was to be made.

Mr. MADDEN. I had not any idea myself that we were going to get to it until I saw there was likely to be an opening this afternoon, and the House is likely not to meet to-morrow, and I assume all responsibility for anything that has been done, without any intention whatever, as I am sure the gentleman from Tennessee knows, of ignoring anybody.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am quite sure of it, and I certainly acquit the gentleman from Illinois of any intention to ignore any minority member of the committee. But I simply have stated what I have for the future, because there are a number of Members who have spoken to me with reference to getting time on this particular bill. And I am put in a rather embarrassing position by the fact that this bill was called up without previous notice to me, so that I could have notified those gentlemen and attempted to secure for them the right to discuss some matters they wanted to present when this bill was taken up. And I have said what I have said more by way of defense of myself and of explanation to them than for any other reason.

As I have stated, there is absolutely no objection to this bill. We are all for it, and of course it will pass without any objection upon the part of any Member of the House. I want to take advantage of the latitude allowed under general debate to discuss for a very few minutes another subject.

On April 14 the Secretary of the Treasury in a letter to the Finance Committee of the Senate stated that a deficit at the end of the present fiscal year would only be avoided by the postponement of certain railroad obligations until the fiscal year 1923, and that by such postponement there would be a surplus on June 30 of about $47,000,000. If these payments were not postponed the deficit would amount to about $153,000,000. In the same letter he stated that next year the deficit in the Treasury would amount to $484,000,000, which includes $125,000,000 accumulated interest on war savings certificates. This is a stupendous sum. It is nearly as much as was required to pay the entire annual expenses of the Government a little over 20 years ago. The Secretary makes it plain that in figuring this deficit his estimate is based on the estimates of expenditures which appear in the Budget submitted last December. He did not include, therefore, charges on the Treasury for 1923 which have been imposed by act of Congress and otherwise since the December Budget was submitted, or those which are prospective and which will probably be later imposed. His statement did not include $15,000,000 extra appropriation for rivers and harbors; $65,000,000 for the construction of roads; $17,000,000 for additional hospitals; $77,000,000 as the initial payment on soldiers' compensation, which it is stated will go into effect January 1, and the $5,000,000 which it is proposed to loan to Liberia. Neither did it include the $50,000,000 which is proposed for a ship subsidy or the extra appropriation which the administration proposes for the Navy and which it has been estimated will amount to $60,000,000. Nor does it include something like $35,000,000 for the payment of a bonus to civilian employees next year, which Republican leaders tell us will be passed if the reclassification bill is not passed prior to July 1. When these figures are added it will be seen that the deficit next year will amount to at least $758,000,000, and it should be said that certain legislation now pending such as increases in the Army, increased pay of officers, and other legislation which we are told it is proposed to pass will still further increase this deficit. The question naturally arises where the revenues to take care of this deficit are to come from.

In transmitting the estimates for the pending appropriations the President failed to comply, or to even make an attempt to comply, with the plain, positive provisions of the Budget law. Section 203 of that law authorizes the transmission to Congress of supplemental or deficiency estimates, and subdivision B of that section reads as follows:

> Whenever such supplemental or deficiency estimates reach an aggregate which if they had been contained in the Budget would have required the President to make a recommendation under subdivision (a) of section 202, he shall thereupon make such recommendation.

Subdivision (a) of section 202 reads as follows:

> If the estimated receipts for the ensuing fiscal year contained in the Budget, on the basis of laws existing at the time the Budget is transmitted, plus the estimated amounts in the Treasury at the close of the fiscal year in progress, available for expenditures in the ensuing fiscal year, are less than the estimated expenditures for the ensuing fiscal year contained in the Budget, the President in the Budget shall make recommendation to Congress for new taxes, loans, or other appropriate action to meet the estimated deficiency.

The President has wholly ignored this express provision of the statute which made it his plain duty to give Congress the information and recommendations referred to. This particular estimate adds to the stupendous deficit with which our Treasury will be faced next year, but there is not a line of suggestion or recommendation as to what steps Congress shall take to meet it. It is true the Washington Post, the recognized mouthpiece of the administration, has stated that it is understood that some kind of additional taxes will have to be levied upon the people to take care of this deficit, and we can probably accept this as an expression of the views of the President, but the point I am making is that the President should have given this information to Congress when he sent forward this estimate. Are we to understand by his silence that it is intended to permit this immense deficit to drag along until after the election in November, with no effort to make proper provision for it, and that when Congress assembles in December these additional taxes will be imposed? We are told by recognized authority that this deficit will surely occur. The people know that the money must be raised to meet the obligations of the Government. And let me say to my Republican friends that the people will not be deceived, for they will easily see through the ill-conceived purpose in deferring the levying of these additional taxes until after the election in November.

I submit that this is an astounding record for the second year of Republican administration, and in face of the repeated declarations and promises that economies would be instituted and that taxes would be reduced.

The Republican administration and this Congress has claimed entire credit for the enactment of the Budget law, in spite of the plain fact that it was repeatedly urged by the last administration and was voted for by all the Democrats in Congress. But let me say that little credit can be claimed for its enactment by those responsible for its administration if they ignore its plain, positive provisions, as has been done in the present instance.

It will be recalled that last December, when the President transmitted the annual Budget estimates, he forecasted a deficit of over $167,000,000 for the next fiscal year. At that time he failed to submit recommendations as to how it should be taken care of, except to say that it could be easily absorbed by the economies to be effected by the administration and by Congress. It would now appear that in less than six months these so-called economies have served to increase the Treasury deficit for the next year from $167,000,000 to over $758,000,000.

Early in this year the President, with blind confidence, but I am sure with the best of faith, accepted the figures of the Director of the Budget, whose chief business it seems has been to publish to the people how much money the administration is going to save, announced in most general terms that $136,000,000 had been saved in the first six months of the present fiscal year. This statement was published broadcast over the country, and coming as it did from the President, it was, of course, given the fullest credence. On February 9 I introduced a resolution asking the President to specify just where these savings had been made. The resolution was forwarded for reply, but no answer was made. After a period of several weeks, I took occasion on the floor of the House to call attention to the failure to give Congress and the people this information, and I said at the time that it was quite evident that such savings had not been made or that the information would have been promptly forthcoming. On the very next day the Washington Post published, under big headlines, a letter from the President to the Director of the Budget, directing him to forward this information at once. But from that good day to this nothing has been heard from it. I repeat that there is only one inference that can be drawn, for if these savings had been actually made, the figures were undoubtedly on the records of the Bureau of the Budget and could have been forwarded within 24 hours or less, and every reasonable man knows that the administration would have hastened to verify the facts which had been promptly challenged.

Savings by the administration can only consist of funds which have not been expended out of the appropriations previously made by Congress for governmental purposes during the fiscal year. And now the Secretary of the Treasury positively confirms the suspicion that these alleged savings were not made by his statement that a deficit can only be avoided during this year by carrying over into the next fiscal year governmental obligations amounting to some two hundred millions of dollars. By this method he tells us there will be a surplus in the Treasury of $47,000,000 on July 1; and I dare say when that time comes Republican newspapers will have much to say about it, but the people will not forget just how that surplus was brought about.

I have stated that the figures show that with the obligations incurred since the December estimates were submitted by acts of Congress and otherwise, and taking into consideration prospective obligations, those which I understand are to be put through before this Congress adjourns, there will be a deficit, taking the figures of the Secretary of the Treasury as a basis, of over $758,000,000 for the next fiscal year.

Mr. DUNBAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. DUNBAR. Does that deficit of $700,000,000 include next year the payment of the amount we owe the railroads?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes; it includes it.

Mr. DUNBAR. And which is estimated we should have paid this year?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes; it includes that; and the Secretary of the Treasury was particular in the letter to which I have referred to say that it is an express governmental obligation and must be taken care of next year as a governmental obligation.

Mr. McSWAIN. Does the gentleman take into consideration the fact that the Attorney General some weeks ago gave out an interview that there would be obligations imposed on the Government in the way of judgments or claims arising out of war contracts that must be paid in the next 12 months of something like a billion dollars?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman I have not taken that into consideration.

Mr. McSWAIN. The gentleman remembers that he gave that out?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I remember some statement of the kind, but not the exact figures. And any obligation of that sort, or any claim of that kind, which becomes a charge against the Government in 1923 must be added to the figures given by the Secretary of the Treasury and those which I have just given.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. The gentleman, of course, is aware that the $50,000,000 appropriation for the payment of claims against the Shipping Board does not include such claims as are pending in the Court of Claims, admiralty courts, and so forth, aggregating about $200,000,000, and for which additional appropriations will have to be made.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman is correct, and, of course, appropriations necessary to pay those claims adjudicated during the next fiscal year must be added to the figures which I gave as the deficit that will undoubtedly occur, according to the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury himself. And Mr. Lasker, of the Shipping Board, has stated, I believe, that he hopes to close up all of these claims during the next year.

Now, I have referred to this for the purpose, in the first place, of showing just to what extent Congress is creating obligations which the people must take care of, and how little is being done toward making proper provision to meet this deficit next year. We have got to greatly reduce expenditures or raise taxes. The Washington Post was clearly correct, because everybody knows that you can not pay debts without the revenues, and there is only one way that the Government can get the revenues, and that is by taking them out of the pockets of the taxpayers of this country.

Is it the intention to say as little as possible and to do nothing until next December, when, after the election, Congress will be called upon to pass additional tax legislation and increase the taxes which the people were told in the fall of 1920 were going to be reduced? What steps will Congress take? Will it raise taxes or will it issue bonds and make loans to cover this deficit?

That is just the point which I wish to emphasize again, that the Budget law by its plain provisions made it the duty of the President of the United States in a situation of this kind to inform Congress and the people and submit a recommendation as to what steps should be taken to meet the deficit which everyone admits will exist. And that is just what has not been done in this particular instance. I think the people are entitled to know, and certainly Congress is entitled to the benefit of any recommendations that the Chief Executive may have to make with reference to the manner in which we shall take care of this great deficit, which may amount to a billion dollars, as has been demonstrated, before the close of the next fiscal year if something is not done. And I want to say that will inevitably result, unless Congress shall put its foot down on the creation of new offices like the 22 Federal judgeships which are about to be created and the creation of 10 additional revenue collectors at an annual expense of over $500,000, and the increasing of salaries, as has been proposed, and as was actually done in an appropriation bill here the other day, when some 11 men who are bureau chiefs or who hold less responsible positions were given salaries ranging from $5,000 to $6,000.

It is a serious situation, a very serious situation, because while the people are now burdened with debt they are actually confronted with a deficit next year which is practically as much as the amount that was required to run the Government of the United States for all its purposes, civil and military, in the year 1916, only six years ago, under a Democratic administration, and certainly this should be given attention by Congress and by the Executive of the Nation. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DUNBAR].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. DUNBAR. Mr. Chairman, the Secretary of the Treasury in his various interviews and estimates leads Members of Congress and the country into an error, in that he is always predicting a deficit in our revenue and does not call to our attention on what he bases his estimate. So unless his report is investigated and an accounting made of the amount of reduction of public debt due to purchase and cancellation of Government bonds, and charged to operating expenses, one will be misled. The Secretary of the Treasury, in compliance with provisions of law, comes into possession of Government bonds, which are canceled and whatever the amount of bonds so canceled, notwithstanding it results in a reduction of Government debt, all is charged in the ordinary operating expenses.

I remember a year ago he predicted that the deficit in the United States Treasury at the end of the fiscal year 1921 would be something like $400,000,000 or $500,000,000, and instead of there being one dollar of deficiency there was a surplus of over $500,000,000. It is predicted that this year or next we shall have another deficit. I claim that there is nothing to justify the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury that there will be a deficit, either this year or next.

I have in my hand the daily statement of the United States Treasury under date of April 29, 1922, which covers the governmental operations for 10 months during this fiscal year, and in those 10 months the excess of the ordinary receipts over ordinary expenditures is $609,000,000.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will my friend yield to a question?

Mr. DUNBAR. I will.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman stated a moment ago that the Secretary of the Treasury had not given information as to just how this deficit will occur. Has the gentleman read the letter which was sent to the Senate Committee on Finance by the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. DUNBAR. I will tell you what the Secretary of the Treasury overlooked.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I wanted to know if the gentleman had read that letter?

Mr. DUNBAR. I have not.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If the gentleman will get a printed copy of that letter as published on the Senate side and read it he will find four or five pages of figures in which the Secretary of the Treasury goes very fully into the whole matter and gives specifically, figure by figure, just how that deficit will occur.

Mr. DUNBAR. I will tell you what you will find in his letter, because it has occurred in every report. He has included in his ordinary expenditures all money paid into the sinking fund, all of the bonds that are canceled which are received for estate taxes, all of the cancellation of bonds that are received from Europe, all of the cancellation of bonds due to receipts from the Federal reserve bank. During the fiscal year 1921 there was counted as ordinary expenditures the money provided for the purchase and cancellation of more than $422,000,000 worth of bonds. In 1922 there will be canceled something like $400,000,000 worth of Government bonds. In the Treasury statement of April 29 there appears at one place that to date the excess of ordinary receipts over our expenditures and the public-debt expenditures amount to $247,000,000. Then there appears in ordinary expenditures $362,000,000 that have been used for the purpose of redeeming bonds. Both of these items make our ordinary receipts in excess of ordinary expenses for the 10 months of this fiscal year $609,000,000. So that the Secretary of the Treasury, when he makes an estimate of ordinary expenditures for a given year, always estimates in those expenditures all of the money that goes to the sinking fund and money that is used to cancel about $400,000,000 worth of our indebtedness.

The gentleman says that next year we will have a deficit of $600,000,000 or $700,000,000, because next year we will have to pay the money that we owe to the railroads. I want to say that at the beginning of this fiscal year we owed the railroads something like $500,000,000. We do not owe them now more than half of that amount, due to the fact that securities owned by the railroads and held by the Treasury have been sold and used in liquidation of the Government's indebtedness to the railroads.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman means securities owned by the railroads held by the Government.

Mr. DUNBAR. I mean securities owned by the railroads, but put up with the Government as collateral, and these securities have been sold and used to liquidate the Government indebtedness to the railroads. Now, we will owe to the railroads next year about $200,000,000. In the estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury for next year he estimates as ordinary expenditures the cancellation of $370,000,000 worth of bonds. So that while that $700,000,000 may be estimated as a deficit, an allowance must be made for $370,000,000 worth of bonds which are to be canceled. Next year there will be expended for our railroad debt but $200,000,000.

So, according to the Secretary's method of estimating, if our deficit does not amount to more than $700,000,000 there will be no deficit. The Secretary of the Treasury fails to take the public into his confidence and call their attention to the items upon which he bases his figures. Payment due the railroads ought not to be counted in next year's business, because we owe the money now, and according to the figures that we have here we will go through this year and we will have a surplus at the end of the year of nearly $500,000,000. If we paid our railroad debt we would have cash in our Treasury at the end of the fiscal year of $300,000,000. So that if the railroads were paid the amount this year which we ought to pay them it would simply reduce the amount of cash in the Treasury, and next year, even admitting the gentleman's figures to be true, we being relieved of payment to railroads, our revenues, with cash in the Treasury, would meet our expenditures, and there would be no deficit in the finances of the Government.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. How does the gentleman account for the statement made by the President, even assuming now that he is correct and that the Secretary of the Treasury is entirely wrong in his statement? How does the gentleman reconcile the statement he has just made with the statement made by the President of the United States last December, when he said at that time that there would be a deficit of over $167,000,000?

Mr. DUNBAR. Does the gentleman mean for the coming fiscal year?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes. Was the gentleman speaking of this year?

Mr. DUNBAR. No; I was speaking of 1923.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Well, I was speaking of 1923.

Mr. DUNBAR. The deficit of $167,000,000 which he estimated provided for a reduction of the public debt amounting to $370,000,000. Including that, there was an estimate of a deficit of $167,000,000. But we will not now have to pay the railroads the $400,000,000 of indebtedness which some time back it was thought we would have to pay them during the coming fiscal year, because the securities of the railroads which the Government held as collateral have been sold, and those have been applied to a reduction of the debt which we owe to the railroads.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The Secretary of the Treasury is one of the greatest business men in the country, and I am sure the gentleman will agree to that. The Secretary is widely——

Mr. DUNBAR. I do not know how widely he is quoted or how good a business man he is. He presumes sometimes on our ignorance, and he presumes on our ignorance when he reduces the public debt $400,000,000 and has it in as ordinary expenditures.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman does not mean to intimate that the Secretary of the Treasury has not acted in entire good faith?

Mr. DUNBAR. I think the Secretary of the Treasury has acted in entire good faith, but he thinks by scaring us and sounding an alarm that perhaps he will cause us to be more economical, more cautious, and proceed more within our income and thereby obtain better results.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. In other words, the gentleman takes this position that the Secretary of the Treasury is not only justified but has actually been guilty of misrepresenting to Congress for the purpose of insuring that Congress proceed economically?

Mr. DUNBAR. No; he is not chargeable with misrepresentation, because if you will look in his estimates submitted to Congress in December, 1921, you will find that for the fiscal year 1923, when he estimated a deficit of $167,000,000, the sinking fund will receive $283,000,000. You will find in the estimates that the purchase of Liberty bonds from Europe amounts to $30,000,000, which are to be canceled and charged to ordinary operating expenses. You will find in the estimates the redemption of bonds and notes from estate taxes amounting to $25,000,000, which bonds are to be canceled and charged to ordinary operating expenses. If you will look into the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury you will find that the retirement from the Federal reserve bank franchise tax receipts amount to $30,000,000, which bonds will be canceled. If you will look in the estimates, you will find he has provided for the cancellation of $369,333,800 worth of bonds next year, and then, according to his estimate as made at that time, there would be a deficit of $167,000,000. You will be misled unless you know all items contained in the estimates.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. If the gentleman believes that there is going to be a surplus, is he in favor of reducing the taxes or of declaring a dividend?

Mr. DUNBAR. We have already reduced the taxes.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. If you have a surplus, are you in favor of declaring a dividend?

Mr. DUNBAR. It has been anticipated in the reduction of taxes to the amount of $900,000,000. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN].

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, this hospital situation has been the subject of much discussion, and there has developed considerable misapprehension. When I discussed the bill, authorizing the appropriation of $17,000,000, of which this present bill is the sequel carrying out that authorization, I printed in my remarks a summary of the hospital situation in the United States.

Ninety-five hospitals in the United States under the Veterans' Bureau have a total of 27,588 available beds. There are in these 95 hospitals 21,067 patients, which would show on the face of it that there are 5,921 surplus beds; that is, beds unoccupied. Why, then, is there any necessity for the building of these additional hospitals? If the 95 hospitals under the jurisdiction of the Veterans' Board have over 5,000 empty beds, what is the necessity for this bill?

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. The director of the bureau says——

Mr. GRIFFIN. I thought the gentleman wanted to ask a question. If he wants to anticipate, I will say that I asked the question in order to answer it myself. The answer is that the hospitals are so situated and of such character that it is impossible to satisfy the demands of the men or meet the conditions of their ailments. For instance, where the ex-service patient declines to accept hospitalization at a place remote from his home and there are no Government hospital accommodations in his neighborhood, an effort is made by the Veterans' Bureau to place him in a hospital in his vicinity under a contract with its management. In that way veterans of the World War to the number of 9,107 have been assigned to these so-called contract hospitals, and on January 31, 1922, they were distributed as follows: Tuberculosis patients 2,893, neuropsychiatric patients 4,236, and general and surgical 1,978.

CONTRACT HOSPITALS.

Therein lies the basis of the complaints which have been hurled against the Veterans' Bureau and against Congress that there are 9,000 soldiers of the last war who are distributed about the country in contract hospitals. For the care of these men the Government is paying out all the way from $3 to $5.50. In Saranac, where tuberculosis patients are assigned, the Government is paying $3 to $5.50 daily aside from their medical attention.

While it is regrettable that the Government has not the facilities to handle the hospitalization of patients in every case at points convenient to their homes, it is only fair to state that it had to meet conditions which could hardly have been anticipated. The number of surplus beds shows that the Government has the hospital facilities. The trouble is that those facilities are not distributed to the best advantage. It was to cure this defect that we passed the bill on March 30 authorizing an appropriation of $17,000,000 to enable the Director of the Veterans' Bureau to provide new hospitals to meet the situation. The bill before us is the result, and when it is signed by the President it will put $17,000,000 at the disposition of the Veterans' Bureau to build hospitals and sanitoria wherever needed.

THE PROBLEM OF LOCATION.

In deciding that question he has to confront a very difficult problem, chiefly in the location of the tuberculosis hospitals. While the experts say that that dread disease may be successfully treated near the sea, as well as in mountain districts, it is the consensus of opinion among the sufferers—often supported by their family medical advisers—that a high and dry situation is the more effectual. The experts may be right, but, however that may be, there is a deeply rooted conviction among those most vitally interested, namely the patients themselves, that they can obtain the surest relief by securing treatment in a high and dry climate. The psychological effect of this state of mind can not and should not be neglected. There is no sense in compelling a patient to combat his own prejudices as well as his physical and mental ailments. It is to be hoped, therefore, that the Director of the Veterans' Bureau, in the allocation of the hospitals to be built under this appropriation, will respect this attitude of the patients. The experts say that, for the treatment of tuberculosis, fresh air, pure food, rest, and proper medical supervision are the four vital prerequisites. The patients, and also frequently their doctors, say that the air should not only be fresh but dry. This is the bone of contention. The patients may in other ways have wet leanings, but in the matter of air they are "extra" dry.

New York City has put the expert view to the test by establishing a tuberculosis hospital at Sea View, Staten Island, overlooking New York Bay. It was started in 1905 to provide a place for recoverable cases who were averse to being treated a long way from their homes, out of reach of their families. It was recognized that the family tie was an important factor in promoting the peace of mind of the patient—itself one of the main prerequisites to recovery. The hospital has been treating tuberculosis cases since 1913, and, I am informed, has accomplished very satisfactory results.

SEA VIEW HOSPITAL.

When the Fox Hills Hospital was abandoned by the Veterans' Bureau, its patients, upward of 500, were distributed around to various institutions. Where the patients were averse to being sent to the West for treatment, an effort was made to find accommodations for them in the vicinity of New York, and 128 ex-service patients were sent to Sea View Hospital.

Since these men have been there I have received many complaints, mostly from friends of the ex-service men, and have read criticisms of the institution and of its management in the public press.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes.

Mr. LANGLEY. The gentleman from New York was formerly a member of the committee which reported the bill authorizing this appropriation?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes.

Mr. LANGLEY. The gentleman may be going to bring this point out, but I suggest that some of the hearings took place before the gentleman changed his committee assignment, and they indicated that most of the so-called surplus beds were not suited for the treatment of tubercular and neuropyschiatric patients.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I think I said that. I merely asked the question in order to emphasize the answer.

Mr. LANGLEY. As I understand the gentleman's attitude, he is opposed to contract hospitals?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Not at all. There is no way of handling the situation except to assign the men to the contract hospitals, and I am coming now to the Sea View Hospital in New York City, against which there have been hurled some very virulent and unjust criticisms. I received letters from former soldiers and their friends stating that the Sea View Hospital was a pauper hospital; that the food was cooked and served by tubercular patients; that the canteen of the hospital was operated by the superintendent for the benefit of himself personally; and that altogether the living conditions were unwholesome and unsuitable.

Last week I felt it to be my duty to examine the basis of these complaints and I made a personal visit to the institution. This is what I found: Upon an elevation, 400 feet above the sea level, the highest point, I am informed, on the Atlantic coast—I beheld an aggregation of the most magnificent structures that were ever designed anywhere in the world for the treatment of the ills of humanity. The buildings are gracefully spaced in a tract of 367 acres, with ample drives, walks, and shady groves.

I went down there expecting to behold a ramshackle structure, with perhaps a series of wooden dormitories unsuitable for the proper care of the sufferers. Instead, to my surprise, when the auto drove up to the entrance I thought for a moment that I was at the portal of some palatial hotel. The grounds are tastefully embellished, with an eye to beauty as well as to utility. There are pagodas and corridors, ample flowers and foliage, and the eight large ward structures reach out in a semicircle over a quarter of a mile in extent, so that every room in every ward of each of the structures is open to the sunlight all day long for the whole period during which the sun shines. I found the wards, halls, and corridors clean and orderly; the kitchen sanitary and in first-rate condition. There are four doctors, I was informed, assigned to the building devoted to the ex-service men. There are five wards in each structure, and each ward has three women nurses. I found the men apparently contented, with a few exceptions.

The tubercular patients are segregated in building No. 8, and each building of the series is separated from every other. Of the 128 patients in the War Veteran Building, perhaps 60 are ambulant; that is, able to walk around. For the ambulant patients there is also in process of preparation 12 splendid pavilions, the last word in the medical profession for the treatment of tuberculosis.

COMPLAINTS UNFOUNDED.

I am satisfied that many of the complaints and charges to which I refer were made without a personal examination of the institution. I believe it to be my duty to put on the record what my personal examination disclosed. My report may appear to be rosy, but I have the maps and pictures here, and I think they will bear out my statements—at least as to the magnitude, the generosity, and the scientific knowledge with which the establishment was planned.

The city of New York has spent $5,000,000 upon this undertaking. Perhaps size and expenditure are not so important to dwell upon, in view of the fact that there are only 128 patients of the Veterans' Bureau in the entire establishment. One of the criticisms, which I have just mentioned, is that the Veterans' Bureau patients are assigned to a pauper institution. This is unjust. The Sea View Hospital is not a pauper institution. A large number of the patients pay for their board and medical attention. The institution is free to those who can not afford to pay, but those who can afford to pay make compensation to the city for their keep. The only plausible basis for the charge is that on the westerly half of the tract—so far away from the hospital that I could see no sign of it—there is a home farm for the aged. There is no possible way for the patients of the hospital to come in contact with inmates of the poor farm, unless they go deliberately outside the bounds of their own establishment looking for something to worry about. But what they can not do their meddlesome friends can do, and having discovered the poor farm hidden away in the woods, they have dragged it out from its seclusion and have given the soldier boys the idea that the atmosphere is polluted by the contamination of paupers right under their very noses.

I found the food plentiful, wholesome, and well cooked. It is not touched by any patient except the one who eats it. The evening meal on the day I visited the hospital consisted of roast beef, potatoes, bread and butter, cold slaw, tea, milk, and apples. There was no stinting of the portions.

There is a liaison officer assigned to the institution by the Veterans' Bureau—a Dr. R. W. C. Francis—a genial, kindly man who seems to have the interest of the soldier patients foremost in his mind. He inspects the kitchens before each meal, tastes the food prepared to satisfy himself of its proper character and preparation, and is at all times ready to listen to complaints and to see that the soldier patients are treated generously. That is what he is there for—that is the meaning of the term "liaison officer." The Veterans' Bureau pays the city for the treatment of the soldier patients, and Doctor Francis is assigned to the institution to see that they are treated kindly and properly.

There is a canteen attached to the institution. One of the complaints was that it was run by Doctor Kremer, the superintendent, for his own profit. The fact is, it is run by a board of officers, and the profits go toward the purchase of vocational educational supplies, moving pictures, and other comforts and conveniences for the patients.

Another complaint was with respect to leaves of absence or furloughs. The men and their families forget that they are patients under treatment. A very vital part of their treatment is rest, regular hours, and proper diet. If long or frequent leaves were permitted there would be a disturbance of their regular mode of life which would inevitably retard their recovery. A gentle discipline and regularity of living are just as essential to the welfare of the men as they are to the effective management of the institution.

The effectiveness of the treatment is shown by the results. In 1921 there were treated 2,414 patients; of these, 27 were completely cured and 732 were discharged on the road to recovery.

Of course, it is no pleasant lot in life for a young American to find himself an inmate of any institution where his liberties are curtailed, even though the restraints are established for his own ultimate good. But to make discipline bearable there are vocational studies provided—a commercial course, consisting of shorthand, typewriting, arithmetic, algebra, geometry, penmanship, French, commercial art, and mechanical drawing. In addition to this, instructions are given in lamp-shade painting, cabinetmaking, weaving, basket work, dyeing, toy making, metal work, bookbinding, and so forth. Those who do not want to study or work can read to their heart's content. There is a library of 3,200 volumes. Moving pictures are provided twice a week and a vaudeville show is given twice a month in addition to concerts and minstrel shows. On the whole the institution seems to be making a sincere effort to accomplish its purpose, and is entitled to support and encouragement instead of condemnation.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. McSWAIN].

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I shall not detain the committee, and I merely desire to have unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD pertinent to this bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY].

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I desire to commend the committee for presenting this bill appropriating $17,000,000 for the erection of additional hospital facilities for ex-service men. It seems to me that if there is one duty that rests upon us more heavily than all others it is the duty to care for the disabled and the wounded soldiers of the World War. I believe that the Government should provide its own hospitals for the treatment of its veteran patients. While I am sure there are many private hospitals throughout the country in which good treatment could be secured, yet I am of opinion that the best results can only be obtained in Government institutions. Under private and independent management the Government can not in all cases fix the responsibility for the treatment of its soldier patients as it can in hospitals directly managed by those appointed by and under the control of the Government.

It has been said that republics are ungrateful. I trust that that charge shall never be justly and truly made by the wounded or disabled veterans of America against the Government and people for whom they fought. All that stands between this Government and destruction are the lives of those who are willing to serve it and are willing to fight for it.

There are now approximately 9,000 veterans being treated in private hospitals at Government expense. I am glad that the Veterans' Bureau intends to use the money appropriated in this bill to provide Government facilities to care for those 9,000 men. The Government must build and maintain hospitals large enough and numerous enough to treat every disabled or wounded soldier within the broad borders of this Republic. So far Congress has always placed at the disposal of the Veterans' Bureau all the money necessary for allowances, compensation, insurance, hospitalization, vocational training, and other activities of the Veterans' Bureau.

If there is a single disabled or wounded veteran anywhere who has not received what is due him by a grateful country it is not the fault of Congress. If fault there be, it belongs to those whom Congress has directed to execute the law and to whom has been given all the money which has been necessary to carry on the noble and splendid work of relief to the disabled defenders of America.

It is interesting to refer to a statement issued to-day concerning expenditures for Veterans' Bureau purposes.

The expenditures to April 1, 1922, specified, are as follows:

Military and naval family allowances	$298,615,000
Military and naval compensation	557,150,000
Insurance	23,000,000
Administration	83,896,880
Hospitalization	224,729,402
Hospital construction	47,095,000
Vocational training	469,123,370
Disposition of remains	33,473,782
Bonus allowance	248,682,200
Payments to beneficiaries of Army men and officers	10,495,000
Total	1,996,260,634

In addition to the above Congress has already appropriated for the fiscal year 1923 $406,038,842 for the above purposes, and it is probable that this sum will be increased. It is estimated that $500,000,000, or a half billion dollars, each year will be necessary for these purposes.

The number of former service men receiving vocational training is 108,200.

Other figures on wounded and disabled men are as follows:

Approximately 30,000 are now in hospitals.
The total number wounded is 208,526.
The total number discharged for disability is 251,916.
The Government is paying compensation on 50,420 death claims and 156,539 disability cases.
The amount paid last month for this compensation was $10,340,000.
The Government is paying insurance on 134,550 death claims and 6,299 disability claims.
The amount paid in war-risk term insurance last month was $8,454,069.17.
The commuted value of war-risk term insurance allowed by the Government is $1,326,985,835.70.

Whatever amount may be required to properly care for the wounded, disabled, and their dependents will be cheerfully provided by the American people.

Of the greatest importance, however, is the establishment of hospitals under the direct supervision of the Government in which the soldier and sailor can receive the finest possible medical and surgical attention and every comfort and convenience. In such a hospital, under Government control, the veteran may complain to his Representatives and Senators against the conduct of that institution or as to any mistreatment. Again I congratulate the House on its opportunity to enact this bill, and I trust that the Veterans' Bureau will be prompt to utilize these appropriations in providing hospital facilities which Congress has made it possible to provide, and I trust that it may be a little more diligent in this respect than it has been in some other of its activities. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, we have heard quite a bit this afternoon in regard to the very important question of Treasury deficits—suggested, probable, and improbable. I do not think anyone can say definitely or with assurance at this time just what the condition of affairs may be in regard to our revenues and expenditures for the present fiscal year, certainly not for the coming fiscal year. It is quite proper from their standpoint that the Treasury, in estimating the condition of their balances, shall charge up all of the outgo, whatever the purpose of expenditure may be; but in making up balances of income and outgo fairly, we should not charge up against current revenues large sums expended on war obligations and to reduce the sum total of the public debt. So far as the current expenditures are concerned—that is, expenditures for purposes necessary to the maintenance of the Government and its establishment this year as compared with current revenues—there will be quite a considerable favorable balance; and that, in my opinion, is likely to be the case for the coming fiscal year unless we shall assume obligations not assumed up to this time.

The overhang of the war has been greater and has continued longer than we anticipated. It is not fair to charge it against the current revenues. At this distance from the days of war the people should not be expected to pay out of current revenues on the war debt and the war obligations, except to the extent necessary to meet interest charges and the obligations of sinking-fund arrangements. From that viewpoint and on the basis of that policy our Treasury is in a most excellent condition. I want to thank the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DUNBAR] for the very valuable contribution he made to the facts with regard to the situation.

Mr. Chairman, with regard to the bill before us, I am sure we are all glad to have the opportunity of making abundant provision—and it seems to me that it is abundant provision—for the care of the disabled veterans of the World War. The country has been very generous in its treatment of these men. It should be; it should continue to be. And these hospitals should be erected and extended until we shall have sufficient beds in Government-owned hospitals to meet the need of the injured and incapacitated men of the late war.

Having read with some care the statement made before the committee by the Director of the Veterans' Bureau and officials of that bureau and the statement contained in the report of the committee——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. May I have two minutes more?

Mr. MADDEN. I yield two minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. MONDELL. I am reminded that we should remember that these estimates of the place of expenditure are wholly tentative. My opinion is that it will be found that the expenditures should be and will be made in somewhat different proportion as to districts than indicated by the suggestion made to the committee.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. These are not suggestions. They are only information that we obtained, and we put it into the report for the information of the House.

Mr. MONDELL. I am not criticizing it at all.

Mr. MADDEN. I am sure about that; but I want to say to the gentleman that they are not suggestions, and it is simply carried in the report as a matter of information.

Mr. MONDELL. I am told they embody, in a general way, the views of the officials of the bureau—that is, the medical staff of the bureau—at this time as to the probable distribution of the funds. It strikes me as altogether likely that after the matter has been further considered and the plans have been approved by the President, the distribution may be somewhat different than suggested in the testimony given to the committee. At any rate, Mr. Chairman, we are hopeful that the money will be wisely expended and the hospitals started and completed at an early date. That is all-important. The construction of hospitals under the appropriations last made for these purposes has been scandalously slow, and if the Veterans' Bureau can carry on these building operations with good judgment, promptness, and economy they will have made a most enviable record. I hope they will make such a record.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas makes the same request. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON].

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, this bill reported by this committee is for the purpose of carrying out the law passed some time ago known as the Langley law. In other words, the first bill we passed carried $18,500,000, and of that amount perhaps 50 per cent is not yet expended, and this $17,000,000 is to supplement that amount of money, which makes available for this and the coming fiscal year $35,500,000 for hospitals to care for disabled soldiers. I think the committee acted wisely in making available at this time only $12,000,000 of the $17,000,000, because the authorities felt that that is all they could use within the next and current fiscal year. But in order that there might be no embarrassment about it the committee authorized contracts to be made to the full limit of $17,000,000.

Mr. Chairman, there is one thing that is noticeable to me in the House and in the Senate, as well as throughout the entire country, and that is that whatever objection there may be on the part of the citizenship of the Nation or the individual Member of Congress or of the Senate as to a bonus bill to pay able-bodied soldiers, I do not know of a single Member of the House or a Member of the Senate, nor have I heard a word of objection from the citizenship of America, objecting to taking care of the lame and halt and blind and those that have received any sort of injury by virtue of their military service. I am willing to go the limit to care for those that are crippled or who have suffered physical ailments by reason of their service in the Army here or in France.

It shows a splendid attitude on the part of the people of America and on the part of their Representatives toward those who were willing to serve their country and who by virtue of that service were injured. I think that is the highest test of real good citizenship on the part of our people when the man that served his country or attempted to serve his country and lost an eye or a limb or his health finds such a unanimous vote among all the people of America to care for the boys disabled by service in war and when they all answer, "You have served your country and by doing it you have lost some of that ability which you had to care for yourself in the battle of life; we will now step in and supplement your energies and efforts because you have been impaired in your earning capacity by serving us." It is fair, it is just, it is right; and in that there is no difference of opinion. There is no political division along this line. It is absolutely nonpolitical, and nonsectional, and nonsectarian. Everybody in America wants to do the right thing for the lame, the wounded, and the injured soldier. [Applause.] As a member of this subcommittee I was glad to help make up and report this bill and trust that it will pass just as we reported it.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized for one minute.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a speech made by ex-Governor Haskell, of Oklahoma, before the Oklahoma Society in New York.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD as indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The extension of remarks referred to are here printed in full as follows:

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave given me to print, I submit herewith the address to the Oklahoma Society of New York, made by ex-Gov. Charles N. Haskell, which was done at the request of Hon. Scott Ferris. Mr. Haskell said:

Near 90 years have passed since the sages in our American Congress met and solved the question as to the immediate future of the Five Civilized Tribes of American Indians. Then the Cherokees, Creeks, Choctaws, Chickasaws, and the Seminoles inhabited their various reservations in the Southeastern States, adhering to their choice of community ownership and community mode of life. These had become objectionable to the surrounding white settlers, and demand was made upon Congress to negotiate with the Five Civilized Tribes to the end that these reservations might be obtained for settlement by white people and by communities in harmony with the white man's idea of land ownership and government.

SECTION ONCE CALLED REMOTE.

Looking about to effect a new treaty with the Five Civilized Tribes, Congress looked to the uninhabited region of the extreme Southwest. Then the Red River was the border line between the Empire of Mexico and our own Republic. Then the Empire of Mexico extended northward almost to the mouth of the Columbia River, and our own Pacific coast line was little more than 500 miles extent. The present State of Kansas and all States to the north and west thereof did not exist and their areas were but the home of the wild Indian and the wild coyote. Denver, Kansas City, Omaha, St. Paul, and numerous other now prosperous cities were unknown to the map of our country. The area from southwest Missouri and western Arkansas to the Mexican boundary line was practically uninhabited except for roving bands of wild Indians. And in view of the present populous, refined, and developed condition of that area to-day it may be remarkable and hardly complimentary to the foresight of the sages of 1833 when we find the most notable statesmen of our American Congress approving the contemplated adjustment of territorial difficulties with the Five Civilized Tribes wherein they say, "This area is so remote from the habitation of civilized people that in giving it over to the Five Civilized Tribes it will remove them so far away as to avoid any controversies in the future between them and any white neighbors."

Thus it was done, and the great Indian Territory, covering approximately 70,000 square miles, for the purpose of both home creation and Government policy, was ceded to the Five Civilized Tribes. They became its inhabitants, established their homes, established their government, and during the succeeding fifty odd years made such progress in education, in religious endeavor, in home building, and local government as to do credit to the people of any country.

BEGINNING OF CIVILIZATION.

But this was the beginning of civilization in this area, and by 1889 the prophecies of congressional sages before quoted had been most emphatically refuted. Contrary to that prophecy, in little more than 50 years that area became completely surrounded by well-organized, prosperous, and populous States. The Empire of Mexico had been compelled to withdraw its border lines, leaving room for the Empire of Texas on the south, and this extended the United States direct to the Pacific, whereon our coast line had been extended more than 1,000 miles.

And again Congress was confronting the old controversy; that is, shall there exist in this country a government within a government and civilized but noncitizen people of such distinct difference as to make harmony of action impossible? The Five Civilized Tribes removed from the South Atlantic States to this new country still maintained their community policies, community ownership of lands, and distinct form of government. The end of this condition was in sight. Our country had no more remote and uninhabited areas to offer in exchange. Dismembering these independent governments, shaping the policies of their people to harmonize with the general policies of the United States, first the sparsely settled areas of the western part of the Indian Territory were acquired from the Five Civilized Tribes by Congress and opened to settlement. The Territory of Oklahoma was formed and these lands released to the Government by the Five Civilized Tribes were made subject to settlement.

This may be termed the beginning of the creation of a new Commonwealth and affording opportunity for home building by people of our country.

THE DAY OF AWAKENING.

This brings us to the beautiful April morning 33 years ago, when the Great Creator may be said to have finished his part of the work and presented it to humanity as man's opportunity to enjoy and develop God's bountiful blessings. This was the day of transformation. The sun rising in all its glory, lighting the way over boundless prairie made beautiful by the verdure of spring. Countless seasons had come and gone likened to this with the waving grass and flowers bloom kissed by the morning sun, an invitation to the hand of industry and the ambition of all who would build for themselves, their children, and their children's children, habitations of comfort and happiness. But it was reserved for this particular spring morning to announce that the moment had arrived when God's benevolence should become man's opportunity. Thousands were in line waiting, the signal was given, and from that moment to this we must account for our own stewardship.

Until 1907 the dismembered Indian Territory continued a seperate governmental existence, the western area as organized Oklahoma Territory, and the eastern area remained as the home of the governments and the people of the Five Civilized Tribes.

Then November 16, 1907, the final elimination of the governments and policies of the Five Civilized Tribes. They then became citizens of the United States and their areas became a part of the United States, subject to our uniform plan of government. The two Territories were united and the proclamation of the President proclaimed the forty-sixth State of the American Union, the State of Oklahoma; the "baby State," so called, for all last admitted States are baby States. But Oklahoma came into the American Union as a State without a precedent. By special Federal census of that time the new State showed a population of 1,411,000 people, more than four times the population of any other new State ever coming from territorial government to statehood, and although forty-sixth in number that morning, it ranked as the twenty-third State in population; the seventeenth State, according to Federal statistics, in wealth production; the ninth State in railroad mileage operated within its borders; the fifth State in cotton production; the eighth State in wheat and corn production; the second State in oil production.

SOME OF THE PROBLEMS.

With this important standing in population and commerce the new State of Oklahoma was embarrassed from the fact that all of the Indian Territory area was without municipal, county, or district organization, and with the advent of the new State there was also the advent of 45 new counties whose organization began with the organization of State government. With the immense population and the immense property interests there was corresponding immensity of controversy by strong interests all seeking to get the best of constitutional provision and governmental policy. There was the usual demand for education and eleemosynary institutions, but in the face of all of these conditions the new State was blessed with a population the overwhelming majority of whom were for the welfare of Oklahoma first and above all other considerations. For one, I remember with deep gratitude and sincere affection that love for their new State made our people patriots before they were partisans, and by this harmony of action and almost universal cooperation the strenuous work of State organization was made easy and results were produced at such an economic cost as to stand almost without precedent on any hand.

But government, we are reminded by past observations, will be what the people make it, and we must be mindful of the fact that domestic comfort and domestic happiness are based largely upon the results of government. If our Government is oppressive, you can easily count the days when individual and family life will become but a sullen, dissatisfied, and disorganized condition. We hope to see Oklahoma become from year to year a State of great consequence, great prosperity, and great happiness.

STATES ONE COMMUNITY.

But States of this Union can not pursue distinctly different policies nor enjoy distinctly different results. There is that community of interest among all our States that makes harmony of action indispensable. One State can not long enjoy comfort and happiness when other States are denied these blessings. But while we thank the Great Creator for the opportunities by Him provided to make this, the so-called land of liberty and home of the free, at the same time the home of plenty and the home of happiness, from that point we must take upon ourselves the responsibility for government that will avail our people of these opportunities. We do not need to look into the future for plans of government or diagrams of policy. The teachings of our noted and revered men of the past are a sufficient guide for the present if we are mindful of what they have said. If this land of ours is in fact to be longer styled the land of liberty, let us realize that a minimum of centralized government and a maximum of local self-government must be the basis. We must realize that individual respect for the laws and governmental policies of our country is absolutely essential to the development of individual patriotic sentiment and love of country in the minds and the hearts of our people. That happiness can not abide in any land where tax oppressions so deplete the home production as to deprive that home of reasonable provision for comfortable maintenance. With these three propositions before every citizen of our United States we may as well calmly and intelligently analyze our present policies and conditions and the results thereof.

Of the invasion of individual rights and the sacred privilege of local self-government, President Washington warned us: "For this, though it may in one instance be the extreme of good, is the original weapon by which free governments are destroyed."

SURRENDER TO THEORISTS.

Quoting our Abraham Lincoln, he said: "To maintain inviolate the right of the States to order and control under the Constitution their own affairs by their own judgment exclusively, such maintenance is essential for the preservation of the balance of power on which our institutions rest."

Fellow citizens, do we realize that in recent years by our own voluntary vote and act we have so completely surrendered the affairs of government into the hands of the theorist and the dreamer, whose good intentions have not been blessed by the guiding hand of practical experience; that such declarations of patriotic and unselfish leaders as Washington and Lincoln have been forgotten and their policies so completely subordinated that our so-called glorious land of liberty is but a dream of years ago; that the terms "inherent right of the citizen," "individual privilege of the citizen," "local self-government by the local people," are things of yesterday not countenanced nor enjoyed to-day? That legislative activity has completely eliminated the sacred, inherent right of the individual, and centralized government completely restricts and overwhelms local self-government?

For a time the judiciary of our country was the bulwark of defense against these invasions. And let us not be blind to the fact that to-day the judiciary is constantly yielding its solemn privileges and duty to legislative invasion, and the rights of the individuals and the community that were sacred yesterday are forgotten and denied to-day. And this restrictive policy brings with it attendant extravagance in government and evil in administration.

42,000 SPIES IN UNITED STATES PAY.

Less than a quarter of a century ago, in the greater enjoyment of individual rights and local self-government, our Federal authorities found it necessary to have upon the pay roll of the Federal Government fewer than 200 sleuths and special agents and inspectors to aid in the enforcement of Federal laws. Will any one defend the policy of the Federal Government which to-day employs more than 42,000 inspectors, sleuths, and inquisitorial agents to dog the footsteps of him who should be, in the exercise of his constitutional rights, enjoying the hitherto dignity and freedom of an honest American citizen? Such policy is an invasion of the inherent rights of the American citizen, of the rights of the local people to self-government, and of the rights of the country to limit its taxation to public necessity.

We regret that limited time on this occasion does not permit us to go into greater detail. We are but adding our voice to the note of warning that others are sounding throughout the land. In the exercise of individual business sense no argument is required to sustain the assertion that prosperity and comfort can not result from the reckless expenditure of two dollars where but one is earned. Apply this, if you like, to private life or to public affairs and the rule is equally true. Yet our country has blindly and recklessly bowled along until $8,000,000,000 will not meet the demands the taxing authorities will make in the year 1922 on the wealth-producing class of our country. From the district up to the State authorities, inclusive, approximately one-half this enormous expenditure will be required. The Federal authorities will exact as much more, and it matters not by what ingenious device this sum may be levied—whether by direct taxation or other demand, it matters not—it must all come from the producing element of our people. Against this enormous demand the entire crop products of the United States, which, in fact, is our great wealth-producing resource, will not provide this amount; indeed, we would find a deficiency of more than $1,000,000,000.

AN ORGY OF EXTRAVAGANCE.

What brought about this wild orgy of extravagance? Let us not be partisans when the needs of our country call for patriots. All political parties that have participated in the affairs of government for the last 30 years have their own share in the responsibility for this unfortunate condition. We recall the occasional warning by those who had the courage to cry out against the pork-barrel policy of legislative conduct—that is, the assembling of votes to enact legislative propositions, whether in the State legislature or the Federal Congress, wherein mutual aid was the result of mutual voting.

Unmindful of the sacred right of the taxpayer to have the demands for revenue limited to actual necessity, the pork-barrel policy aimed to build personal popularity and perpetual tenure of office for those participating therein. But the milk has been spilt. All political parties have their share in the disastrous results, and all political parties owe it to the sacred rights of our people and the future glory of our country to right these wrongs and return to a policy of economic government so well within the earning capacity of our people that mortgages will not be the only possible opportunity for prosperity. Indeed, it is a condition and not a theory that confronts us.

But the other day I heard a substantial, honorable citizen speak of recent service as a grand juror, saying: "We, the grand jury, decided as a policy not to indict those charged with violation of certain of our sumptuary Federal laws, excepting only those charged with a certain class of offenses."

Fellow citizens, do you realize the meaning of this statement? Simply this: The grand jury, feeling the extreme impropriety of the law enacted by Congress, had taken it unto themselves to be the lawmaker as well as the law enforcer.

A DANGER TO THE REPUBLIC.

There is the most imminent danger in the enactment of laws, whether they be to restrict individual conduct and limit inherent rights, or whether they be to bankrupt the taxpayer by exacting more revenue than he can earn, or whether they be to collect these revenues by such extravagantly expensive and inquisitorial methods—they all make for a condition of the public mind destructive of love for the country. Their only product can be a general disrespect for law destructive of patriotic sentiment. Nor should we deceive ourselves nor lull to sleep the thoughtful and conscientious citizens who, too, in time, will join in general condemnation of the policy to centralize government, disregard inherent rights of individuals, and bankrupt our country. And the day is not in the dim distance when popular clamor will demand these essential reforms.

These evils exist. Why delay return to the policies of government contemplated by our Constitution and to economic government that recognizes that home building and home furnishing is a more sacred demand upon the fruits of industry than unwarranted extravagance in the government of the District, State, or Nation?

But these reforms are not automatic. They may not be realized without popular demand. Nor may we depend upon those who have brought about these conditions to effect these reforms for us. I appeal to every citizen in the State of Oklahoma, as well as to those who are sojourning in this distant city, to disregard every selfish political sentiment and unite their efforts in solid phalanx and with unwavering determination to effectuate a complete return to the just recognition of inherent rights of the individual and complete return to local self-government wherein the community may express its wishes for local administration as distinctly, if desired, in the different localities as the climate of Florida may be distinct from the climate of Minnesota. Recognizing that the will of the governed should not be overcome by majorities entertaining different views, but inhabiting vastly different localities with different needs and different desires; recalling the language of Senator Sherman, of Ohio, when he said, on the subject of specie payment: "The way to resume is to resume." And I say, with like determination, in the wild governmental extravagances, that the way to retrench, by the eternals, is to retrench, and begin retrenching the instant you find retrenchment necessary to the comfort, yea, to the life and living now apparent throughout the land.

WOULD LIMIT EXPENDITURES.

Our official agencies having the power to disburse public funds and declare appropriations to that end have no more right than the weakest citizen to incur obligations that are beyond the earning power of our people to pay. Limits must be fixed beyond which appropriations shall not pass, and when these principles on the three subjects heretofore outlined have been established and recognition enforced, you may then expect to hear with fervor and the deepest reverence again being proclaimed throughout our land: This is the land of the free, the cradle of liberty, where individual rights are respected—government of the people and by the people recognized in every separate State of the Union—and where he who toils may surely and safely expect to reserve for himself and his family for their comfort and happiness a fair share of the fruits of his industry.

MR. BORIS BAKHMETEFF, RUSSIAN AMBASSADOR (S. DOC. NO. 200).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of State, transmitting, for the consideration of the Senate, a statement received by the State Department from Mr. Boris Bakhmeteff, the Russian ambassador, in regard to transactions recently brought into question in debate in the Senate, which will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, during the discussion upon Thursday of the Semenoff and Bakhmeteff matters two questions were asked concerning which I did not have definite information at that time.

The first was whether Semenoff was in the city of Washington. The opinion seemed to prevail that he was not here, but was only in New York; that is to say, went directly to New York from the West. I find, after consulting the papers here, that he was in Washington three days. The Washington Star and Times of Washington of April 1 and April 3, local news, disclose the fact he was here Saturday, April 1, 1922. They announce the arrival of General Semenoff in Washington. The Sunday Times of April 2, 1922, tells us that he was at the Russian Embassy, and went from there to the State Department on April 1, 1922, where he was received by the officials of the Russian division. This local news item statement, however, says that he did not see Secretary Hughes, but only the representatives of the State Department in the Russian division. Semenoff, after being here some three days, went to New York upon April 4, and was there arrested when he stepped off the train.

The second question which was asked was whether or not our Government had ever been notified by the soviet government of Russia with reference to Bakhmeteff, and whether or not they had ever been notified that he was no longer ambassador for that government or for any government in Russia. On December 10, 1917, it appears from the press notices, both in this country and abroad, that "the soviet government of Russia notifies Mr. Lansing that it has dismissed Boris Bakhmeteff from its service, and that he is at this time a refugee and no longer representative of Russia." I understand this notice was delivered to Mr. Francis, and by Mr. Francis formally transmitted to our State Department.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is advised that the Secretary of State requested that the communication just laid before the Senate should be read. If there be no objection, the Secretary will read the communication from the Secretary of State.

The reading clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, May 6, 1922.

The VICE PRESIDENT,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR MR. VICE PRESIDENT: I have received from Mr. Boris Bakhmeteff, the Russian ambassador, the following statement in regard to the transactions which, it is understood, have recently been brought into question in debate in the Senate:

"The United States Treasury advanced to the provisional government of Russia the sum of $187,729,750. Most of that money was spent by the government before its fall. Following the overthrow of the government, an arrangement was entered into with the Department of State and the Treasury by which the remainder of funds derived from the United States credits, as well as all other available funds on Russian Government accounts in this country, irrespective of their source or previous destination, were segregated into a special liquidation fund. The purpose of this fund was to liquidate Russian liabilities in the United States. Disbursements of this fund were made with the consent of and in cooperation with the United States Treasury. Complete accounts were rendered to the last penny of the disbursement of this fund. It may not be out of place to recall that the Senator who led the discussion was a member of a Senate committee which on April 14, 1920, rendered a report to the Senate on Russian propaganda, which report reads, in part, as follows:

"'The Department of State 'furnished full documentary evidence dealing with the disposition of moneys which had been advanced to earlier Russian governments from the Treasury of the United States and with which purchases of war and industrial materials had been made in this country. In this connection Martens, in his testimony, had given the committee to understand that a misappropriation of American money had taken place. His testimony on this point, however, was of a most cursory and hearsay nature; and the documents furnished by the State Department and contained in the record provide a complete accounting for all these moneys and materials purchased therewith. From these documents it appears, also, that the maintenance of the recognized Russian Embassy in this country and the carrying on of its related activities are provided for by funds accruing from a loan privately negotiated in this country and in England.'

"In the Senate discussion it was asserted that the Russian people have never received any benefit from any part of this money. The funds were used for the benefit of the Russian people, to maintain the honor and the dignity of the Russian nation by discharging obligations which Russia had incurred to citizens of the United States. As the report of the Senate committee states, no money was used for the maintenance of the Russian Embassy.

"In the course of the discussion in the Senate it was remarked that money paid for the purchase of materials from the Russian Provisional Government were not credited to the Russian account with the United States. Such moneys were deposited in the liquidation fund, the expenditure of which was under the control of the Treasury Department.

"It was intimated, if not charged, that I improperly used money derived from United States credits even to the extent of purchasing real estate and of fraudulently taking title in the name of a corporation. The Treasury controlled the distribution of funds and naturally would not allow such disbursement. Not only did I not acquire real estate in the city of New York or in the city of Chicago with United States funds but I never acquired any real estate in any city with any funds, neither in my own name or in the name of any corporation or under any guise whatsoever.

"The reference made to a Greek priest leads me to guess that the matter is probably connected with the Russian Orthodox Church in North America. As it is well known, Russian Church affairs in the United States have been in a deplorable condition since the Bolshevist revolution. Various factions existed within it. Charges and countercharges were made. Appropriations which in the past came from the Russian Holy Synod having been discontinued, the material condition slided into a state where church properties were in danger of being lost and the dignity of the church molested.

"To protect church properties from foreclosure and from loss a private corporation known as the 'Russian Church Relief Corporation' was organized by a group of Russian individuals devoted to church affairs. The papers of the corporation were duly filed in public offices. No financial assistance, however, was given to the corporation from American or any other liquidation funds. In its efforts to conserve church property the corporation acquired and became the holder of certain real estate. The corporation, I am informed, is being conducted solely for the benefit of the Russian Church and for the sole object of conserving its material interests in this country.

"There is also another corporation organized for charitable and humanitarian purposes which is known as the 'Russian Aid Society.' The papers of the society are also filed in public offices. The purpose of the society is to assist Russians who have been left stranded in this country and who find themselves in dire want. I am informed that this corporation holds part of its fund invested in real estate. No financial assistance has been obtained by the Russian Aid Society which in any way derives from United States Treasury funds.

"I have no interest whatsoever in the stock or in the real estate of these corporations. They are entirely private bodies.

"During the discussion much was said about General Semenoff and, unless I misread, an effort was made to make it appear that I am responsible for him in this country, that I sympathize with his activities and plans, and that in some way or other I am associated with him and have given him assistance. Such statements are gratuitous. The State Department knows that I have had no connection with General Semenoff and am not associated with him in any way. As a matter of fact, I knew nothing of his intended visit to this country. I knew and know nothing of Semenoff's plans. It is true that Semenoff called on me. Practically every Russian, other than those who favor the restoration of the old régime or are in sympathy with the Bolshevists, calls at the embassy when they visit Washington. I communicated to the Department of State the circumstances under which I received Semenoff and of the valuable information I obtained from him with respect to conditions in the Far East.

"In the course of the discussion the question was raised of my willingness to state facts. As I have on many occasions indicated to the department, I am only too glad to give all possible information relating to my activities which the department might ask me for. I have nothing to conceal. Moreover, in so far as the use of funds is concerned, most detailed and full accounting is on file with the Treasury Department."

I have the honor to remain, my dear Mr. Vice President,

Very sincerely yours,

CHARLES E. HUGHES.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I merely desire to say a word at this time. It does appear now that Mr. Bakhmeteff received $187,000,000, speaking in round figures. That is plain and quite beyond debate. I have examined and reexamined the so-called report which purports to account for this $187,000,000. I have examined the report in connection with people who understand figures and accounting better than I do. I am, however, wholly unable to understand what has become of at least $78,000,000 of that money. The letter which has just been read at the Secretary's desk makes no explanation of that matter at all; that is, it gives us no details. I will take this matter up later.

It would appear that, through some modus operandi and the establishment of what is called a "liquidation account," a part of this money at least was used in settling claims against the Russian Government; but those claims, if they existed, existed against a government which had disappeared. It is very difficult to understand how Bakhmeteff could adjust those claims. That is precisely what I want to get details about, details we have never been permitted to have.

However, this fact is true, Mr. President. If Bakhmeteff could adjust the claims of individuals, he could adjust the claim of the Government of the United States. If he had the power to adjust claims against the pseudo government which he had assumed to represent, there would have been no difficulty at the time that the Government of the United States was purchasing back the property which he had purchased with the money loaned in adjusting that matter.

I take it, Mr. President, that this matter could be made much plainer, more explicit, and more satisfactory to everybody if Mr. Bakhmeteff, instead of communicating to the State Department, were to appear before a committee of the Senate and permit himself to be cross-examined.

Secondly, Mr. Bakhmeteff says he knows nothing about Mr. Semenoff; that he did not know that he was even going to visit this country, and knows nothing about his plans, and so forth. It does appear, however, that Semenoff visited him and that Bakhmeteff acquired some very valuable information about conditions in the Far East. In view of the murderous activities of Semenoff in the Far East, of his attack upon American soldiers, of his murder of helpless citizens, of his establishing and maintaining a slaughter pen, it would be more interesting and more satisfactory and more conclusive if Mr. Bakhmeteff would appear before a committee and inform them just what the conversation was between this pseudo ambassador and the murderer from Siberia.

It is not satisfactory, in my judgment, to anyone other than one who is willing to surrender his views to the dictation of a bureau or to accept the unsworn statement of the party interested to have a man write a letter under such circumstances and say that his associations with this Mongolian monster were accidental and had no significance whatever. It is easy to write letters, but a man of spirit, a man of a keen sense of honor would no longer seek the shield of an extinct government but would be glad to submit to the most searching investigation. I will recur to this matter later.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD, in the ordinary RECORD type, a petition of citizens of Columbia Heights who are members of the Columbia Heights Citizens' Association of the District of Columbia, asking that they have a hearing before the fiscal system of the District of Columbia is changed.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A PETITION OF THE CITIZENS OF WASHINGTON, D. C.

To the President of the Senate:

Your petitioners, members of the Columbia Heights Citizens' Association, citizens of the United States and a committee duly authorized to represent the association, do hereby present for the consideration of your honorable body the following petition, adopted by the said Columbia Heights Citizens' Association at its regular monthly meeting, held at the parish hall of St. Stephen's Church, on Tuesday, May 2, 1922.

In common with all good citizens and taxpayers of the District of Columbia, the Columbia Heights Citizens' Association joins with its sister civic organizations in earnestly protesting against the action of the committee of conference on the District of Columbia appropriation bill (H. R. 10101) in changing the standard of assessments on real estate in said District from two-thirds to the full valuation of said real estate.

The Columbia Heights Citizens' Association further protests against the increase of taxation on intangible property from 3 to 5 mills, believing that said increase will result in the withdrawal of much of said intangible property from the District, thereby decreasing the receipts from said tax to a very appreciable extent.

That the Columbia Heights Citizens' Association hereby enters its protest to the action of said joint committee of conference of the District appropriation bill in introducing new and novel changes in the fiscal relationship between the Federal Government and the District of Columbia that will work a distinct hardship upon the taxpayers and citizens of the District of Columbia if enacted into law.

And the Columbia Heights Citizens' Association further solemnly protests against the adoption of the conference report on the District of Columbia appropriation bill, carrying, as it does, a radical change in the fiscal relations between the Federal Government and the District of Columbia, and prays that the commissioners and representative citizens may be granted a hearing on the revolutionary changes proposed by the conferees on said District of Columbia appropriation bill to the end that out of said hearing may come a more just and equitable arrangement of taxation than contemplated in said amendment to said District of Columbia appropriation bill.

And your petitioners will ever pray.

GEO. A. WARD, Chairman.
E. C. SNYDER.
MARY WRIGHT JOHNSON.
W. B. TODD.
CHARLES C. LANCASTER.
J. CLINTON HIATT.

ADDITIONAL DISTRICT JUDGES.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STERLING in the chair) laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9103) for the appointment of additional district judges for certain courts of the United States, to provide for annual conferences of certain judges of United States courts, to authorize the designation, assignment, and appointment of judges outside their districts, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. CUMMINS. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, accede to the request of the House for a conference, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to, and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. CUMMINS, Mr. STERLING, and Mr. OVERMAN conferees on the part of the Senate.

THE TARIFF.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7456) to provide revenue, to regulate commerce with foreign countries, to encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes; the pending question being on the amendment of the Committee on Finance, on page 2, line 12, before the word "cents," to strike out "1½" and insert "2," so as to read:

Lactic acid, containing by weight of lactic acid less than 80 per cent, 2 cents per pound.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, yesterday afternoon we had a very interesting discussion regarding the rate of duty which the committee recommends shall be placed upon importations of lactic acid. It was very interesting in connection with the previous discussions of this bill. In the consideration of the first item in the bill I inquired of the chairman of the Committee on Finance as to the basis on which the duties proposed by this bill were made. He informed us that the basis was the difference between the cost of production in the United States and the cost of production in the foreign country plus the transportation charges. It developed that, according to his theory, no attempt actually had been made to ascertain the difference in such costs, but as to that particular item he took the selling price in this country and the selling price of the commodity in the foreign country, and he assumed from that that the domestic selling price represented the cost of production plus a reasonable profit. He also made a like assumption regarding the foreign selling price, and therefore he was able to arrive at the rate which should be imposed in order to equalize the cost of production in this country and the foreign cost plus transportation.

I thought that was a violent assumption and gave some reasons for my belief. Later on in the discussion of the next item in the bill the Senator from Utah said that the duty in that instance was levied for revenue purposes. No information was given as to why the particular rate should have been imposed for revenue purposes. We had no information from him or from the chairman of the Finance Committee as to the domestic production, the prices of the domestic article in this country or the prices abroad, and no information to show why the duty should be increased in order to raise revenue. We had a pitiful appeal from an association of naturalized Italians, who were directly interested in the importation of that particular commodity, protesting against any increase of duty, because it was their belief that the importation under the existing duty was relatively insignificant and that the imposition of a higher duty would prohibit importations. They wanted to exchange acid for food.

Yesterday the item of lactic acid came up for consideration. The matter was about to be submitted to a vote without a word of information from any member of the Finance Committee. I finally rose and inquired of the chairman of the Finance Committee the basis on which this item of taxation was levied. He referred to the fact that the importations during the first nine months of 1921 had increased somewhat above the importations of 1920, and he said that that was sufficient information to justify this increase in the rate of duty.

I think it well for us to understand the present law regarding this item, the action of the House in the bill as passed by it, and the changes which were made by the Finance Committee.

This article, lactic acid, is manufactured in various strengths, ranging from 22 per cent in weight of lactic acid to 80 per cent. The duty under the previous law, the Payne-Aldrich law, was as follows:

Lactic acid containing not over 40 per cent by weight of actual lactic acid, 2 cents per pound; containing over 40 per cent by weight of actual lactic acid, 3 cents per pound.

Under the present law, the Underwood-Simmons law, there is only one duty upon all grades—lactic acid, 1½ cents per pound.

The House, in the bill now under consideration, imposed a duty as follows:

Lactic acid, containing by weight of lactic acid less than 30 per cent, 1½ cents per pound—

The Senate Finance Committee proposes to increase that to 2 cents per pound—

30 per cent or more and less than 55 per cent, 3 cents per pound—

The Senate committee proposes to increase that to 4 cents per pound—and 55 per cent or more, 5 cents per pound.

The Senate committee proposes to increase that from 5 to 9 cents per pound.

The bill as passed by the House, and as reported by the Finance Committee of the Senate, contains this further provision:

Provided, That any lactic-acid anhydride present shall be determined as lactic acid and included as such: And provided further, That the duty on lactic acid shall not be less than 25 per cent ad valorem.

It will be observed that that is a very marked increase above the Payne-Aldrich law. There the highest rate on any acid containing above 40 per cent of actual lactic acid was 3 cents per pound; on acid containing less than 40 per cent of actual lactic acid under the Payne-Aldrich law it was 2 cents per pound; making the tariff on a rating of only two classes of lactic acid. Now, the Finance Committee of the Senate increases every one of those grades. On acid containing 30 per cent or under it is increased to 2 cents per pound by the Senate committee.

The House had it 1½ cents on acid containing less than 55 per cent, the Senate committee makes it 4 cents per pound, and on acid containing 55 per cent or more the Senate committee makes it 9 cents per pound—three times the highest rate fixed by the Payne-Aldrich Act, 300 per cent increase over the Payne-Aldrich Act, and 600 per cent increase over the existing law on lactic acid.

Mr. President, I tried to ascertain the reason for this extraordinary increase in duty. The only information which I obtained from the chairman of the committee was that there had been an actual increase in importations. I want to be certain that there shall be no misunderstanding about it, and I shall therefore read just what he said. I had been interrogating him, wanting to know why this increase was made. He referred me to this book which I have here, furnished by the Tariff Commission. I had read everything in that book regarding this subject, and therefore I requested the Senator from North Dakota to point out what there was in that book which would justify this increase, and so the Senator very generously replied:

I will tell him one thing it shows. It shows that in 1908 we imported only 82,671 pounds of this article, while in the first nine months of 1921 we advanced from the 82,000 pounds of 1908 to 853,545 pounds, as against an entire output in the United States of 1,900,000 pounds. I think that of itself shows the necessity of some kind of protection to the American industry. We thought it was a sufficient showing.

I want to repeat that:

We thought it was a sufficient showing.

Mr. President, bearing in mind that the chairman of the Finance Committee laid down as his basis in his first utterance regarding this bill that the duty should be levied so as to equalize the cost of production in the United States and in the foreign country, and assuming that he has not varied from that fundamental proposition, I could not help but wonder what kind of a mental operation it required to evolve those facts from the mere statement which I have read—the mere fact that from 1908 to 1921 the importations had increased from 82,000 pounds to eight hundred and odd thousand pounds. From that fact alone, through some mental process which I can not understand, the Senator from North Dakota says that he is able to determine the cost of production at home and the cost of production abroad.

That is his mental attitude. When he made that statement I felt that so far as my attempt to understand such reasoning was concerned I was in a very hopeless dilemma; but, to my great surprise, another Senator rose during the discussion and said that he thought that information was all that was necessary. That was the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], who for many years was a member of the Finance Committee. He said he thought that that solitary fact was a sufficient basis on which to make these increases; that by it they could determine not only the cost of production at home and abroad but it would enable them to ascertain the exact rates which should be imposed; that by that sole fact they thought it was advisable to increase the rate on acid containing 30 per cent or less of this material from 1½ cents per pound, as fixed by the House, to 2 cents per pound. Upon the next grade of acid they were enabled to increase the rate 33⅓ per cent above the House rate. Upon the next grade of acid they were able to increase the rate nearly 100 per cent above the House rate.

Mr. President, during the time that I have been considering this tariff legislation I must confess that I found nothing in all of the information which would lead me to believe that I could ever reach the point where, from such information as that, I would be able to arrive at a definite conclusion as to a just rate, a difference of a few cents a pound, on lactic acid. My amazement was still greater when the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts gave it as his opinion also that from that information he would arrive at exactly the same result arrived at by the committee. I was very much discouraged. With only such information as that, I did not believe I could ever come to understand this bill.

Not only that, Mr. President, but that information itself was not presented to the Senate. No statement was made to the Senate regarding even those facts, and so they expected the Senate to reason about like this: That the Finance Committee has fixed a definite rate; it has increased these duties by a large percentage; therefore the Members of the Senate must reason backward from that; that, from the mere fact that the Senate Finance Committee recommends these increases in duty, the Senators are able to assume that those mere figures represent the difference between the cost of production in the United States and the cost of production abroad.

Again, I want to say that that is a method of reasoning which I am unable to follow. I confess that I never believed I was so stupid that I could not understand something about how to fix tariff rates, especially when it was said that these rates should be fixed on the difference between the cost of production in the United States and the cost of production abroad; but I could not follow that. It occurred to me that these two distinguished Senators perhaps could make a greater record and a more sensational record for their families if they would pursue the vocation of necromancers, or some other psychic vocation. They have ability to read something out of cold facts which apparently nobody else can get. Or they might become paleontologists. I think they would have a great career in that field of inquiry. If they can ascertain all this from the one fact to which I have called attention, I am certain that if they should discover some fossil, no matter how small, part of an extinct animal, they would be able to construct a wonderful reproduction.

They have evidently exercised some such power in fixing these rates. From the mere ascertainment that the importations of this commodity have increased from 1908 down to the present time, they would ascertain all essential facts, and not only that, Mr. President, but in spite of the facts that these importations do not disclose the quality of the acid imported, they are able to fix rates for the different degrees of purity of the product. My information is that you can not tell, from any of these official reports, what grades of acid are imported, but it is a fact that there is only one grade imported, and that is 80 per cent purity. That statement is verified by the so-called Reynolds report. It was undertaken in that investigation to ascertain the prices of the domestic article and the foreign price, and only one grade of the imported article could be found in this country. That was the article with 80 per cent degree of purity.

From that information which the Finance Committee had—that only one grade of this acid was imported, the 80 per cent grade—they were able to determine that the duty upon the acid of 30 per cent purity or less should be increased from 1½ cents to 2 cents per pound. They were likewise able to increase the duty on lactic acid containing less than 55 per cent of lactic acid from 3 to 4 cents per pound, and on that containing above 55 per cent to 9 cents a pound, from the present rate of 1½ cents a pound. I must confess that such mental acumen is beyond me. I almost felt like resigning my position on the committee; it was a hopeless situation. But finally something very significant occurred. As I have said, there was no evidence in the hearings either before the Committee on Ways and Means of the House or before the Finance Committee of the Senate as to value or as to cost of production. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] had reasoned from the bare facts which I have related. The Senator from Massachusetts had agreed with him that that was sufficient. But soon afterwards something very significant occurred. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] began discussing this question. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] felt that he would have to say something more. While I was trying to interrogate the Senator from North Dakota, the Senator from Massachusetts was trying all the time to get the floor in order to tell us that he had information in abundance which would satisfy everybody. He finally got the floor, and all that he produced at that time were the figures showing the importations month by month for the last 14 months. That is all he produced.

Finally the Senator from Alabama entered into the discussion, and the Senator from Massachusetts concluded that he would have to say something more than he had said. He evidently realized that a mistake had been made in basing these rates of duty upon that meager information. So he came forward with the fact that certain concerns up in Massachusetts were going broke, and that that statement was made before the committee by the Du Pont Co., which had a branch which made lactic acid, and had given up because it was rendered entirely unprofitable.

Further along the Senator from Massachusetts himself said, speaking of this industry:

> While it is not a larger industry, it is a valuable industry; and there seems no good reason for its destruction. It was for that reason that I urged upon the committee that they should consider this increase over the House rate.

Mr. President, we were thus advised that the statement of the Senator from North Dakota that this mere difference in the importations was all that had been presented was not quite accurate. It was all that they had in the RECORD, but in some quiet corner the Du Pont Co. goes before the Finance Committee of the Senate and pleads for a higher duty upon this commodity. The Senator from Massachusetts in some quiet corner does the same.

Mr. President, I want to know if the people of this country are willing that a tariff bill shall be manufactured in any such fashion. There is no testimony of that sort in the record, and except for a colloquy the Senate and the country would never have known the reason for these large increases in taxes upon this commodity.

Mr. President, finally the Senator from Massachusetts felt that it was necessary that his statements be corroborated. So he read a part of a letter which he held in his hand. He did not state the person from whom he received that letter; he did not give its date; and I think he owes it to the Senate and to the country to put into the record the entire letter. He read from it to some extent, and we can only judge what the whole letter contained.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me—I just came into the Chamber—it was by the merest accident that I did not mention the writer's name. The writer was Mr. Robert F. Marden, of Lowell, who, I may state, was one of the directors of the company.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. What company?

Mr. LODGE. I mentioned the name of the company over and over again. It was the Wamesit Chemical Co.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The Senator read the name of the Wamesit Chemical Co. in reading from the letter.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; I thought I mentioned that.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. That is the only place it is mentioned directly. Here is what we find in the extract from that letter. I wish we might have the entire letter in the record, and if the Senator from Massachusetts, while he has his attention directed to it now, will put the entire letter in the record, I shall appreciate it very much.

Mr. LODGE. I will gladly put in all of the letter that relates to this question. The writer is a gentleman whom I have known for a great many years and there is some entirely personal matter in the letter, as I remember. I have another letter here from the treasurer, Mr. Murphy, and I think perhaps I might as well print that, too.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I would like to have those letters appended at the close of my remarks as an appendix.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TOWNSEND in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I read this much from what the Senator read yesterday:

> The German imported acid rated at 80 per cent by weight quoted to-day at 10.80 cents per pound. Add to this the proposed duty of 7 cents, and his selling price will be 17.80 cents, which is to be compared with our American producers' price of 70.50 cents.

There is nothing in the bill as it came from the House or from the Finance Committee regarding this 7-cent rate. I do not know where that 7 cents came from. Evidently it must have been from some letter written before the bill passed the House. It does not appear in the hearings of the Ways and Means Committee of the House. It appears nowhere else that I know of, and this is the first time I have heard of a rate by either body of 7 cents, but evidently the writer was trying to suggest what the rate shall be, because he further said:

> The point I wish to raise is that the margin of 0.30 cent between our home retail price and the imported price under the new tariff is insufficient in view of the practical certainty that the German price will automatically be lowered below our figure and that importations will continue uninterrupted.

Mr. President, that includes what I believe to be one vicious feature of the bill. That manufacturer merely quoted his price. He did not tell how much profit he was making. He merely quoted the price.

Mr. LODGE. He is making so much profit that the mill is closed down, and he will have to dismantle and sell it unless some relief is given. That is the profit he is making. He lost $10,000 in the last six months.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Yes; I was going to call attention to that.

Mr. LODGE. Men who are making abnormal profits very seldom close down their factories.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The Senator is quite right, and I expect to dwell a little on these reasons. It appears further on that the reason why he is not making any more acid is because his vats are full and there is no market for it at any price. The tanning industry of the country is closed down also.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] pointed that out yesterday.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. That is why he can not sell, but he does not say what it costs him to produce the article. He is holding up his price yet, and he wants a tariff which will enable him to maintain that price, which doubtless is a war price and has been practically the same for some time, when business shall resume. He said that with a duty of 7 cents per pound the foreign article would be selling higher than his price, but what did the Finance Committee of the Senate do? They raised it to 9 cents. The House put it at 5 cents. The Finance Committee of the Senate raises it to 9 cents, and on that single statement of an interested party.

He proceeds further:

> We also consider it important that the edible lactic acid should carry a flat duty of 15 cents per pound. The present tariff bill includes the edible under the general headings of lactic acid. It should be referred to specifically, as it is to all intents and purposes a separate article of commerce from the technical lactic acid. It is a form of acid that is certain to be extensively utilized in trade, and it is our expectation and hope that the market for edible lactic can be widely expanded to the advantage of the great mass of the people in this country. In short, the edible lactic industry in this country is in its infancy. Germany is sending in edible lactic acid to-day equivalent to that produced by us, and is selling it at 17.40 cents, as against our lowest price of 25 cents. If we add the 7 cents duty to the 17.40, we still give the Germans 0.60 cent as a differential in their favor. Once again I would like to point out that no one knows how much lower the German imported acid can and will be sold at compared to the present price.
> The Wamesit Chemical Co. is closing down its plant to-day, having its tanks filled to overflowing with manufactured lactic acid which we have been unable to sell in any great quantities, largely because of German competition. We are willing to make due allowance for hard times, but it is the German competition which strangles our industry, whether times are good or bad.

Mr. President, in the Reynolds report, as I said, it is stated that no lactic acid under 80 per cent purity was found in this country There is no quotation of an American article of the same grade as the imported article. Here is what the Reynolds report said:

> Selling price of foreign article in the United States, 12 cents.
> Selling price of domestic article, reported as comparable, 17.6 cents.

I have here a letter addressed to the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], the ranking minority member of the Finance Committee, in which this statement is made under date of April 21, 1922:

> We wish to make a protest against the extravagant increase in duty on lactic acid to 9 cents a pound on lactic of the strength of 55 per cent and above as being both unreasonable and unfair. Lactic acid of the strength above 55 per cent by weight is not manufactured in the United States, and therefore no protection is necessary. If we could obtain 80 per cent lactic acid in this country we would not have any occasion to import it. We do not claim that lactic acid is not produced in this country, but we do claim that lactic acid of the high concentration that we import, 80 per cent by weight, is not produced here.
> Our customers of 80 per cent edible lactic acid require that it be of the very highest concentration possible and as free of water as can be obtained. As such an article is not produced here we are obliged to import it for the consumers, and when we do import it we do not compete with any domestic manufacturer, for the reason that no domestic manufacturer produces lactic acid of such high strength as 80 per cent. We claim that the increase from 1½ cents a pound to 9 cents is unfair.

That is from C. M. Armstrong & Co., of New York City.

Mr. President, there is some other information in the record, not in the hearings but in the report of the Tariff Commission, which bears upon the subject. I do not believe that such other evidence warrants an increase of the present duty. It becomes necessary, therefore, to make some little statement regarding the matter.

Lactic acid is that acid which is found in buttermilk or sour milk. The industry had its birth in the United States. Lactic acid is to-day divided into two general grades, one called technical, the other edible. The so-called technical grade is likewise divided into different degrees of strength, varying from 22 per cent up to 66 per cent. That acid is used principally in the tanning industry. It has other uses, however, but the consumption of it in the country depends principally, of course, upon the prosperity of the tanning industry. That industry likewise is at a low ebb; and what I can not quite understand is how the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], who is intensely interested in the tanning industry, should be willing to have such an enormous duty imposed upon lactic acid. That is more than I can understand. At the last session of Congress he was not willing to have even a small duty imposed upon hides, but now, apparently, he is perfectly willing to have the duty on lactic acid, one of the materials that go into the tanning industry of his State, increased in the higher grades by 600 per cent.

The Tariff Commission has made quite a study of this subject, and tells us about the different grades of the technical acid and its uses, and also about the uses of edible lactic acid. The commission informs us that this industry began in 1881, and that this country was the only place in the world where any lactic acid was produced at that time. The industry was commenced in Germany along about 1894 or 1895. Until 1897 there was no duty on this acid at all. The industry had its beginning without any duty; it prospered without any duty. We are also told by the Tariff Commission that prior to the war the industry had built up a large export trade; that it was competing with the world.

We are further told that this commodity is produced in this country principally from the unmarketable corn. It may be produced also from potatoes, and in Germany it is produced entirely from potatoes. The Tariff Commission itself tells us that this country is at no disadvantage with Germany so far as the raw material is concerned.

We are likewise told that this acid must be transported in glass containers. It is produced in Germany from potatoes; and I wonder what the situation in Germany is to-day regarding the raw material. I do not know; the committee does not know; and the Tariff Commission does not report; but the general impression at least has gone abroad that Germany to-day has other uses for all of her potatoes than the making of lactic acid.

The Tariff Commission, however, has done a thing in this case which it has seldom done in any of its surveys of any industry. It has made the statement that this country is at no disadvantage with the remainder of the world so far as the raw material is concerned; and there is not a line of testimony in the entire record, there has been no showing made on the floor of the Senate or elsewhere, which gives us any information as to the labor cost so far as the processes of manufacture are concerned.

So it seems to me, Mr. President, that the Finance Committee has not acted in this case upon any record evidence which will warrant the proposed extraordinary increase in the rate of duty. There was no hearing before the Ways and Means Committee of the House; there was no hearing before the Finance Committee of the Senate; but it does appear in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of yesterday that a representative of the Du Pont Co. went at least to some members of the Finance Committee and told them what it wanted. It also appears that the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] likewise went before that committee and told them what he wanted. It is upon such secret, star-chamber proceedings that this rate is built up and increased upon the higher grade of acid from 1½ cents a pound to 9 cents a pound.

If that is the process by which this bill has been built up, the people of the country ought to know it and Senators ought to know it, and when they shall know it they will not take it for granted, as they have assumed to do so far, that the mere recommendation of the majority of the Finance Committee of the Senate is all that they require in order to justify them in voting for the enormous increases in rates contained in the pending bill.

Mr. President, lactic acid is now coming into use for edible purposes. It is also used for medicinal purposes. We have been told that its use prolongs life and that we should all drink a lot of buttermilk in order to consume lactic acid. It is said that it not only prolongs life and prevents autointoxication but it promotes cheerfulness. Yesterday the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] was very much perturbed because I asked him a question or two about the duty on this commodity. I obtained information from him only after I had been somewhat insistent, and then the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] rose and lectured all of us on this side, alleging that we were engaged in a filibuster, simply because we were trying to ask a few questions, and he was determined that he would shut off all inquiry regarding these items. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] had a very significant expression on his face, an expression which sometimes may be noticed there in what I may perhaps call his more caustic moods. He did not want to be disturbed about it; he did not like questions about it. Mr. President, if ever there was a demonstration that lactic acid should be made cheaper it occurred at that time on the floor of the Senate. Lactic acid ought to be kept in abundance around the Senate Chamber. The Senator from North Dakota ought to consume a lot of it and likewise the Senator from Massachusetts. Any Senator who can tell what rates of duty ought to be put upon a commodity simply because the importations have increased somewhat during the last 15 years ought never to die; he is invaluable to the Senate; his life should be prolonged. The Senator from Massachusetts is blessed, as is the Senator from North Dakota, with such powers; his psychic development is such that he likewise can perform such feats of mental or spiritual legerdemain. He ought to consume lactic acid, as should also the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], who gave us such a scolding yesterday. It is true he is laboring under peculiar circumstances, for doubtless he has heard the "New-s" from Indiana; but he ought not to get mad about that; he ought to consume lactic acid in order to clear up his liver, to make him better natured and to help us consider this tariff bill, as it should be considered, in the interest of the great mass of the people.

APPENDIX.

WAMESIT CHEMICAL CO.,
Lowell, Mass., March 30, 1922.

Hon. HENRY CABOT LODGE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR LODGE: With further reference to a higher tariff on lactic acid, I would like to suggest that, subject at all times to your judgment, we make an effort to have the proposed schedule revised upward with respect to paragraph 1 of Schedule 1, where it refers to lactic acid "and 55 per cent or more."

In our opinion the above rate of duty should be amended so as to carry a duty of 10 cents per pound.

It is a matter of record, already on file with you, that there has been in past 12 months importations of lactic acid from Germany in total sufficient to supply a large proportion of the industrial needs in this country. The prices at which this imported German acid is sold are always slightly lower than any price at which the American producers of lactic acid can afford to sell. It is our firm belief that when forced by the proposed tariff rate of 7 cents either to lower prices or cease competition the German producer will lower his price, and we further believe that he can easily do so.

The German imported acid rated as 80 per cent by weight is quoted to-day at 10.80 cents per pound. Add to this the proposed duty of 7 cents and his selling price will be 17.80 cents, which is to be compared with our American producers' price of 17.50 cents. The point I wish to raise is that the margin of 0.30 cent between our home retail price and the imported price under the new tariff is insufficient, in view of the practical certainty that the German price will automatically be lowered below our figure and that importations will continue uninterrupted, thereby forcing the abandonment of the lactic-acid production by American industry.

We also consider it important that the edible lactic acid should carry a flat duty of 15 cents per pound. The present tariff bill includes the edible under the general headings of lactic acid. It should be referred to specifically, as it is to all intents and purposes a separate article of commerce from the technical lactic acid. It is a form of acid that is certain to be extensively utilized in trade, and it is our expectation and hope that the market for edible lactic can be widely expanded to the advantage of the great mass of the people in this country. In short, the edible lactic industry in this country is in its infancy. Germany is sending in edible lactic acid to-day equivalent to that produced by us and is selling it at 17.40 cents, as against our lowest price of 25 cents. If we add the 7 cents duty to the 17.40, we still give the Germans 0.60 cent as a differential in their favor. Once again I would like to point out that no one knows how much lower this German imported acid can and will be sold as compared to the present price.

What we are anxious to secure in the new tariff bill is a reasonable margin of safety. I think that in the lower strengths the latest figures can be considered probably adequate, but the higher strengths need at least the 10-cent duty which we are asking. The great proportion of the imported German lactic acid consists of the high percentage strengths. The percentages are reduced after the high-strength acid reaches this country. Therefore it is most important to provide the really protecting tariff duty on the strength from 55 per cent upward. It is also important, but we do not consider it so vital, to protect the edible acid by high duty.

The Wamesit Chemical Co. is closing down its plant to-day, having its tanks filled to overflowing with manufactured lactic acid which we have been unable to sell in any great quantities, largely because of German competition. We are willing to make due allowance for hard times, but it is the German competition which strangles our industry, whether times are good or bad.

It is not my desire nor that of my associates to seek to procure an unreasonable tariff protection, but we feel strongly that we are entitled to a sufficient protective duty, because we are not only an enterprise serving private industries, but, on the other hand, engaged in a line of vital importance to this Government in the event of war. We do not believe that we should be compelled to abandon and dismantle a valuable productive enterprise, which will be, however, the ultimate fate of the Wamesit Chemical Co. unless we have relief as outlined above. The figures we have asked for are, to our mind, the minimum protection that should be given us.

* * * * * * *

With many thanks and kindest regards, I remain,
Sincerely yours.

ROBERT F. MARDEN,
For Wamesit Chemical Co.

WAMESIT CHEMICAL CO.,
(SUCCESSORS TO AVERY CHEMICAL CO.),
Lowell, Mass., February 16, 1922.

Hon. HENRY CABOT LODGE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: At the suggestion of Congressman JOHN JACOB ROGERS, I beg to submit for your consideration facts relative to lactic acid in connection with the preparation of the schedule in the proposed new tariff bill.

The Wamesit Chemical Co., a Massachusetts corporation, are at present equipped to manufacture not only all the technical and all the edible lactic acid consumed in this country, but also a considerable further quantity available for export.

The Wamesit Chemical Co. succeeded the Avery Chemical Co., who were the original manufacturers of the world of lactic acid, and for many years, up to the time that the Avery Chemical Co. went into the hands of a receiver, they were the largest manufacturers of lactic acid in the world. All of their equipment, thoroughly modernized and available for immediate use, now belongs to the Wamesit Chemical Co.

For some time the output of our lactic acid has been restricted by the comparatively small amount of acid we could sell. We are now operating not over 20 per cent of our capacity owing to the competition of foreign acid in this market, which we find, upon careful investigation, is steadily increasing and becoming keener.

We attach a certified copy of a letter dated New York, February 15, 1922, from Mr. J. F. Carroll, Chief, Bureau Customs Statistics, Treasury Department, United States Customs Service, New York, N. Y., showing figures of importations of lactic acid entering consumption of the United States during the year 1921 and January, 1922, which we would call to your careful attention. An analysis of these figures shows:

Period.	Quantity in pounds.	Total value in dollars.	Average value per pound in cents.
1921.
First 6 months	185,944	14,578	7.83
Last 6 months	417,441	30,408	7.28
Average per month:
First 6 months	30,991	2,430	.....
Last 6 months	69,574	5,068	.....
1922.
January	72,325	5,451	7.50

The above figures show a steady increase in the quantity and value of the lactic acid imported. In spite of the fact that there were no importations during August, 1921, the importations during the last six months of 1921 were more than double in quantity, value, and monthly average the importations for the first six months of 1921, and the importations during January, 1922, exceeded in both quantity and value the average monthly importations for the previous six months.

While there are no statistics, so far as we can learn, to show how much edible or technical lactic acid was imported, or the concentration, we learn that nearly all of the acid imported has been 80 per cent lactic acid, and that both edible and technical lactic acid have been imported in considerable volume. The edible is much more valuable than the technical. The prices shown above are per pound of everything imported and therefore indicate the low prices at which it is possible to import foreign acid. At this writing 22 barrels of imported 80 per cent lactic acid, edible, are being offered in New York at 22 cents per pound, ex store New York; i. e., United States duty paid.

Twenty-two cents a pound for 80 per cent equals 14⅜ cents a pound for 50 per cent, or 7⅛ cents a pound for 25 per cent; 50 per cent and 25 per cent are the usual strengths in this country, and which we have sold in quantity at 30 cents and 15 cents per pound, respectively.

In 1919 we exported 970,444 pounds of 44 per cent acid at an average price of 10 cents per pound f. a. s. New York.

In 1920 we exported 92,449 pounds of 44 per cent acid at an average price of 10 cents per pound f. a. s. New York.

In 1921, and thus far in 1922, we exported nothing at all.

Upon investigating we find that the exceedingly low cost of labor (about one-twentieth of our cost) and the extremely depreciated value of the currency (which is now over 2,000 per cent below normal value) in foreign countries of manufacture make it possible for the foreign manufacturers to produce and sell in this country far below our cost of production, and, of course, at a price at which we can not compete. To these facts is also attributable our loss of all of our export business. We also attach a certified copy of our balance sheet covering our operations during the last six months of 1921, the last period for which figures are available, showing a loss to our company of $10,709.96.

Our foreign market has been taken away from us absolutely and our domestic market is rapidly disappearing. To enable us to continue manufacturing an article the manufacture of which was started in the United States 37 years ago, we must have adequate protection in the shape of duty; specifically, we wish to have amended the proposed tariff schedule as it is printed in the bill on page 2 as follows:

Substitute 5 cents for 1½ cents on line 8.

Substitute 10 cents for 3 cents on line 10.

Substitute 15 cents for 5 cents on line 10.

Add a clause providing a duty of 25 cents per pound on edible lactic acid.

With these amendments we feel that American manufacture of lactic acid in existing plants can be conducted without constant fear of competition from foreign importations, and, at the same time, without giving lactic acid undue protection. In short, in order to continue the operation of our plant, it is necessary to increase the protective tariff on lactic acid as suggested above.

The following-named companies, which have in the past manufactured considerable quantities of lactic acid in the United States at the places named, have stopped manufacturing, and will not resume for the reasons stated:

American Alkali & Acid Co., Bradford, Pa.: Found it unprofitable.

Atlantic Chemical Co., Mansfield, Mass.: Failed.

Avery Chemical Co., Lowell, Mass.: Failed and plant purchased by Wamesit Chemical Co.

Westchester Chemical Co., Pelham, N. Y.: Found it unprofitable and have discontinued business.

We serve several manufacturers in New England; some are small consumers; others are quite large consumers. Due to our ability to effect immediate and prompt deliveries of high-quality acid, to convenience, established business relations, and friendships, we have held the bulk of the business in our immediate vicinity, and these users particularly would suffer if we were forced to discontinue and leave the market to the mercy of the foreign manufacturers, who would undoubtedly not be slow to take advantage of the situation and raise prices.

We have discussed the importation of lactic acid from time to time with Congressman ROGERS, and, if you wish, I have no doubt he will gladly explain the circumstances against which we have been fighting. Mr. Carroll's letter attached shows the large volume of importations of foreign lactic acid during 1921 and January, 1922, which have come in despite the fact that lactic acid should not have been permitted to enter except when a license was granted by the Chief of the Dye and Chemical Section, Department of the Treasury, covering such importation. Some importations were made without licenses. The importers resort to various subterfuges to get lactic acid into the country. While they have been succeeding in this, we have been piling up manufactured lactic acid in our tanks and meeting with constantly increasing difficulty in finding a market. I am sure you will appreciate our situation.

In summary, we can produce both edible and technical lactic acid in the volume and of the qualities required by consumers in the United States, and sell same at reasonable prices consistent with the prices which prevailed before the war plus the extra cost of production due to higher cost of labor, coal, raw materials, repairs, etc. We can not compete with the importer of foreign lactic acid unless we have a safe margin of protection in the tariff.

I realize that this is a technical matter in its detail and that it can not be adequately discussed by letter. I am prepared, however, if you desire, to furnish you with any data you may wish or to be in Washington for conference on the subject at your pleasure.

Thanking you in advance for any assistance which you may be able to consistently render in the interest of an old-established Massachusetts industry, furnishing employment to Massachusetts labor, I remain,

Very respectfully yours, JOHN H. MURPHY,
Treasurer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ODDIE in the chair). The question is on the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I rise to address the Senate upon the subject of further hospitalization of ex-service men.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I have not been informed whether unanimous consent has been given to the Senator from Arizona for some purpose. I could not quite understand what the Senator said. Is the Senator asking to digress from the consideration of the pending bill?

Mr. ASHURST. I avail myself of this opportunity to discuss the necessity for the expansion and enlargement of hospital facilities in Phoenix and Tucson, Ariz.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, of course I can not attempt to govern the Senator's desire in the matter or influence him. I am very anxious to have Senators talk to the pending bill while it is under consideration. I admit that it is impossible for a Senator in charge of a bill to insist that other Senators shall consider that bill and that bill only, because the range of discussion is so broad that a Senator may speak on almost anything that he desires; but I desire to call the Senator's attention to the fact that we spent, I think, some six days on acetic acid—vinegar—and we have now got down to sour milk, and we have not even decided that proposition as yet.

Mr. ASHURST. I am sure that I am correct when, in appraising the Senator's remarks, I do not think he means to intimate that I am attempting, or would attempt, to delay this or any other bill. I have been here some years and there is no one on either side who can truthfully say that I have ever taken part in a discussion except when I thought I could throw some light upon a subject.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator, I give notice that on the convening of the Senate on Monday, May 8, or as soon as the measure is before the Senate, I shall address it on the subject of the constitutionality of section 315 of the pending bill and subsequent sections, embracing the so-called elastic provisions of the same, and I assure the Senator from North Dakota that I shall confine myself to that subject.

HOSPITALIZATION IN ARIZONA OF EX-SERVICE MEN.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, the subject of which I shall speak is as vital as any other subject that challenges the attention of the Senate. It is a subject upon which I have spoken many times.

I now read a telegram which I have just received. It is from the executive committee of the Association of Allied Service Organizations. It is dated Phoenix, Ariz., May 5, 1922:

Senator HENRY F. ASHURST,
Washington, D. C.:

The Association of Allied Service Organizations, composed of the American Legion, Women's Auxiliary of the American Legion, the Society of the Forty Men and Eight Horses, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, Auxiliary of Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, Military Order of the Cootie, and the Disabled American Veterans of the World War, earnestly request that a veterans' hospital be located in Phoenix under allotment for district No. 12 included in bill appropriating $17,000,000, reported May 4.

This is urgently needed to relieve congestion and suffering among disabled men in immediate vicinity of Phoenix. Present hospital facilities here pitifully inadequate. Numbers of disabled men from all over the country entitled to hospitalization are arriving here in spite of closing of contract hospitals. The care of many of these men is falling upon local service organizations and private individuals.

(Signed) EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE, ASSOCIATION OF ALLIED SERVICE ORGANIZATIONS.

On the 18th of October of last year I received a telegram from the Governor of Arizona, as follows:

PHOENIX, ARIZ., October 17, 1921.

Senator HENRY F. ASHURST,
Washington, D. C.:

Director Forbes of Veterans' Bureau has submitted report to President strongly urging immediate action to meet present emergency arising from needs of hundreds of disabled former service men who, with approach of winter, are pouring into Arizona, where facilities for their care are very inadequate. He recommends immediate completion of Whipple building program through letting of contracts, it being obvious that under system now in effect winter will be well over before any of the buildings now under construction will be ready for occupancy. Maj. Louis T. Grant, manager Veterans' Bureau, twelfth district, is now in Washington, and I therefore urge that Arizona congressional delegation take prompt action, conferring with Major Grant and Director Forbes and calling on the President, bringing strongly to his attention the desperate situation in which these men find themselves and pointing out necessity for immediate action along following lines: Speeding up of construction program at Whipple, establishment of vocational-training center at Prescott, acquirement of additional hospital facilities at Phoenix, and construction of cottages at Tucson to accommodate approximately 300 more patients. The need is very real, and I urgently bespeak your hearty cooperation.

THOMAS E. CAMPBELL,
Governor.

The soldier suffering from tuberculosis shares in that feeling prevalent throughout the United States that the balmy climates of Phoenix and Tucson, Ariz., are eligible places for the treatment of tuberculosis, and although the Veterans' Bureau has discouraged the soldiers suffering from tuberculosis from going into southern Arizona, the soldiers suffering from this baneful disease share in that general feeling of which most of our citizens partake, to wit, that climates and altitudes like the climate and altitude of Phoenix and Tucson are indeed and have been proved to be places which promote the recovery of those persons afflicted with tuberculosis.

Immediately upon the receipt of the telegram last October from the governor of Arizona—and the governor is a gentleman of excellent judgment—I visited the Director of the Veterans' Bureau, who said to me: "The governor has not overemphasized the situation." I then induced the governor and the editor of one of the leading journals to come here, and the Arizona delegation, with the governor, interviewed the Director of the Veterans' Bureau.

The director was once of opinion that hospital facilities at Tucson and Phoenix should be enlarged, but later he changed his opinion and stated that his medical advisers had informed him that no further expansions of hospitals should take place at Phoenix or Tucson.

I would make myself ridiculous if I attempted to put into the scales and have weighed my mere opinion respecting the proper treatment of tuberculosis in juxtaposition with the opinion of physicians, yet I am not without observation respecting the treatment of this disease. There is a psychology about the treatment of tuberculosis; there is about it an imponderable. It defies the usual rules; it perplexes the ingenuity of the ablest physicians. Within the diseased segments of the lungs of a human being afflicted with tuberculosis there is taking place a struggle, a battle on the part of the healthy corpuscles to overcome and eradicate the diseased corpuscles. The disease is curable in its primary or first stages; if a person afflicted with this disease is given pleasing environment where he will have a serene mind, cheerful surroundings, and freedom from homesickness, so that his digestive organs may function readily his recovery will be promoted. Recovery depends in no small degree upon his digestion. He must have not only good food and pure air but good digestion, so that healthy blood and tissues may be formed to combat the ravages of the disease and arrest its progress. But, sir, if the patient be taken to a climate that is damp, humid, or murky—and bear in mind that the lungs of a tubercular patient are "water-logged"—and he is placed in a dark, gloomy, unpleasant environment, homesickness, nostalgia, a wistful idea that if he were elsewhere he would recover seizes him, and his digestive organs do not function, do not operate, he does not digest his food; surely I need not say that a serene mind is necessary to the digestion of food.

I honor our American physicians for the sacrifices they have made, not only in the war but the sacrifices they are constantly making to alleviate the ills of the human race. But, Mr. President, science herself shakes her sapient head when confronted by imponderables, to wit, the things that apparently do not exist, but that veritably do exist.

The tubercular soldier shares in this general opinion, to wit, that if he can receive hospitalization in a balmy climate amidst serene surroundings where every day is sunny he will recover his health; and I will not ask the Senate nor the Director of the Veterans' Bureau to take my mere word, but I summons as witnesses the Governor of Arizona, the editors of the leading journals of both parties, the physicians of Arizona, the chambers of commerce, and this executive committee of the Association of Allied Service Organizations to give testimony that notwithstanding the efforts of the Veterans' Bureau to discourage the soldiers from going to southern Arizona, the soldiers suffering from tuberculosis in large numbers continue to go there, sharing the belief that is coexistent with the boundaries of this continent that in those places they will recover their health. They are there. They are without adequate hospitals, and it is of no utility to hand to the soldier transportation to some other climate; he will not go. He believes that he will recover in that climate, and all the argument and all the millions of words with which you could flail him will not change his opinion.

Is it to be remarked as strange, that the soldier suffering from this baneful disease will go where his countrymen generally believe he will recover, and where he believes he will recover? The Veterans' Bureau in many instances has done well, and I would be contemptible to stand here and say that it has done nothing. It has done much. It means well. Ah, it means well. The mothers on the banks of the Ganges River, who threw their children to the crocodiles, meant well. It is not a question of meaning well. It is a question of doing right, doing the appropriate thing.

Just before the Christmas holidays a bill came from the House appropriating $20,000,000 for the relief of starving Russians.

So no Senator could find it in his heart to defeat the Russian relief bill, although I believe every Senator felt that it would be more in keeping with the duties of an American Senator to appropriate the money for American purposes and to reduce American suffering and give relief to American soldiers than to distribute charities at points 5,000 miles away.

On my motion the Senate unanimously attached an amendment to the Russian relief bill appropriating a million dollars for the further expansion of hospital facilities for tubercular soldiers. My amendment was rejected by the conferees. The conferees on the part of the Senate and the House extended to me, however, the unusual privilege of appearing before them and arguing in behalf of my amendment. They listened to what I had to say, but rejected my amendment, and the Russian relief bill became a law and the amendment to appropriate a million dollars for the further hospitalization of soldiers was defeated.

Mr. President, on the day when the conferees rejected my amendment I addressed the Senate. I labored under severe stress of feeling. I tried to conceal the indignation I felt, and which every man of spirit must have felt when that amendment was defeated, and I let escape from my lips on that day words of which I have doubted the propriety—that is, words which conveyed a threat—but it so happened that the threat was most efficacious. I announced on that day I was going to cease speaking in the Senate on the hospitalization of the soldiers and that I would go into the States and the districts of the men who were opposing it, and there I would address their constituents and tell of the flagrant disregard of sick soldiers.

It would be offensive and unjust for me to assert that my mere threat to go and speak in the districts of Representatives and in the States of Senators who were opposing that amendment caused them to bring in the bill proposing an appropriation of $17,000,000. The truth is their sense of justice, their sense of duty and propriety prompted them, but my threat to go into their districts and into their States and expose the situation promoted the passage of the bill.

So now, Mr. President, I am obliged again to say something which I do not like to say, which seems improper and censorious, and of all Senators here no one has a greater dislike for censoriousness than I. But, Mr. President, this is a desperate situation and requires heroic remedies.

The Senate appointed a committee to investigate hospitalization of sick soldiers. More than ten times I have invited and demanded that that committee go to Arizona to investigate. That committee refuses to go, Mr. President.

So now, with as little offense as possible, I invite, demand, for the tenth time demand, that this committee resign its commission or go to Arizona and talk with the ex-service men in Tucson and Phoenix who are there in need of hospitalization.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield for a moment.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Knowing that the Senator from Arizona has made such heroic efforts here month after month, and month after month, in behalf of these afflicted soldiers, did I understand him correctly to state that nothing had been done in their behalf since he has put his demands before the country?

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator will pardon me for giving a protracted reply. It would be so wrong as to be criminal for me to say that nothing has been done.

The Director of the Veterans' Bureau has done much good work, but he has failed and his advisers have failed and the board of consultants have failed to grasp a particular point where a great injustice has been done.

In other words, to repeat myself, there is a general feeling which prevails throughout this country that Phoenix and Tucson are eligible places for the treatment of tuberculosis. Many soldiers have gone there. They believe—and I can not convince them otherwise and no other person can convince them otherwise—that there they will recover. They believe that, having obeyed the country's call and gone in time of war where their officers commanded, at least now they ought to be allowed to choose the place where they are to be hospitalized.

Let me read to the Senator from Georgia a telegram which came this morning addressed to me from Phoenix, as follows:

MAY 5, 1922.

Senator HENRY F. ASHURST,
Washington, D. C.:

The Association of Allied Service Organizations, composed of American Legion, Women's Auxiliary American Legion, the Society of the Forty Men and Eight Horses—

That is a society which was organized by men who served in France—

Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, Auxiliary of Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, Military Order of the Cootie, Disabled American Veterans of the World War, earnestly request that a veterans' hospital be located in Phoenix under allotment for district No. 12—

In which district Arizona is located—included in bill appropriating $17,000,000 reported May 4. This is urgently needed to relieve congestion and suffering among disabled men in immediate vicinity of Phoenix. Present hospital facilities here pitifully inadequate. Number of disabled men from all over the country entitled to hospitalization are arriving here in spite of closing of contract hospitals. The care of many of these men is falling upon the local service organizations and private individuals.

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE ASSOCIATION OF ALLIED SERVICE ORGANIZATIONS.

The Veterans' Bureau, harsh in its judgment of the situation, unyielding in its determination to have its own way, has said, in effect, to the soldiers, "You will take our view of this problem or die."

I submit that is not the humanitarian and just way to act. To resume: After my amendment to the Russian relief bill was defeated, it was obviously impossible for me to do anything further except to plead with the Veterans' Bureau to expand the hospital facilities in Phoenix and Tucson.

Mr. President, $17,000,000 is now available, or has been authorized, for the further expansion and increase of hospitalization facilities for tubercular ex-service men. The only service that Congress can now render—it has furnished the money and given the appropriate power to the director to care for the subject—is to see that its committee shall execute the commission for which the committee was chosen. We have, I repeat, lodged the appropriate amount of money and authority with the director.

As soon as the bill appropriating $17,000,000 for further expansion of hospital facilities for ex-service men passed the Senate, I went to the Veterans' Bureau. I did not talk with the director, because I knew that would be useless. He was fair enough and manly enough to tell me long ago that on matters of hospitalization he defers to the judgment of his advisers. I, therefore, was guilty of no discourtesy in refusing to consult him, especially after he had repeatedly advised me that he would be guided by nothing and nobody except his advisers. I requested to be heard by the committee on hospitalization, or board of consultants, highly reputable physicians, and on the 2d of this month they granted me the right to be heard.

Briefly I laid before that committee on hospitalization, or board of consultants, composed of physicians, the situation respecting the soldiers at Tucson and Phoenix. I pointed out that there is in this world a law called the law of imponderability against which physicians contend in vain. I pointed out how necessary it was to have a serene mind and properly functioning digestive organs if we expect a tubercular patient to recover. The physicians themselves nodded approval of my words in that regard, but when I concluded they advised me respectfully that they thought that no expansions, no increases in hospitalization facilities in Tucson and Phoenix, would be recommended to the director, which means, of course, that, although $17,000,000 is available, there will be no expansion of hospital facilities in those two communities.

There is a time for speech and a time for silence. This to me was a time for speech. It was a call of duty.

The governor of the State, the mayors of the cities, the county boards of supervisors, the local hospitals, have done for the past year and a half or two years all that may be done, but the harsh, the rigid, in my judgment the unjust, policy of the Director of the Veterans' Bureau refuses to extend hospital facilities at Tucson and Phoenix.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Does the Senator from Arizona know that the President recently named a woman to visit the hospitals where disabled veterans are housed to make personal inspection of the same and report to him? If the Senator is aware of that fact—it may have escaped his attention, for I only knew of it through the press—I would like to ask if the situation which he is describing perhaps could be assisted and relieved by inviting that woman to visit the institutions in Arizona and examine the situation there?

Mr. ASHURST. I have no doubt—in fact, I am persuaded—that the President of the United States has done that. I can not tell you why, because I am not in his confidence. When the entire Arizona delegation called upon him with the Governor of Arizona and pointed out the necessity for this expansion, he manifested such a friendly and such a sincere regard for the soldier that I have no doubt he has done what the Senator from Massachusetts states. But, Mr. President, that is not what I want. That is not what I am seeking. I am asking this committee of the Senate to go down there.

I know a few things. I was not born yesterday. If there be a subject that I understand, it is bureaus and bureaucrats. Mr. President, I would not feel offended if it were said that I am ignorant of many, if not most, subjects, but I know it would be wrong if it were said I know nothing about bureaus.

I know bureaus from inside and out. A bureau knows how not to do it.

There is too much bureau business about this matter of hospitalization. The director of the bureau frankly says he knows nothing about it and will do nothing about it, but will ask some one else, and that "some one else" will ask some other person, and ad infinitum, ad libitum, ad nauseam, they go on down the line, whittling away and whittling away until we can not place or fasten the responsibility on anyone. If a report ever be made, it is a private public report and is not available.

But the report of this committee, composed of the Senators whom I have mentioned, would receive attention. The report of this committee would be read, would be discussed. The report of this committee which the Senate has appointed would be placed in the RECORD and could be mailed, and the committee owes it no less to me than to themselves to go there and investigate.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President——.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. DIAL. The Senator knows that under the bill providing $17,000,000 to build hospitals there have to be constructed fireproof buildings.

Mr. ASHURST. Yes.

Mr. DIAL. Possibly they are waiting until the soldiers die in order that a few big contractors may erect that kind of buildings.

Mr. ASHURST. I thank the Senator for his interruption. The able Senator from South Carolina suggested that it would take too long to erect fireproof hospitals.

Mr. DIAL. Yes.

Mr. ASHURST. That was a pungent observation.

Mr. DIAL. And would serve fewer soldiers, too.

Mr. ASHURST. But it so happened upon the floor there sat and now sits the worthy junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER], himself a builder, and he promptly made the observation that a fireproof hospital may be built just as quickly, just as efficiently, as a nonfireproof hospital may be built. Indeed, he went on to say that unless it were a monumental building or a building of enormous proportions a fireproof hospital could in point of time be built more quickly than an inflammable hospital; so that objection is not a valid one.

I have several times in the discussion of this matter labored under the embarrassment of being in the position of attempting to secure appropriations for hospitals simply because they were in Arizona. It is painful for me to refer to such a thing. That a Senator would presume to suggest or to hint, as was done last December, that my activity in this matter has been promoted by the idea that my success therein would mean a great expenditure of Federal funds in my State is beneath my notice. I have felt that the location of hospitals and the manner in which the hospital should be built could be left to the discretion of the Director of the Veterans' Bureau. So, Senators who would attempt to insinuate that my activity has been prompted by any desire to have Federal funds expended in Arizona may dismiss any such thought from their minds.

At this juncture I ask unanimous consent to include in the RECORD a copy of an address which I delivered in the Senate, when the Russian relief bill was before the Senate, on the hospitalization of soldiers.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say to the Senator that that would be against the rules of the Joint Committee on Printing, though the Senator might, by unanimous consent, insert excerpts from his address.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator from Utah is right, but I will ask permission to include at this point in the RECORD a copy of the telegram from the Governor of Arizona and a copy of the telegram from Doctor Sweek.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

PHOENIX, ARIZ., October 17, 1921.

Senator HENRY F. ASHURST,
Washington, D. C.:

Director Forbes of Veterans' Bureau has submitted report to President strongly urging immediate action to meet present emergency arising from needs of hundreds of disabled former service men who, with approach of winter, are pouring into Arizona, where facilities for their care are very inadequate. He recommends immediate completion of Whipple building program through letting of contracts, it being obvious that under system now in effect winter will be well over before any of the buildings now under construction will be ready for occupancy. Maj. Louis T. Grant, manager Veterans' Bureau, twelfth district, is now in Washington, and I therefore urge that Arizona congressional delegation take prompt action, conferring with Major Grant and Director Forbes and calling on the President, bringing strongly to his attention the desperate situation in which these men find themselves and pointing out necessity for immediate action along following lines: Speeding up of construction program at Whipple, establishment of vocational training center at Prescott, acquirement of additional hospital facilities at Phoenix, and construction of cottages at Tucson to accommodate approximately 300 more patients. The need is very real, and I urgently bespeak your hearty cooperation.

THOMAS E. CAMPBELL, Governor.

[Telegram from Doctor Sweek.]

Exact figures impossible. Lowest estimates 950 active cases vicinity of Phoenix. Four hundred should be hospitalized but not willing to enter present contract hospital. Number of cases in Arizona that would enter properly conducted hospital, lowest estimate, 1,500. Present number hospitalized here, 104. Any size institution up to 1,500 would be full nine months of year. Hospital for 400 could be kept full year round for 25 years. Attending specialists available. Expensive resident staff of full-time men unnecessary. Would like opportunity to make this model hospital. Great need for hospital here, as men come from all States. Proper care here would prevent widespread criticism. As disease advances the number here increases as Southwest is used as last resort.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I see the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] and the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] are present. They are members of the committee, I think, and I will ask if they will go to Arizona to investigate?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I shall be glad to say a few words when the Senator from Arizona shall have concluded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator from Arizona that I am surprised that there has been no relief afforded in the situation which the Senator has described as existing in Arizona; but if I shall go to Arizona—and I am willing to go—it will not be merely to see what quarters are being provided for disabled veterans but to secure, if necessary, the removal of administrative officers who have not done their duty. I do not propose to go to Arizona to do inspection work; I will go to get evidence to remove negligent officials. The question is not a legislative question. Congress has given funds and provided many well-paid officials to do the work of caring and hospitalizing our veterans. Letters and suggestions have been made by our committee directing administrative officers to take charge of the situation in Arizona and elsewhere and to afford immediate relief. If there has not been any relief granted after all the Senator from Arizona has said on the floor of the Senate at intervals during the last few months, after his repeated warnings, after the Governor of Arizona, the press, and others in his State have made protests, if the situation is as the Senator from Arizona has described it and as the people of Arizona have described it, then it is time to remove the chiefs of some departments or some bureaus. In common with every Senator, perhaps, I am getting letters from hospitals from my home State asking me to go there and investigate conditions. Should those suggestions be followed the result would be that I would have to absent myself from my duties here and become an administrative officer traveling about investigating hospitals. It is time to find out who are derelict in their duty, not an inspection problem.

All the committee can do is to send an inspector to the locality to ascertain what the situation is and to make a report. The Veterans' Bureau has done that in very many cases; but I had assumed that the Senator's activity, the Senator's influence, and the Senator's insistence would have led to some action long before this time, if the facts are as he has described them; and I have no doubt that they are. Certainly things have come to a deplorable situation if it is necessary for committees of Congress to become hospital inspectors. If the Senator from Arizona has not obtained results after all his energy, how can a committee's visit to Arizona be effective? The Veterans' Bureau exists for the very purpose of providing proper hospitalization facilities.

Mr. ASHURST. I believe the facts are as I have stated them.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. It is regrettable that a Senator should have to iterate and reiterate on the floor of the Senate, as the Senator from Arizona has done, the situation in that State and apparently obtain no relief. Something ought to be done. Either the facts are or they are not as represented to the Senator from Arizona, and if they are as he represents them, some one is responsible for the neglect to house and care for these soldiers, and if it is the Chief of the Veterans' Bureau or the chief of the medical section who is derelict in his duty that official should be removed. I can not believe after all that has been said through the country about adequate hospital facilities for diseased veterans, after our extensive investigations and severe criticism of conditions and demand for immediate improvement, that the situation in Arizona remains unchanged and unremedied. What explanation does the Veterans' Bureau make?

Mr. ASHURST. Let me not be misunderstood. The Veterans' Bureau, when I discussed the matter with them of the need of further hospitalization of soldiers, pointed to the fact that in Prescott, the town in which I live, there is a great hospital for tubercular soldiers. Mr. President, I desire to compliment the bureau for the building and the expansion of the great hospital at Whipple Barracks, which is probably one of the select hospitals in the world of its kind. The Veterans' Bureau have also expanded a great hospital at Fort Bayard in New Mexico.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I think the difficulty comes from a lack of appreciation of the real situation in that section of the country. The situation in New Mexico is very largely the same as that described by the Senator from Arizona as existing in his State. There are a number of physicians in this country who believe that tuberculosis can be treated just as well in a humid climate as in a dry climate, and undoubtedly they are sincere in such belief.

Mr. ASHURST. I believe they are sincere.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I am afraid that view obtains in the bureau here in Washington. I wish to corroborate what the Senator from Arizona has said, that whether that contention be right or wrong the disabled soldiers do not believe it.

Mr. ASHURST. Exactly.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. And they are flocking to New Mexico and Arizona, where they are becoming dependent in large degree upon the assistance of private citizens.

Furthermore, Mr. President, I have been told it is desired to establish hospitals in some large cities, because they want better accommodations for the officers who will be in charge. It is my observation, however, that those afflicted with tuberculosis should not be congregated in large cities. I have been in touch with the tubercular situation for about 37 years, and I think I know something about it. In my honest judgment those afflicted with the disease are better off if not placed in such great numbers in any one locality, and by all means they should be kept in a dry climate.

Physicians may deal with this question in a theoretical way if they want to, but they can not convince the disabled soldier that that is the right way. The disabled soldiers may be found in Arizona and New Mexico by the hundreds. Hospital facilities there are lacking. The officers of the American Legion in New Mexico have been pressing these facts upon the attention of the bureau and have been pleading for such facilities, as I also have done. It is true, as the Senator says, that the hospital at Fort Bayard has been enlarged. That hospital has a record of efficiency beyond that of any other hospital in all this land; but complaint is being made about the facilities there; they are not extensive enough; they can not accommodate the patients who want to go there. So the patients are scattered all over the State.

I hope that by means of the Senator's address and the humble words which I may utter those who have charge of this matter will be impressed. Whether they are theoretically right or wrong, the soldiers do not believe they are right; they are flocking into that section of the country, and there ought at least to be provided the hospital facilities where the disabled soldiers think they will be benefited if not cured.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, the Senator from New Mexico has stated in a few words what I have in many words tried to say.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. May I ask the Senator a few questions to ascertain what the real situation is?

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. First of all, does the Senator contend that there has been no relief granted to the situation which he has innumerable times described on the floor of the Senate?

Mr. ASHURST. No; I do not contend that, for there has been relief extended.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. But not sufficient thus far to take care of the disabled veterans flocking into the southwestern section of the country?

Mr. ASHURST. Let me describe to the Senator what is going on, or what has been going on.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Let me first ask the Senator another question. I should like to have him state when he began his efforts, what steps he and others in Arizona have taken, how many times they have been to see the President, how many times they have been to the Veterans' Bureau, and whether or not any results have followed his or his constituents' efforts. If improved conditions have followed from his and their efforts, but not sufficient results, that is one thing; whereas if no results have followed and nothing has been done, that is another proposition.

Mr. ASHURST. I have gone over in detail and at some length the various steps which have been taken. I have pointed out that if adequate facilities were constructed at Tucson and Phoenix, or the present facilities were properly expanded, large numbers of soldiers who now want to go there and who have been there and been sent away by the bureau would return there and find relief and recovery.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Then the Senator's suggestion is that the hospital facilities there are sufficient for the disabled soldiers in that locality?

Mr. ASHURST. No.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Wait a moment.

Mr. ASHURST. Not at all.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. But there are disabled veterans coming in from various parts of the country, sincerely believing that the climate there will help them, and so they have overflowed the hospitals and private individuals have had to take care of them?

Mr. ASHURST. That is the situation.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator has called that situation to the attention of the Senate repeatedly, and together with delegations from the State has called it to the attention of the President, I understand.

Mr. ASHURST. I called the matter to the attention of the President once.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. He has called the situation to the attention of the Veterans' Bureau on various occasions?

Mr. ASHURST. Many times.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. And the answer has been, if I am correct, "Physicians advise us—and we must follow their advice—that the climate there is no better than the climate elsewhere for the treatment of tuberculosis. We are having calls and demands made in various sections for hospitals, so that the friends of the disabled and diseased veterans may conveniently visit them; we can not build any more in Arizona; we are advising these men to go back home, where they can be cared for, but they will not go home; we can not do anything more than to advise them to go away." Is that the situation?

Mr. ASHURST. That is the situation.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. What the Senator wants to do is to have a committee of the Senate go down there, to disregard the bureau's advice, to disregard the physicians' advice, to disregard the opinion of experts, to find these facts; that diseased veterans are there, whether rightly or wrongly, believing they will be cured, and in consequence the Senator believes we should make a recommendation that additional hospital facilities be provided in Arizona. Is not that the whole story?

Mr. ASHURST. That is what I seek. The Senator, in more felicitous language than I could employ, has stated what I have tried to say.

Mr. President, the board of consulting physicians in the bureau are eminent men of character, men of ability, and it was with not a little embarrassment that I was obliged to discuss a technical subject with them; they were practical men, seeking the good of the soldier, I believe; certainly they are seeking to do the duty imposed on them by the director in giving their advice. They asked me the question, "Is it your idea that the Government should establish hospitals whenever the soldier himself says he wishes hospitalization at a certain place? Do you mean to say that you are here to argue that the director should set up hospitals for tubercular soldiers wherever the soldier says he wants one?"

While my embarrassment in talking on a technical subject with those men was considerable, I labored under no embarrassment in answering that question, and promptly answered, "Yes." In time of war I believe the commander should be able to say to the soldier, "You go. You stay. You hold this point." But in time of peace, after the spiders are beginning to cobweb the cannon's throat and the peril has passed away, I see no impropriety, indeed, I see justice, in permitting a soldier afflicted with this baneful disease, tuberculosis, to say, "I like the climate here. Here I have a serene mind. Here I can digest my food. Let me have hospitalization here." A just and beneficent and humanitarian government will give him the right to say that.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I hope we will now proceed with the tariff bill, but I want to say to my good friend the Senator from Arizona that there has been no appropriation of $17,000,000 for hospitalization. It was authorized, and I think the Committee on Appropriations this afternoon will report the bill and ask immediate consideration of it.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Of course, the complaint the Senator makes is a complaint as to administration.

Mr. SMOOT. I was just going to say, as to the part of the Senator's statement complaining about the administrative features, I have not had time to make an investigation, but I do know that nearly every official in the Veterans' Bureau was a soldier himself in the recent war, and it does seem to me that that being the case they ought to look out for the soldiers' interests. I can not see why they would not.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator, as usual, is correct in his statement as to the situation in regard to the bill. He is correct when he says that the money has not been actually appropriated. It has been authorized, and the bill which I think he is going to report soon appropriates $12,000,000, leaving five million available.

Mr. SMOOT. It is sixteen million.

Mr. ASHURST. I repeat, I have seized this opportunity, and whether properly or not, I have used this as a forum, as a conduit, through which to get these facts and ideas to the public, in order that the pressure of public opinion may influence the director and his advisers.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I do not think that the committee appointed by the Senate to inquire into the condition of the veterans of the country need offer any explanation or apology for their conduct in this matter. After a most exhaustive study of the whole problem of the treatment of the veterans the committee, presided over by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND], made an exhaustive report to the Senate. I think that report did much to bring about early consideration of the legislation which led to the establishment of the Veterans' Bureau, the enactment of the law which followed that, and also the passage of the bill, which has passed the House of Representatives, providing for the appropriation of $17,000,000 for hospitals.

Of course, the Senator from Arizona knows that our committee can not go out and visit all the sites suggested for hospitals in the States. If we attempted to do that we would have to go to every State in the Union. There are some splendid sites which the Senators from New York are urging upon the Veterans' Bureau which ought to be selected, places in the Adirondack and Catskill Mountain sections of our State, which we believe would be just as helpful in bringing back the tubercular soldiers to health as the State of Arizona. Many things ought to be done which have not been done. I offer no apology for the bureaus of the Government which have charge of these things, but I am hopeful, as the Senator is, that when this appropriation is made to-day we can successfully appeal to the Veterans' Bureau for relief for these tubercular men.

Two months ago a building was purchased in the upper part of New York City, where provision is being made for the mental cases, and we are doing some excellent work in that direction. But the tubercular situation is most difficult, difficult because many of the medical men state that the tubercular patients can be treated just as well in the humid sections as they can in the dry sections of the country.

Mr. ASHURST. I would like to have the Senator give me the name of a physician who will say that tuberculosis of the lungs may be treated in a wet, humid climate with the same degree of efficiency with which it could be treated in a dry climate.

Mr. CALDER. I have always believed as the Senator has expressed himself now, but some of the most eminent medical men in the country have told me to the contrary, and what can we do, under the circumstances, but leave it to their judgment?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The statement of the Senator from New York is absolutely correct. The very men who are acting as an advisory medical board to the Veterans' Bureau have made that statement. I can not recall their names now. One is Dr. White, I am quite sure. I confess that I was surprised at such a statement.

Mr. CALDER. I was, too, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I sympathize with the position of the Senator from Arizona, that since these men believe that that climate is helpful to them, that the Southwest is a good place to treat tuberculosis, undoubtedly having that impression so strongly fixed in their minds, some consideration of that fact ought to be entertained in building hospitals.

Mr. President, may I just add one word, and then I will surrender the floor to the Senator who is entitled to it?

The Senator from New York omitted to point out that one of the recommendations of our committee was to prevent just what the Senator from Arizona complains about—inability heretofore to fix responsibility for neglect. Recent legislation has directed the Director of the Veterans' Bureau to build these hospitals, to be responsible for the hospitalization of these men, and upon his shoulders rests the responsibility. If the Senator can prove neglect, it is very easy to fix it under existing law.

Mr. FRANCE obtained the floor.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCNARY in the chair). Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. FRANCE. I wish to discuss the farm schedule of the tariff bill, and perhaps it will take me from 40 to 50 minutes. If the Senator wishes to say a word, and I can yield without losing the floor, I shall be glad to yield to him.

Mr. CARAWAY. I should like to take the floor for a few minutes, if the Senator will yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield?

Mr. FRANCE. I yield.

ATTORNEY GENERAL DAUGHERTY.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I apologize to the Senate for having risen again to discuss a matter, just briefly, on which I realize I have taken too much time of the Senate already. There appeared this morning in the Washington Post this editorial:

ATTACKS ON MR. DAUGHERTY.

The nature of the attacks made upon Attorney General Daugherty indicates that they are inspired by political motives for the purpose of discrediting the Department of Justice and impeding its prosecution of criminals. Several Attorneys General have had experiences of this kind.

When simmered down, the most serious charges against Mr. Daugherty are that he is a politician and that he is a bad enemy and a good friend. As politicians make these charges and as all good Americans are politicians, or ought to be, it seems hardly probable that Mr. Daugherty will suffer ignominy because of his activity in politics. If all citizens were as active in politics as Mr. Daugherty, the affairs of the United States would be capably administered at all times and there would be fewer charlatans in public places. The impostor and "four-flusher" instinctively hates a man like Harry Daugherty. So long as he is Attorney General there is no comfort to be found by lawbreakers, and nothing would please them so much as to have him resign in discouragement and disgust as a result of their attacks. But they mistake their man.

The public interest, so far as the prosecution of crimes against the United States is concerned, is in the hands of an official who can not be swerved from his duty. He knows the interests that are making the fight against him, and no doubt he will take extra pleasure in making sure that they get their deserts from the United States Government.

Mr. President, I do not know the Attorney General, and never saw him. I have no interest in him one way or the other. As I said the other day, I think he is a good enough Attorney General for this administration. But I want to ask the Post, or any friend of the Attorney General, to name a single man accused of crime who is interested in having the Attorney General removed. No man accused has sought any help from me to make the Attorney General's position difficult. Two have communicated with me about this matter. One is T. B. Felder, who assured me—and grew angry with me because I did not agree with him—that the Attorney General had no part in procuring the Morse commutation of sentence. The other, whose telegram I put in the RECORD, is C. W. Morse, whose pardon the Attorney General had been instrumental in procuring.

They both took me to task for criticizing the Attorney General. Both defended the Attorney General. They are the only two who are threatened that I know anything about, and Felder is not threatened; I did not intend to say he was accused of crime. But Morse is indicted.

Morse is vexed that I have criticized his friend, and I put his telegram in the RECORD.

What criminal has the Attorney General ever prosecuted? What malefactor of great wealth has suffered at his hands? What interests that are criminal could feel safer than to have the present Attorney General remain in office? I do not know of any of them who want him out. Criminals are no greater fools than are other people.

If the Post implies that there is some one back of me influencing me, it simply does not know, to put it mildly. I have not sought the Attorney General's removal. I have not wanted to embarrass him. As I have explained once before, I got into a controversy with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], who denied that the Attorney General had been at all interested in securing the pardon or the commutation of sentence of Morse, and had placed me in a rather embarrassing situation. I was repeating what had been common rumors.

The Senator from Indiana said it was not true. Of course, the Senator from Indiana was repeating what the Attorney General had told him. The Attorney General had told him that he had nothing to do with Morse's pardon or the commutation of the sentence. Of course, the Attorney General was not candid then, because the evidence he offers himself, through the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS], in the letter from Mr. Wickersham, proves that.

Mr. Taft said that he did not see him. I have written Mr. Taft a letter giving certain information which I have, and when I get his answer I shall put it in the RECORD. I know that somebody saw Mr. Taft, or somebody who has heretofore had a reputation for being honest is not truthful, and I shall give the Chief Justice, for whom I entertain a very high regard, a chance first to pass upon that question.

The Attorney General said that there was nothing reprehensible in the action of Mr. Daugherty. I am not quoting his words. Well, I do not suppose the Attorney General would admit that he had been guilty of cooperating in a game of that kind; but, on the other hand, not a word have I ever said to the effect that the Attorney General did something that he could not have done openly. It was a question of opinion, and therefore this is a false issue.

But I want to read, Mr. President, a report, a memorandum, February 18, 1922, of W. O. Watts, special agent, to W. J. Burns, Chief Bureau of Investigation. Reference to the conduct of certain war-graft cases. Exhibits from Nos. 1 to 6.

First. Who is W. O. Watts? W. O. Watts was a special agent of the Department of Justice. He is the agent that helped the Graham Congressional Investigating Committee in the House. This committee kept him and used him, and based their findings to some extent, at least, upon information dug up by him. They thought so well of him he was transferred as a special investigator to the Attorney General's office. He was dismissed from the office; but here is what I want to call to the attention of the country—that in dismissing him there is not an intimation that W. O. Watts is not honest; that what he says is not true; that all the matters that he discussed were not correct. The Attorney-General dismissed him because it was said that he was disloyal to the Attorney General or to the department in that he had given to Members of Congress information that was confidential—not that the information he gave out was not true. Nobody has asserted that; and to show how far from being considered untrue it is, this information was given to two Members of the House, both of them Republicans, both of them former soldiers in the World War.

One of them was serving in the House when the call to arms came. He walked out of the House of Representatives and enlisted as a private soldier. He carried his gun on his shoulder until by merit he won a promotion. He went to France and shed his blood on the fighting line in northern France. He came back, and his people have returned him to Congress. These reports were given by him to ROYAL JOHNSON, Congressman from South Dakota, and to Mr. WOODRUFF, a Member of Congress from Michigan, and upon Watts's information each made a speech in the House assailing the Attorney General and threatening him with impeachment proceedings unless he proceeded in the prosecution of certain cases which had been called to his attention by Mr. Watts. The Attorney General at once took action, at least against the Lincoln Motor Co., by sending the papers to Michigan to be acted upon.

Mr. Watts was dismissed from the service by this letter:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, D. C., April 24, 1922.

Mr. W. O. WATTS,
Special Agent, Department of Justice.

SIR: By direction of the Attorney General, you are dismissed from the service of this department, effective immediately upon receipt of this letter.

Now, for what reason?

You are removed for disloyalty to the Department of Justice, inasmuch as you knowingly and willfully violated the rules of the department, which, as you must be aware, constitutes a breach of trust.

Upon application to the disbursing office of this department your salary will be paid up to this time.

Respectfully,
RUSH L. HOLLAND,
Assistant Attorney General.
(For the Attorney General.)

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, what is the date of that letter?

Mr. CARAWAY. The date is April 24, 1922. Before he was dismissed the department addressed a letter to him which is rather long, and I will not read it unless so requested, or his reply to it. The letter asks if he had made certain disclosures to the two Representatives named—that is, ROYAL JOHNSON and Mr. WOODRUFF, of Michigan.

Here is part of a report that Watts made prior to this trouble. It is of February 18, 1922. He is quoting Mr. A. F. Myers, who is yet in the Department of Justice. Mr. Myers was talking about the Morse case, and here is what he said. Here is Watts's report:

Mr. Myers said, in effect, "The Attorney General is very much concerned about ordering Morse's return and that he did not desire to appear too prominently in the prosecution, preferring that the matter be handled by officials of the Shipping Board, for the reason that the Attorney General had procured from President Taft the pardon of Morse when he was in the Federal prison in Atlanta and that an embarrassing situation might arise because Mr. Morse had refused to pay Mr. Daugherty a large fee which he claimed for obtaining the pardon. That Mr. Daugherty had sent the pardon to Mrs. Morse to cause the least possible embarrassment and that Morse had subsequently claimed that Mrs. Morse had obtained the pardon and for this reason had refused the fee demanded.

Mr. President, that is a part of a report made before JOHNSON or WOODRUFF or myself had said anything about the Attorney General. However, in passing let me say a committee in the House of Representatives, composed in large part of Republicans, has voted out a resolution, based upon the Watts charges, to investigate the Attorney General.

The Post says that all this is an effort of somebody to shield criminals. I shall be pleased for the Post or for the Attorney General or any of the friends and apologists for Mr. Daugherty to point out the criminals who want Mr. Daugherty out of office. I say frankly there is not anyone indicted nor anyone threatened with indictment in whom I am interested. If a man has been guilty of violating the law, I do not care who he is, I do not care with what political party he affiliates, I do not care what his standing is or what his past may be, I want the Attorney General to do his duty and prosecute him; but I do not believe he is going to prosecute men of great influence; I do not believe other people think so. Therefore, without comment, since I have read the editorial, I shall read to you from an official list at the time of the activity for which Morse was indicted, "Officers and directors of shipbuilding companies having contractual relations with Emergency Fleet Corporation," arranged alphabetically by companies.

Morse was indicted for his activities in connection with the Virginia Shipbuilding Corporation. I want to read you something about the Virginia Shipbuilding Corporation and who are or were some of its officers and directors at the time of these transactions for which Morse is now indicted. It is as follows:

Virginia Shipbuilding Corporation, The: General office: Alexandria, Va. (controlled by the United States Steamship Co., 50 Broad Street, New York City). Official mailing address: Alexandria, Va. Branch offices, if any: 1320 F Street, Room 204, Washington, D. C. (Location of plant: Alexandria, Va. Location of other shipbuilding plants, if any, owned or controlled by above company. Contract No. 145 (assigned by Groton Iron Works). Directors: Colin H. Livingstone, Washington, D. C.; C. W. Morse, New York City—

The man who is indicted—

George W. Loft, New York City; J. R. Meany, 50 Broad Street, New York City; E. B. McLean, care of the Washington Post, Washington, D. C.

He is the owner of the Post, which says criminals fear Daugherty and are trying to embarrass him. Mr. President, I shall offer no comment.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me, I desire to take only a moment in response to some of the statements made by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. FRANCE. I yield.

Mr. WILLIS. I do not desire to delay the passage of this tariff bill, and I do not propose to lend myself to dilatory tactics by making any extended remarks. I want to make only two observations.

One is that before this thing is through with I think my friend the Senator from Arkansas and everybody else will be perfectly satisfied that the Attorney General is enforcing the law and is properly performing the duties of his office. In what I now say I do not mean in the slightest way to reflect upon the Senator from Arkansas, because I do not think anybody could use him or anyone is trying to use him, and if they were, he is too able and independent and courageous to permit such a thing as that; but I do say that I know that there are forces at work that are seeking to discredit the Department of Justice because the Department of Justice is getting tremendously near to some people.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. WILLIS. Certainly.

Mr. CARAWAY. Who are the forces? Name them.

Mr. WILLIS. The Senator did not hear me. He was not in the Chamber at the moment. I absolved the Senator entirely from anything of that kind.

Mr. CARAWAY. Of course; I knew that.

Mr. WILLIS. I absolved the Senator entirely from any matter of that kind; but it will be found out, in good time, that certain forces are seeking to discredit the Department of Justice because the Department of Justice is getting pretty close to some people. In my judgment, these efforts to discredit and break down the department will not deter its officials from vigorous prosecution of offenders.

Secondly, without reflecting in any way at all upon my friend from Arkansas, I think he has been misinformed as to the directorate, the names of which he has just read. I am quite certain that Mr. McLean was not a member of that board of directors, and I state, as a matter of information, that he was not. I do not question the reading of the document.

Mr. CARAWAY. If the Senator will come here I will show it to him.

Mr. WILLIS. Oh, I do not question the Senator's reading. I do not question that the Senator has read it correctly; but I think the document is incorrect.

THE TARIFF.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7456) to provide revenue, to regulate commerce with foreign countries, to encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for just a moment?

Mr. FRANCE. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I understand that there is no objection now to taking a vote upon the pending amendment affecting lactic acid. I have been so told.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I do not think there is any objection; but a large number of Senators who are interested in the subject are out of the Chamber, and I suggest to the Senator that he call for a quorum.

Mr. SMOOT. I was going to say that with the information I have, and for the purpose of having a vote at this time upon the amendments affecting lactic acid, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gerry	McCormick	Sheppard
Ball	Glass	McCumber	Shortridge
Borah	Gooding	McKellar	Simmons
Brandegee	Hale	McLean	Smoot

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-six Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee on page 2, line 12, before the word "cents" to strike out "1½" and insert "2," so as to read:

Lactic acid, containing by weight of lactic acid less than 30 per cent, 2 cents per pound.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I desire to state that the rate upon this item as fixed by the House is the same as the present rate of duty. The committee amendment proposes to increase the rate from 1½ to 2 cents per pound. I do not believe any reason has been given why this increase should be made, and I hope the committee amendment will be rejected.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CARAWAY (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. McKINLEY]. I can obtain no transfer, and in his absence withhold my vote.

Mr. HALE (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] to the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CROW], and vote "yea."

Mr. JONES of New Mexico (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD], which I transfer to the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], and vote "nay."

Mr. McKELLAR (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW]. Being unable to obtain a transfer, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). Transferring my pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STANFIELD], I vote "yea."

Mr. WATSON of Georgia (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Arizona [Mr. CAMERON]. In his absence, not being able to obtain a transfer, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PEPPER], and permit my vote to stand.

Mr. McCUMBER (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING]. I understand that he has not voted. Therefore, I transfer my pair to the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. WELLER] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. DIAL. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. SMITH] is unavoidably detained. I ask that this announcement may continue through the day.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN];

The junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. ERNST] with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY]; and

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] with the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL].

The result was announced—yeas 40, nays 23, as follows:

YEAS—40.

Ball	France	McCormick	Poindexter

So the committee amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment of the committee will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 2, line 13, before the word "cents," strike out "3" and insert "4," so as to read:

Lactic acid * * * 30 per cent or more and less than 55 per cent, 4 cents per pound.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, there are no importations of that character; in fact, the Reynolds Commission, which sent out to get comparative prices, were unable to find any of that acid on the market which had been reported. No reason has been given why the rate of duty on that item should be increased. I therefore move to strike out of the committee amendment the numeral "4" and insert in lieu thereof "1½," which is the present law on that item.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from New Mexico will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 2, line 13, the Senator from New Mexico proposes to amend the committee amendment by striking out the numeral "4" and inserting in lieu thereof "1½," so it will read:

Thirty per cent or more and less than 55 per cent, 1½ cents per pound.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. On my amendment to the amendment, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HALE (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before relative to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. JONES of New Mexico (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] and vote "yea." I ask that this announcement of the transfer of my pair may stand for the day.

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as on the previous vote, I vote "nay."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as on the previous vote, I vote "nay."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before with reference to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. WATSON of Georgia (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before in reference to my pair, I withhold my vote.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before in reference to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. McCORMICK. Has the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK] voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He has not voted.

Mr. McCORMICK. I have a standing pair with the Senator from Wyoming, which I transfer to the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. RAWSON], and vote "nay."

Mr. McKELLAR. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] to the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN]. I make that transfer and vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN];

The junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. ERNST] with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY]; and

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] with the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL].

The result was announced—yeas 23, nays 39, as follows:

So the amendment of Mr. JONES of New Mexico to the amendment of the committee was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is upon the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Let the amendment be stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. In the clause relative to lactic acid, on page 2, line 13, before the word "cents," it is proposed to strike out the numeral "3" and insert the numeral "4," so as to read:

Thirty per cent or more and less than 55 per cent, 4 cents per pound.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next committee amendment will be stated.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, in the same clause, on page 2, line 14, before the word "cents," to strike out the numeral "5" and insert the numeral "9," so as to read:

And 55 per cent or more, 9 cents per pound.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, the grade of this acid which is imported is 80 per cent pure. Below that grade comes what is known as "technical lactic acid," which is used rather extensively; but there is no importation to compete with it, as was found by the Reynolds Commission. The present duty upon acid of that grade and above is 1½ cents a pound. In the Payne-Aldrich law, on this grade, the rate of duty was 3 cents a pound. The effect of the committee amendment will be to increase the Payne-Aldrich rate by 300 per cent and to increase the present rate by 600 per cent. I therefore move to strike out the numeral "9" and to insert the numeral "1½," that being the present rate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Mexico to the committee amendment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I merely wish to say a word in reference to this particular amendment. I think it very clearly demonstrates the inartificial way in which this bill has been prepared. Lactic acid comes in various grades of concentration. Under the present law there is a uniform rate of 1½ cents a pound. Naturally, the importer purchases lactic acid of a higher concentration, because in that way he can import more at the lower rate. In other words, if he brought in lactic acid 80 per cent pure he would pay a less tax than if he brought it in at 30 per cent pure, because the rate is uniform.

Of course, the rate levied in the present law was levied for revenue purposes, it being expected that there would be some slight importations from which revenue would be derived. Under the rate of 9 cents a pound proposed by the pending bill, of course, no importations will come in, for the rate is absolutely prohibitive.

The difference between the grades of lactic acid is not a question of manufacture, but is a question of putting water in it. Lactic acid of 80 per cent purity may be reduced very readily by dilution with water. I think the larger use of lactic acid is for tanning, but as high a grade as 80 per cent is not necessary for tanning purposes. However, the 80 per cent grade is imported and then reduced by the application of water. When the basic rate on 30 per cent lactic acid was fixed by the committee at 2 cents a pound, evidently the mind of the committee met on the proposition that from the standpoint of a protective tariff that was a fair rate.

Under the terms of this bill the duty on lactic acid on all grades above 55 per cent is 9 cents a pound. The duty would be no more, therefore, on 100 per cent acid; but I know of no 100 per cent grade, 80 per cent being the highest concentrate of which I know. If the rate is put at 9 cents a pound on 80 per cent lactic acid, it is apparent that the importer is not going to import 80 per cent lactic acid, but is going to bring in the lower grades and reduce the concentration with water.

Mr. SMOOT. He could reduce it to 54 per cent, for instance.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. He could reduce it to 54 per cent or to 30 per cent, for he gets the lowest rate of duty on the 30 per cent grade. Supposing that the concentration ran up as high as 90 per cent, if the bill were made uniform the rate on 30 per cent being 2 cents a pound, and 90 per cent being three times 30 per cent, the duty on the 90 per cent grade should be 6 cents. The rate on the various degrees of concentration should be uniform, it seems to me; but it is apparent, as I look at the rate provided, that 9 cents a pound is put on the highest grade, the highest concentration of lactic acid, because that will force whatever lactic acid comes into this country, if any of it shall come in, to be imported at the lower rate, having larger bulk and requiring the importer to pay a higher freight rate on importations. That is all there is to it, so far as I can see. It is an effort to inconvenience the importer and make him pay higher freight rates because of the form in which the lactic acid will be imported, and, of course, the American people in using it will have to pay the penalty to that extent. Therefore I think the rate proposed is entirely without justification.

Mr. TOWNSEND. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Does the Senator think that 1½ cents a pound is the proper rate, in view of the vote which has just been had?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. One and one-half cents was the rate proposed by the former amendment.

Mr. TOWNSEND. As I understand, the pending amendment is to strike out "9" and insert "1½"?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course, the Senators on this side of the Chamber are not in favor of protective tariff. If we were levying a revenue tariff, I think 1½ per cent would be sufficient, but from the standpoint of a protectionist, if we are to levy a protective tariff, if the basic rate on the 30 per cent concentration is to be 2 cents a pound, I can not see how a rate above 6 cents a pound can be justified on the higher concentration.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. I understand that the regular commercial grades are three, namely, 22 per cent, 44 per cent, and 66 per cent. Very little of the 66 per cent grade comes in, the grade usually imported being 80 per cent and above. Therefore, having doubled the rate on the grade between 22 and 44 per cent strength, then the rate should be doubled again on the grade between 44 and what will really be about 90 per cent.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But that is merely a rule of thumb. The rate is being based on the commercial grades, when the strength of lactic acid merely depends upon how much water may be put in it. The 80 per cent acid is imported not for use but is concentrated in that form because the importers have to pay a less tariff on it, and, of course, a less freight rate. I can not see any logical reason why the committee should levy a rate of 9 cents a pound on the higher grade of the commodity, if the basic rate of 2 cents a pound is right from the standpoint of a protective tariff, when the highest concentrate has only three times the strength of the 30 per cent grade. I presume it was intended to make the rate prohibitive as to the higher grades, and if any importations should come in to force them to be of the lower grades. That, however, is the business of the majority; it is not mine.

Mr. LODGE. By bringing in lactic acid of the higher per cent there is, of course, a great saving.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Undoubtedly.

Mr. LODGE. It may be diluted subsequently, but it is a great saving to the importer to bring in the 80 per cent grade.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; it saves freight rates and saves the purchasers in this country paying those freight rates. I am not arguing the question from that standpoint. I am calling to the attention of the Senate the differential the committee has imposed against the higher grade, and for that I can see no reason whatever.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I want to say just a word.

What is expected to be the result of this rate is quite apparent. We were advised by the chairman of the Finance Committee that the only evidence on which this rate was based was the mere fact that some of this acid was being imported. That was all that he needed to justify him in proposing this rate. That simply means that they want a prohibitory rate.

I agree with the Senator from Alabama that there is no scientific adjustment of these rates on the different grades of lactic acid; but unquestionably the purpose of this is to be sure and get the duty high enough to make it prohibitory. I think they quite succeed in it. I do not believe in making a prohibitory rate on these items. I should believe that the farmers of North Dakota would like to exchange a few bushels of wheat and let a few pounds of lactic acid come into the United States.

I ask for the yeas and nays upon my amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico to the amendment of the committee, upon which the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HALE (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "nay."

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). Making the same transfer as on the previous roll call, I vote "nay."

Mr. WATSON of Indiana (when his name was called). Making the same transfer as before, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (after having voted in the negative). I observe that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] has not voted. I have a pair with him, which I transfer to the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT], and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. McKELLAR. I find that I can transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] to the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], which I do, and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

So the amendment of Mr. JONES of New Mexico to the committee amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I desire to submit some observations on the farm schedule of the tariff bill; and I ask at this point that certain tables and statistics which I shall present be incorporated in the RECORD as part of my remarks at the appropriate places.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

MEASURES OF THE REPUBLICAN PARTY TO ADVANCE THE PRESENT AND FUTURE WELFARE OF THE AMERICAN FARMER.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, for many years I have been deeply interested in legislation for the protection and advancement of American agriculture. To make farming attractive and profitable is the first need of our national life. I know the problems of the American farmer. I have given much attention to the agricultural reports and books. I have examined closely masses of statistics and the census figures which record the progress of our agricultural activities. I have had long and practical contact with agricultural problems. For several years I served on the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry of the United States Senate. Last summer, in order to study conditions in foreign lands, I made an extensive tour in Europe, even traveling over Russia, where I met and talked with the Russian peasant farmers and came to know intimately their problems and hopes. For these reasons I feel that I can discuss the question of a protective tariff on farm products from the standpoint of one who knows the problems of the American farmers and the conditions which surround agricultural production abroad.

OUR FARMERS NEED PROTECTION.

I shall not discuss abstract theories, but I shall prove to you by statistics, which can not be questioned, that the American farmers must now have an adequate protective tariff on the products of their farms or be brought to the brink of ruin during the coming years by a flood of imports with which they are threatened because of conditions growing out of the war. I shall present in connection with my argument some most valuable statistics which have been compiled, not by myself, for I had not the time for such research, but by William W. Evans, an eminent statistician and expert, of the accuracy of whose work there can be no question. These statistics really constitute in themselves an unanswerable argument to prove that adequate high protective tariffs on such products as our farmers raise are now imperatively necessary. I believe that every Senator and every American farmer, who will follow my argument and study these statistics, must be convinced that the argument is unanswerable.

WORLD'S FOOD SUPPLY.

The first problem of the world is the abundant production and the proper distribution of the food for the feeding of the nations. At present the world is in a peculiar condition as a result of the war. There is some danger of a general world shortage of food. In some countries there is an overproduction and superabundance of food. In other countries there is underproduction of food and actual famine. Conditions of the exchange markets and the currencies of the various countries are such that the food is not moving through the arteries of world commerce from the countries where there exist overproduction and accumulation of food to the countries where there are underproduction of food and actual famine. As a result of this the farmers in the countries of abundance suffer from demoralized prices for farm products, while people in other lands perish, lacking the food which the farmers in the countries of abundance can not sell.

For example, in some Western States last November it was cheaper for the farmer to burn ear corn than to buy coal. Corn at 10 cents a bushel equals coal at $5 per ton, and corn at 25 cents a bushel equals coal at $12.50 per ton. So some of our western farmers were burning ear corn last winter to keep from freezing, while millions in Austria, Russia, and the Near East were perishing from lack of food. The chief problem of the present is the rehabilitation of agriculture so that there will be an abundant production of foods and the establishing of tariffs and the credit facilities so that the food may go from the places of plenty to the places of desperate need, where gaunt famine and pestilence are taking a dreadful toll of human life.

One of the most eminent students of agriculture—E. M. East—has estimated that it requires approximately 2.5 acres to support each individual human being, and that therefore it requires approximately 37,000,000 of acres more land each year to be placed under cultivation to supply the annual increase of the world's population. The same authority has estimated that out of the 33,000 millions of acres of the earth's surface approximately 13,000 millions of acres can be cultivated, and that of this approximately 5,000 millions of acres are under cultivation. According to his calculations, it would appear that the earth is capable of supporting, if properly tilled, something more than 5,000 millions of people on its total of 13,000 million tillable acres.

Although the earth, if properly tilled, is therefore capable of supporting more than three times its present population, nevertheless at the present time there are many countries in which the people are suffering from hunger, malnutrition, or actual starvation, while in other countries there are to be found excessive amounts of foodstuffs and greatly increased production. Moreover, there is grave danger that this uneven distribution of the world's food supply may be aggravated by the dumping here, from European or foreign countries where there is a surplus, of foodstuffs of which we ourselves have an excess. This may be caused as a result of the depreciated currencies abroad, which offer special inducements to the European farmers to sell their goods in American markets.

Before proceeding with my argument, I wish to call attention to some facts showing the decline of American agriculture.

DECLINE OF AMERICAN AGRICULTURE.

It has always been one of the chief concerns of the Republican Party to advance the welfare of the American farmer. Republican statesmen have viewed with anxiety the decreasing annual profits of the American farmer and the steady flow of population, due to the relative unprofitableness of farming, from the country to the city. In 1870 nearly one-half of our total population was engaged in agriculture, including fishing and mining. In 1890 only 39.65 per cent, or two-fifths of our people, were engaged in farming; in 1900 only a little over one-third of our people, 35.7 per cent, and in 1920 only 25.6 per cent of our people were engaged in the fundamentally important work of agricultural production. In the last decade, particularly, there has also been an alarming relative decrease in the number of those owning their farms, a startling increase in farm mortgages, and a steady increase in the number of tenant farmers. These facts, and others which I might mention, furnish conclusive evidence of the hardships which our farmers have suffered and of the unsatisfactory conditions which have surrounded agricultural production in the United States. No class of our citizens has endured more from the injustice of personal and arbitrary government during the last administration than those who are engaged in agriculture. The Republican Party has always stood for legislation favorable to our producers. The Democratic Party seeks to legislate in the interest of our consumers. The Republicans hold that if the productive power is increased all will be enriched and all who are both producers and consumers will receive the benefit.

The Republican Party has studied the needs of American agriculture and only its wise actions in the past have prevented disaster from overtaking the American farmer. Let me illustrate by giving you some startling figures. In 1899 the American farmers paid out in wages $357,392,000; in 1909 they paid out in wages for labor $651,611,000, an increase in farm-labor costs of 82.3 per cent. In 1899 our farmers paid out in fertilizer about $53,500,000, while in 1909 they paid out nearly $115,000,000, an increase of 115 per cent. Bearing in mind these facts, it is most significant that in 1899 the cereal crops amounted to 4,438,057,013 bushels, while in 1909 the cereal crops amounted to 4,512,564,465 bushels, an increase in the number of bushels of only 1.7 per cent. That additional cost of labor—82.3 per cent—and that increase for fertilizer—115 per cent—brought only 1.7 per cent increase of the cereal crops of the country. Because of the inevitably declining fertility of our soils it requires a constant increase in the labor and in the fertilizer to maintain our production at the same level. And yet, as I shall show, in spite of the hardships of our farmers during this decade, the Democrats in 1913 enacted the Underwood tariff law which placed wheat, corn, rye, potatoes, eggs and poultry, milk and cream on the free list and drastically reduced the duties on other important farm products, greatly increasing the difficulties of our farmers. I shall give some tables showing the great increase in imports with reductions of duties. And, if it had not been for the war, a serious crisis would have been caused in American agriculture.

REPUBLICAN CARE FOR THE FARMER.

Realizing that agriculture is the basic industry upon which the welfare and wealth of all depend, the Republican Party has adopted such an administrative policy as will result in a greater prosperity for our agricultural population and check the steady flow of people from the country to the city, which, if continued, must prove disastrous. The Republican Party, in State and Nation, has advocated and is securing more good roads, better central schools, improved rural social conditions, community market centers, the extension of the parcel post, more efficient methods for agricultural education, and the adoption of every method which will stimulate an interest in and knowledge of the fundamental importance of agriculture. A Republican Congress has adopted legislation which will make possible and encourage cooperative buying, selling, and shipping, and such other cooperative enterprises as must be of great assistance to agriculture. The Republican Party has adopted measures for the extension of credit facilities for our farmers and policies which tend to encourage the ownership of farms. Measures are being considered for the conservation of our lands and natural resources, for the prevention of that erosion which follows forest devastation, and for the preservation and development of phosphate beds and native sources of nitrates and potash. There can be no doubt that the simplification and standardization of farm machinery would lower the cost of machinery and the repair parts for the same and make it easier to secure interchangeable parts, and that millions of dollars might be saved, if this were done, for our American farmers. I was able to secure an amendment to the Agricultural appropriation bill in the Senate which provides a fund for the study by the Government of this important question, and this is an important step toward the simplification of farm machinery.

FUNDAMENTAL INDUSTRIES OF OUR GREAT COUNTRY.

The great available wealth of the United States is derived from the land—farms, mines, forests—and from our industries or factories, but it is not to be denied that the farms of America are the chief producers of wealth. When our farmers suffer as they have during the recent most critical years, the whole country feels the unfavorable effect of the agricultural depression. When the legitimate profits which the farmer should enjoy are no longer possible, because of high costs of production or unfavorable markets, the purchasing power of the farmers is paralyzed and merchants and manufacturers cease to be prosperous. I have briefly enumerated some of the causes of the agricultural depression which during recent years has proved to be so destructive to our agricultural interests. I desire to discuss the question of the necessity of an adequate protective tariff upon the products of the farm, a tariff which is now absolutely necessary because of the conditions which exist as a result of the war. I think I shall be able to conclusively prove the unfavorable effect upon American agriculture of the Democratic Underwood tariff bill, even in normal times, and to demonstrate that under present conditions a law similar to the Democratic Underwood tariff bill would bring disaster to the farmers of America. Under the Democratic Underwood tariff law the farmers were compelled to meet foreign competition at a time when there was industrial depression and unemployment, which always tends to decrease the consumption of the products of the farm. I shall prove that in certain of the foreign countries there is an excessive production of foods, which are now being produced at the lowest relative cost in the world's history because of the depreciated value of foreign currencies as compared with the American dollar.

Remember the fundamental fact that every producer of food or manufactured articles desires to sell in the market where he can secure a sound and stable currency or money. In other words, goods tend to flow from the countries where currency is depreciated and money has little value to the countries where money is sound. For example, when people were starving in Russia the Rumanians, who had a surplus of grains, did not ship to Russia, where the money is more depreciated than in Rumania, but to the countries with currency less depreciated than their own. In proceeding with my argument I desire to discuss the following influences which have caused and which may, in the absence of proper legislation, cause a serious agricultural depression:

CAUSES.

Let me summarize the causes as follows:

a. The excessive production of foodstuffs in certain of the foreign countries.

b. The enormously depreciated value of foreign money as compared with the American dollar, which makes possible the lowest cost in the world's history of producing agricultural products in the countries where the money is so depreciated.

c. The disastrous effects upon American agriculture of the Democratic Underwood tariff law, demonstrating the absolute necessity of adequate specific duties upon all agricultural products.

d. Diminished consumption of farm products in the United States in periods of industrial depression and unemployment, proving that the welfare of our farmers is inseparably bound up with that of the workers in our cities and industries.

e. The inability of our farmers to ship their surplus to certain countries where there exists a desperate need for foodstuffs and seed, owing to the fact that international, commercial, and economic systems are still disordered and a system of international credits has not been arranged.

During the war millions of men and women were withdrawn from the peaceful and plentiful production of the necessities and commodities of civilized life, especially food, and were engaged in the creation and organization of huge engines and armies for destruction. In the large agricultural countries—Russia, Serbia, Hungary, Rumania, France, and Italy—there was an alarming decrease in agricultural production.

But with the close of the war, with many of the industries in the cities destroyed, there being in many countries a great lack, both in the machinery and in the raw products necessary for industry, millions of men turned their attention to the great industry which was open to them, namely, to agriculture; and the agricultural production of certain of these countries of Europe has been markedly increased over the pre-war agricultural production.

The most valuable statistics, which have been prepared for me by an experienced and eminent statistician, both upon this point and in connection with my subsequent remarks, I ask to have inserted in the RECORD.

Table A shows the production in the United States and principal foreign countries of wheat, oats, rye, barley, potatoes, corn, and beans for four periods, namely:

Figures under column A show average yearly production from 1909 to 1913.

Figures under column B show production for 1919.

Figures under column C show production for 1920.

Figures under column D show production for 1921.

Countries marked with an "X" in this table are those having greatly depreciated exchange.

Countries marked with an "S" in this table are those having slightly depreciated exchange.

The table to which I have just referred will, of course, speak for itself. It simply proves the fact that in certain of the countries with greatly depreciated currencies there has been an enormous increase in the amount of foodstuffs now produced, as compared with the amounts produced prior to the war. The table is well worth careful study as proving the point that certain of those countries have greatly increased their production; that that production has been at a very much lower cost, due to the depreciation of the currency; and the subsequent argument will show that this constitutes a menace to American agriculture.

May I have permission to have these tables inserted in the RECORD?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, permission is granted.

The tables are as follows:

TABLE A.—Agricultural production of United States and foreign countries.

Production of cereals, potatoes, and beans; pre-war yearly average (1909–1913) and postwar years 1919, 1920, and 1921. (Compiled from reports of United States Department of Agriculture, Washington, D. C.)

Figures under column A show average yearly production from 1909 to 1913.

Figures under column B show production for 1919.

[1] 1918. [2] 1913.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, Table B shows the true value to-day of the currency of some of the foreign countries which are the greatest producers of agricultural products.

TABLE B.—Normal and present value of currency in certain foreign countries.

	Normal value.	Present value.	Percentage of depreciation.
	Cents.		Per cent.
Russia (ruble)	51.46	0.07 cent for 100 rubles.	99
Germany (mark)	23.8	¼ cent	98
Austria (crown)	20.3	0.01 cent	99
Poland (mark)	23.8	0.02 cent	99
Belgium (franc)	19.3	8½ cents	50
France (franc)	19.3	9½ cents	50
Rumania (leu)	19.3	¾ cent	98
Italy (lira)	19.3	5¼ cents	75
Czechoslovakia (crown)	20.3	2 cents	90

The above table shows the depreciation in currency of countries that are extensive producers of agricultural products, ranging from 50 to 99 per cent. Wages in these countries have advanced, but the increase in wages is a mere bagatelle compared to the overwhelming increase in depreciation of their money values, as is evidenced by the following:

GOLD VALUE OF LABOR.

To-day an ounce of gold in the United States pays the American worker for 17 hours of labor in the United States as against—

50.16 hours of labor in Great Britain.
95.5 hours of labor in Japan.
117.31 hours of labor in France.
201.55 hours of labor in Germany.
203 hours of labor in Russia.
203 hours of labor in Poland.
203 hours of labor in Austria.

In other words, the same amount of gold value purchases, in most of these foreign countries, over ten times, or over 100 per cent, more labor than in the United States; consequently it goes without saying that it is utterly impossible for the American farmer, as long as the foreign exchange is so tremendously depreciated, to expect the former volume of export business for his agricultural products.

PRE-WAR FOREIGN CROPS.

I desire to give a statement of the pre-war production of the principal agricultural products in foreign countries having greatly depreciated exchange, and a comparison with the production of the same products in the United States; also to give separately the production in foreign countries having slightly depreciated exchange, such countries as Canada, India, Spain, Great Britain, Australia, Japan, and so forth. I ask that these tables be inserted in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection it is so ordered.

The tables referred to are as follows:

WHEAT.

Production, yearly average, 1909–1913:	Bushels.

Production of countries (marked "S") with slightly depreciated exchange	1,117,324,000
Grand total production of wheat in foreign countries	2,779,593,000

United States production, yearly average, 1909–1913, 686,691,000 bushels.

Within a short time after the establishment of anything like a stable government in Russia that country might, through its great depreciation in money value (99 per cent), be able to land wheat at the custom-house door of the United States at 50 cents per bushel to the ruin of our wheat-producing farmers.

United States production yearly average 1909–1913, 34,916,000 bushels.

When Russia's and Germany's enormous production of rye is resumed any large importations of it would tend to decrease the price of American wheat, as for breadstuffs, etc., rye can be used as a substitute.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, these tables prove that the foreign countries, which have greatly depreciated currencies or moneys, produce agricultural products greatly in excess of the production of the United States. An ounce of gold buys approximately ten times as many hours of labor in these foreign countries as it does in the United States. Bearing in mind the fundamental fact, to which I have called attention, that commodities tend to flow, in the absence of barriers, from the countries where the money is depreciated or of little value to the countries where money is not depreciated, but is nearer the normal par gold value, you will see the peril which must result in ruin to the American farmers if an adequate protective tariff is not enacted. Commodities flow from countries where there is greater inflation of the currencies to a country where there is lesser inflation of currency as water runs downhill. American agriculture and industry are, therefore, now in danger of serious injury, if not partial destruction, by a flood of imports. Commodities move from the country of sound money or of lesser currency inflation to countries of unsound money or greater currency inflation with difficulty and only under artificial pressure, like water being pumped to a higher level. This accounts for the fact that American exports decreased to such a disastrous extent during the year of 1921 as compared with 1920. In 1920 our exports amounted to $8,228,016,307, while in 1921 they were $4,485,122,696, a loss in export trade of $3.742,893,611. This huge sum representing our loss in export trade would be sufficient to pay 4,000,000 men a wage of $70 each for a year. It is not strange that in 1921 we had from four to six millions of men unemployed and that the consumption of farm products at home was necessarily greatly reduced. The falling off of our export trade, resulting in agricultural and industrial depression, must be attributed to the depreciated currencies of Europe, as compared with the American dollar, due to inflation in Europe and the debts owing us by the European countries as a result of the war. This decline in our export trade occurred when Europe as a whole was in desperate need of food and commodities which Europe could not buy because of the huge debts of Europe to us, totaling in Government obligations and open accounts much more than $15,000,000,000. I refer to the needs of Europe as a whole, where some countries need food and seed most desperately, as well as machinery and manufactured goods, while others, like Poland and Rumania, require farming implements, machinery, and manufactured commodities.

ECONOMIC CONFERENCE NEEDED.

We must adopt an adequate protective tariff to prevent farm products from coming to the United States, where our currency is sound and there is an abundance of food, and means must be found to encourage the shipment of foodstuffs from the United States and from countries where there is a superabundance of food and certain raw products, such as cotton, to Germany, Russia, Austria, the Near East, and parts of China, where the currencies are unsound but the need for these products is so great. Since January, 1919, I have been urging the calling of a general international conference to be held in the United States to which would be invited the States signatory of or adherent to the convention for the pacific settlement of international disputes, of July 24, 1899, these being all of the principal countries of the world, including Germany and Russia. Such a conference should consider the common and mutual interests and the social and economic relations of States and peoples, formulate a body of international law based on the security of the fundamental rights of the individual, devise methods for the advancement of the backward peoples of colonies and protectorates to a higher state and ultimately to independence, promote the study of the problems of international finance, credits, and exchange with a view to the rehabilitation of international trade, and inaugurate a voluntary concert or cooperation between the nations for the preservation of peace and the promotion of liberty and the common welfare.

DETRIMENT TO THE AMERICAN FARMER OF THE DEMOCRATIC UNDERWOOD TARIFF RATES.

I present now Table C, statistics of imports into the United States of agricultural products for fiscal year 1913 and calendar years 1919 and 1920, and ask permission to have it inserted in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Senators will notice the enormous increase in importations of the principal agricultural products under the low Underwood tariff rates, the increase amounting to millions of dollars and thousands of per cent; and when we consider that some of the largest producing countries, like Russia, Czechoslovakia, and Hungary, have since the war produced practically nothing, but will soon resume again their enormous production, we can form an idea of what would have happened to the American farmer if the Republican Party had not intervened with the emergency tariff act of 1921.

PRE-WAR CEREAL EXPORTS.

I offer a table to show the exports of the principal cereals and potatoes before the war from the countries having depreciated currencies, in comparison with the exports from the United States. This table proves that the agricultural countries of Europe before the war produced a huge surplus for export, while Table A shows that practically all these countries except Russia are producing much more foodstuffs for export now than before the war:

In connection with this table I desire to call attention to a most startling fact. In the four years before the war the average exports from Russia of cereals were as follows:

RUSSIA'S PROSTRATION IMPERILS EUROPE.

Mr. President, when we consider these huge pre-war exports of foodstuffs by Russia to the industrial countries, together with the fact that at present Russia not only can not export foodstuffs but must import for her imperative needs at least 75,000,000 bushels of cereals, it must become apparent how critical is the present food situation of the world. The grains exported by Russia to the industrial countries were sufficient to feed approximately 60,000,000 or more inhabitants of the industrial countries, and before the war the peoples in the industrial countries of Europe were not generally overfed. Russia has been called the trunk of the tree of Europe, of which tree the industrial countries are the branches, and if Russia, the great food-producing organ of Europe, be not properly functioning hunger, malnutrition, unrest, social disturbances, and perhaps even actual industrial demoralization and revolution may occur in the industrial countries. To show what an indispensable part Russia in normal times takes in the production of the world's food, I call attention to the fact that the United States, in the four years prior to the war, produced a yearly average of wheat, oats, rye, and barley of 2,034,663,000 bushels, while Russia produced of the same grains 2,681,901,000 bushels, or practically 30 per cent more than the production of the United States.

WORLD NEEDS AMERICAN FOOD.

At the present time Russia is probably not producing more than 20 per cent of her normal crop, due to a shortage in seed, the decrease in horsepower, the loss in man power, and the lack of agricultural implements, a situation which was aggravated by last year's drought. Under these circumstances it is apparent that until Russia is rehabilitated the world must look to America for a much larger proportion of its food supply than was obtained here before the war. Moreover, as Russia is not functioning as a grain-producing country, it is to be expected that there must be such a world-wide demand for grain as will tend to enhance the prices of all our cereals when international credits are so arranged that the countries needing grains will be placed in a position to purchase.

Owing to the low prices which prevailed for grains during a large part of last year, prices not justified by the world conditions, many of our farmers became disheartened, and a campaign was started in certain parts of the country for cooperation among the farmers in the curtailment of the acreage to be planted in cereals in order that the price might be improved. In view of the figures which I have presented, it must be apparent how important it is, for his own prosperity and the welfare of the world, for the American farmer to sow the maximum possible acreage in grain. Of course, with the rehabilitation of Russian agriculture and with the improvements in the methods of the Russian farmer Russia will produce more grain than ever. While for the immediate future Russia will be an importing nation and it is to our interest to supply her from our surplus with the seeds, grains, agricultural machinery, and other equipment she requires, yet we must protect ourselves against the situation which will be created by the restoration of her huge productive power, which will enable her to export these millions of bushels of grain annually. We can neither afford, on the one hand, to refuse to export our products to a country when there is great need, nor, on the other hand, to permit ourselves to be flooded by the grains which this country will be able to produce when restored to productive power. The agricultural methods of the Russian peasant are most primitive. He cuts his grain with the sickle, hauls it to his small barn in a little one-horse wagon, and threshes it with a flail. Probably two men in America could till 100 acres of land as effectively with modern implements as five in a Russian family could till a Russian farm of 20 acres. From this it will appear what possibilities there are for that country when better methods and the use of modern machinery will release millions from agriculture for work in the development of Russia's other vast resources. But this change will come but slowly.

EXISTING CONDITIONS AND FUTURE PROSPECTS OF THE AMERICAN FARMER.

Mr. President, I have indicated that the greatly increased production of foodstuffs in certain of the European countries at a cost which is relatively very low, on account of the depreciated exchange, constitutes a menace to American agriculture. The outlook is not encouraging, but as a result of a wise tariff and beneficial legislation which will be enacted by the Republican Party, there must come a revival of confidence. I shall summarize briefly some of the measures which have been or which should be adopted by the Republican Party looking toward the rehabilitation of American agriculture:

1. A proper protective tariff with adequate specific duties on all agricultural products.

2. The further encouragement by legislation, in addition to that already enacted, of farmers' cooperative selling and marketing organizations.

3. The further increase of agricultural banking facilities.

4. Measures looking to an industrial revival in the United States, so that the workers in our industries may be placed in a position more freely to consume agricultural products. The industrial revival can be stimulated by wise foreign policy looking to the extension of American trade and enterprise to all parts of the world.

5. Improved highways.

6. Reasonable railroad and transportation rates, particularly on agricultural products.

7. The calling of an international conference, such as I have suggested, and the adoption of measures to promote our export trade, particularly to Germany and Russia and to other parts of the world in order that we may find markets for food, cotton, and other raw products and for the manufactured goods which certain of those countries need in vast quantities.

DISASTROUS TARIFF POLICIES OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY—NECESSARY CORRECTION THEREOF BY THE REPUBLICAN PARTY.

The tariff policy of the Democratic Party since 1832, when that party made a declaration for the principle of "tariff for revenue only" and advanced the theory that "protection is unconstitutional," has been injurious to the farmers of our country. The effect of the Great War has been to depreciate the value of foreign money and thus to reduce, as our tables have proven, the wages in certain of the countries having the largest production of agricultural commodities until the wages in those countries are only one-tenth the wages paid for similar work in the United States. It must be apparent that since the tariff policies of the Democratic Party in the past have been detrimental to our farmers, to-day, owing to the very much greater difference between the foreign wages and those paid in the United States, the dangers to our agriculture of a "tariff for revenue only" policy are now immensely greater than ever before in the history of our Government.

The additional facts which I am about to give must convince every farmer of the folly of looking to the Democratic Party for any action of theirs that will improve the farmer's present deplorable condition.

THE UNDERWOOD (DEMOCRATIC) TARIFF BILL A COMPLETE FAILURE.

The Underwood tariff was a failure from the American farmer's standpoint. I insert a table ("D") of rates on some of the principal agricultural products under the Republican (Dingley) tariff of 1897, the Republican (Payne) tariff of 1909, the Democratic (Underwood) tariff of 1913, the Republican emergency tariff of 1921, and under the proposed Fordney-McCumber bill (Senate rates):

IMPORTS AND REVENUES.

The following Table E shows the total failure of the Democratic Underwood tariff bill, both as a revenue producer and as a bill calculated to benefit the industries of the United States. It shows that, on an increase of about three times in value of imports into the United States, a less amount of revenue was collected, owing to the terrifically reduced (Underwood) rates.

(A) After the war, with the Underwood tariff in effect. The World War ended with the signing of the armistice November 11, 1918.
(B) The Republican emergency tariff act of May 27, 1921, which was in effect during this year, greatly increased the rates on certain farm products and possibly accounted for the decreased importations for 1921 over 1920.

THE DUTIES COLLECTED UNDER THE DEMOCRATIC UNDERWOOD TARIFF RATES ARE THE LOWEST OF ANY COUNTRY IN THE WORLD, INCLUDING SO-CALLED "FREE-TRADE" ENGLAND.

The following are the average rates of duty collected for the 12 months ending December 31, 1920, under the Democratic Underwood tariff:

	Per cent.
January, 1920	6.12
February, 1920	5.81
March, 1920	6.78
April, 1920	5.81
May, 1920	6.86
June, 1920	6.46
July, 1920	5.96
August, 1920	6.00
September, 1920	7.02
October, 1920	7.72
November, 1920	7.08
December, 1920	7.52

Or an average for the year of 6.49 per cent.

The average duties of the principal foreign countries are as follows:

Average duty.

	Per cent.
Great Britain, 1919–20	8.56
France, pre-war	8.55
Germany, April–December, 1919	15.66
Italy, pre-war	7.78

The average rates of duties collected in the United States under the Democratic Underwood tariff are lower than the rates of any other country in the world. The average duties in so-called "free-trade" England are 25 per cent higher than the United States—8.56 for England and 6.49 for the United States. Couple this condition with exchange in foreign money values, which makes the foreign wages for farm labor 30 cents per day as against $3 per day in the United States, and it will be seen that the farmer's condition is absolutely hopeless under any treatment that could possibly be accorded him by the Democratic Party.

BENEFICIAL REPUBLICAN TARIFF RATES (FORDNEY-M'CUMBER).

The Republican emergency tariff act of May 27, 1921, and the Fordney-McCumber rates now before the Senate contain the only hope of our farmer to help overcome his present difficulties due to low foreign wages, which are one-tenth of the wages he pays in the United States. Again, now, as in the past, the Republican Party will return prosperity in place of Democratic adversity and order out of Democratic chaos, only it will take time to right the many disastrous inheritances handed over by the Democratic Party on March 4, 1921, and the overwhelmingly detrimental results due to eight years of disaster through Democratic trials of erroneous theories and Democratic inefficiency resulting in staggering, fabulous costs being fastened upon the country.

OUR HERITAGE OF DEMOCRATIC DIFFICULTIES.

When the Republican administration came into power it was compelled to deal with a situation full of difficulties, but it has made much progress in bringing about order and efficiency in a Government the affairs of which had become chaotic during the stress of war. The Republicans are resolved to abolish the gross inefficiency and fabulous cost of government which have characterized the administration of recent years. The Republicans are resolved that there shall be a clear and definite reacceptance and reaffirmation of faith in the principles of the Republic as it was designed by the fathers, with its three separate, independent, and coordinate branches—legislative, executive, and judicial—the form of government which preserves liberty by division of authority, preventing that consolidation of powers in one office or official which constitutes true despotism. We condemn as tending to subvert our Government the practice by which legislation has been drafted in the executive departments and then forced by means of threats, intimidation, or other methods of coercion by the Executive on the legislative branch of the Government, which should represent the people. Our great President, Warren G. Harding, has acted in harmony with the principle that legislation must originate with and arise from the people through their representatives and that the President should discourage that enormous growth of Executive power so characteristic of the last administration, which tended toward tyranny. The Republicans have repealed many autocratic statutes. They have begun the reorganization of executive departments, have established a Budget system, have declared for the restoration of free speech, and stand for rigid governmental economy and a revision as soon as possible of our most burdensome taxes.

INDUSTRIAL SUCCESS IN THE UNITED STATES ABSOLUTELY ESSENTIAL TO OUR FARMERS.

As I have already indicated, the prosperity of our farmers is dependent upon prosperity in our industries. The failure of our export trade and many other factors growing out of the war have seriously depressed our industries and this has paralyzed the purchasing power of those who gain a livelihood from industry. There can be no doubt that one of the contributing causes of industrial depression has been our burdensome tax system. Huge surtaxes tend to drive funds from productive employment in industry to relatively unproductive investment in tax-exempt securities, such as State, county, municipal, and Government bonds. For an industrial revival it is essential that there be a reasonable tariff, a reduction in our taxes and surtaxes, a rehabilitation of international finance and the stimulation of our export trade.

STARTLING DECREASE OF CONSUMPTION OF AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS.

It is remarkable to what an extent the consumption of food is reduced in times of industrial depression. In 1921 there were consumed in the United States 250,000,000 less bushels of wheat than were consumed in 1920 due to unemployment of operatives in 1921 and the consequent necessity upon their part for reduced consumption. It is therefore most essential to the farmers that our industries may be operated in order that all of the workers in the industries may be fully employed and capable of the fullest possible consumption of all agricultural products. In the same way it is imperative for the welfare of our workers in the industries that our farmers be made prosperous in order that they may freely buy the manufactured articles produced by the workers in our factories. As never before the farmers and the laborers in the factories are coming to realize that their interests are one and inseparable. Indeed, the one great lesson of the war is that no class can be permanently prosperous at the expense of the other classes and that no nation can be really prosperous unless the sun of prosperity is shining upon all. The Republican Party stands pledged to measures not for the benefit of one class, but for the advancement of all. It has already gone on record as being in favor of cooperation among our farmers, believing that cooperative selling and marketing and an extension of banking facilities will prove helpful not only to the farmers, but to the whole country as tending to increase the production of our agricultural wealth and thus the wealth of all the people.

GOOD ROADS AND THEIR EFFECT ON THE FARMS, MARKET CONDITIONS, AND RURAL LIFE.

The Republican Party, in addition to enacting a reasonable tariff protection on farm products, has urged, among other most helpful measures, the building of Federal trunk-line roads with State collateral roads as local feeders, so that the means may be provided to the farmer for direct, economical shipment of his goods from the country to the city markets. A most interesting experiment has been carried on with the assistance of the Federal Government in this direction. From a community center in Pennsylvania to which these were brought by the farmers, farm products were shipped by parcel-post motor trucks to the city of Washington, where they were sold in a cooperative market, an improved highway between the two points facilitating the shipment.

LOW TRANSPORTATION RATES FOR AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS.

It is most important to secure a reduction in the rates for transportation on the railroads for the products of the farm and for the materials which the farmer uses in the production of his crops. The employees of our great railroads, as well as the officers, have become deeply interested in this problem. The farmers of America are unalterably opposed to State socialism. They are opposed to the Government ownership of railroads, because they hold, as does the Republican Party, that Government ownership must lead to that oppressive bureaucracy which inevitably becomes autocratic and must ultimately deprive the people of their liberty. However, the railroad problem presents an opportunity for such cooperation under private ownership between the management of the roads and their employees as would result in more efficient service, a better return on the capital invested, and lower rates without a reduction in the real wages received by the employees. I feel confident that under practical plans already proposed the problem of how to secure lower transportation rates can be solved by the application of the principle of cooperation with injury to none and with untold benefits to all.

I have endeavored to show, by the statistics which I have presented for the benefit of the Senate of the farmers of my own State of Maryland and of other parts of the country, that a protective tariff on farm products is now necessary for the protection of the great fundamental industry of agriculture within the borders of the United States. I have also called attention to some of the other measures proposed by the Republican Party for the promotion of the welfare of the farmers of America and of all of the people of the United States. I consider that the statistics which I have presented are most valuable, and I shall be pleased to send them, so far as I may be able, to those who may desire to use them. These and some additional statistics, which constitute an appendix, I ask to have incorporated as part of my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-four Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The Secretary will state the pending amendment.

The READING CLERK. On page 2, lines 18 and 19, it is proposed to strike out the words "or decoctions."

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask to have the amendment stated again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be restated.

The READING CLERK. On page 2, lines 18 and 19, where it reads "and extracts or decoctions of nutgalls," it is proposed to strike out the words "or decoctions."

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no objection to a vote upon that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The READING CLERK. On page 2, line 21, it is proposed to strike out "less than 80 per cent" and insert "not medicinal," so as to read:

Tannic acid, tannin, and extracts of nutgalls, containing by weight of tannic acid less than 50 per cent, 4 cents per pound; 50 per cent or more and not medicinal, 10 cents per pound.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not desire to detain the Senate very long in the consideration of the pending amendment, for I am certain, from what has already happened to other amendments, that the same thing will happen to this amendment. Notwithstanding the fact that it increases the rate of the present law about four times, I assume that the amendment will be adopted. There are some things about the amendment, however, and there are some things about the information which the committee has furnished the Senate for its guidance in the matter of levying these duties, to which I wish to call special attention.

The Payne-Aldrich law imposed a duty of 35 cents a pound upon tannic acid. It is claimed that under the operation of that high duty there were practically no imports into the United States, and that is true. In 1908 the duty was 50 cents a pound, and there were practically no imports. In 1909 the Payne-Aldrich law reduced the rate to 35 cents, and still there were practically no imports.

In 1913 the rate was reduced to 5 cents a pound, and during the only normal pre-war year there were imported, under the rate of the present law, only 12,634 pounds of this article. In that year the domestic production was 853,830 pounds. So it appears that in the only normal pre-war year after the present law went into effect the imports were only about 2 per cent of the domestic production.

During the war this industry, like many other industries, was greatly stimulated. The domestic production was greatly increased, and there was an increase in importations, but even during the war, Mr. President, the greatest amount of imports being in 1919, and that was only 68,000 pounds.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator desires to have the exact figures as to the imports appear in his speech, he must also take nutgalls and add to the figures he has already given.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator had waited until I got through his interruption would have been unnecessary.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not want to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not object.

Mr. SMOOT. In the Underwood law both those articles were treated together, but the importations were kept separate. Under the provisions of this bill the figures as to importations could not be compared, because of the fact that they are not treated together.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator overlooks the fact that I am talking about the importations of tannic acid. I am not talking about the importations of nutgalls, the thing out of which tannic acid is made.

Mr. SMOOT. The extract of nutgalls is exactly the same as the product the Senator is talking about.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator said nutgalls, not the extract of nutgalls.

Mr. SMOOT. I had in mind the extract of nutgalls.

Mr. SIMMONS. Nutgalls we get from Asia and India. The article to which the Senator from Utah calls attention is the article out of which tannic acid is made. Tannic acid is made from nutgalls, and nutgalls are not produced in this country. They are imported from China, Japan, and Asia Minor. They are just as cheap in Germany as in the United States. I was talking about the production and the importation of tannic acid.

I had stated, when I was interrupted, that under the lower duty of the present law, 5 cents a pound in 1914, the only pre-war year in which that low rate of duty was in operation, the domestic production of tannic acid in this country was 853,800 pounds. The importations in that year were 12,000 pounds, or about 2 per cent of the domestic production.

In 1920, when things were coming to normal again, when the domestic production of this article had greatly increased, the importations amounted to only 28,000 pounds. I have not been able to ascertain the increase in the domestic production in that year, but I should say it was at least twice as much; anyhow, it had enormously increased. So the domestic production had been doubled under the stimulus of war, and the importations of 1920 were no greater, compared with the domestic production, than they were in 1914. During nine months of 1921 these importations amounted to only 45,000 pounds.

I do not know what was the domestic production at that time, but if the domestic production had not increased since 1914, if it was still about 850,000 pounds, the importations during that nine months were not more than 6 per cent of the domestic production, even assuming that it was no greater in 1921 than it was in 1914. Of course, if it has doubled since then—and I think it has—it would be only about 3 per cent.

If a duty upon this product, which is exclusively a foreign product, has reduced the importations of the foreign product to 3 per cent, or even 6 per cent, of the domestic production, upon what principle can we justify ourselves in increasing those rates to 4, 10, and 20 cents a pound, according to the purity of the article? Yet that is what is proposed here.

Mr. President, it is not my purpose to enter into detailed discussions of these schedules, and this one in particular, but I do want to call attention to the fact that in the case of this acid, as in the case of the amendment we have just voted upon, lactic acid, as is the case with all of these acids—gallic, formic, and oxalic—the rates have been fixed upon the same principle on which rates have been fixed throughout this bill. They have been fixed upon the theory that they should be sufficiently high to bring about equality between the export selling price of foreign merchandise and the selling price of American merchandise in the American market. That is the principle. That was acknowledged by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] yesterday with reference to lactic acid. There can be no question about that being the principle upon which this bill was written and upon which these rates were laid.

That being the principle and the basis of these rates, it becomes of the very first importance that the Senate shall be in possession of the facts with reference to the export selling price of the foreign article, and also with reference to the wholesale selling price of the domestic article, and unless the Senate knows those two elements in the problem it is utterly impossible for us to determine whether the rate is sufficient or more than is necessary to accomplish the purpose you have in this bill, which is to establish a protective tariff upon the basis of competition in prices.

When I seek to find out these two essential factors in imposing these rates I find myself groping in the dark. I was present when the open hearings on this bill were had. There was no direct effort there to ascertain the selling price of the foreign article as compared with the selling price of the domestic article. I do not know what happened in the secret sessions in which these amendments were agreed to. I can not speak about that. I do not know what information the majority of the committee had there. I know that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] tried in the open hearings to get some information about selling prices and profits in this country, and he failed.

All I know about that is the fact that the Finance Committee have furnished the Senate with the book which I have in my hand. It is entitled, "Summary of Tariff Information, 1921, Relative to the Bill H. R. 7456." That book purports, after giving these several paragraphs in the House bill in juxtaposition with similar paragraphs in the act of 1919 and the act of 1913, to give certain essential information to enable the Senate to test these rates. The information given consists of certain summaries of tariff reports upon the particular items of the bill. The summaries generally occupy from one-half a page to a page and a half. They give some information with reference to domestic production, with reference to imports, with reference to exports, and with reference sometimes to consumption, but when it comes to the essential elements which would enable us to test these rates it is singularly silent with respect to the American prices.

At the bottom of each of the summaries are given the quantity, the imports, the value of imports, the duty, and the equivalent ad valorem for 1918, 1919, 1920, and sometimes for nine months of 1921, so from that data we can get the invoice price of the foreign product; but that is only the starting point. With reference to the other price that is necessary in order to enable us to apply the tests to these rates, namely, the American selling price, I read last night the summaries of eight or nine respecting these acids, and there is not a word or a syllable that relates to the American selling price.

The committee could not have conscientiously fixed these rates without some American selling price. Where did they get that price? Did they get it from the gentlemen who appeared before them when they were making the bill, or with whom they consulted when they were making the bill, gentlemen who were here asking that these taxes be imposed upon the people in their private interest? Did they get the American wholesale selling price from them? If not, where, then, did they get it? I say when an element of that sort is so absolutely essential in order to reach an understanding as to the rates, we are entitled not to go to the dealers, not to go to the men who are asking the taxes in the interest of their business, but we ought to have an additional finding with reference to the cost, the American wholesale selling price, up to which the foreign price under the principle of this bill is to be raised.

If the committee wanted to be fair with the people, if they wanted to give the people the facts which would enable them to determine whether or not these rates were too high or too low, or if they wanted to be fair to the Congress and give Members the facts that were necessary to determine whether the rates were too high or too low, why did they not appeal to the Tariff Commission? When the Tariff Commission was making up these summaries—which are misleading and, as I shall show before the debate is over, have been manipulated—why did they not go to the Tariff Commission and say, "Investigate this and officially advise us what are the American selling prices? We are writing a bill now that will impose duties to raise the foreign selling price to the level of the American selling price in order that there may be equal opportunities in competition and trade."

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STERLING in the chair). Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. Did the report which was made by the Senator from North Carolina on the 1913 tariff act explain to the people the reason why he adopted 5 per cent or explain the difference between the American selling price and the foreign price? Did either his report or his bill go into that subject at all?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I am not now discussing that act; but as the Senator brings it up, I will say to him that it was not made upon the protective principle at all. It was not based upon the theory enunciated by the Republican platform in 1912, namely, that tariff duties should be measured by the difference between the cost of production in this country and abroad. It was not made upon the principle laid down in the pending bill, which is a repudiation even of the Republican platform measurement of 1912, and bases the rates upon the difference between the selling price here and abroad. It was not written upon any of those principles. It was written upon the principle of raising sufficient revenue to run the Government.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator asks why we did not appeal to the Tariff Commission for the information.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; and have them write that information in their report.

Mr. SMOOT. The truth of the matter is that the Tariff Commission made the report. The Tariff Commission is the author of the book to which the Senator has referred, and all the information that is furnished here was furnished by the Tariff Commission.

Then the Senator asks why we went to the manufacturer to ascertain the selling price of articles. The committee did nothing of the kind. There is not an item in this whole schedule which we do not find in the Oil, Paint, and Drug Reporter showing exactly what the prices are at which the various articles are sold in the United States.

Mr. SIMMONS. With all the profits?

Mr. SMOOT. It is issued every day. The Senator can know what those prices are just the same as all the other people of the United States can if they are interested in the matter. I say to the Senator from North Carolina that he is mistaken when he says the bill is based upon the difference between the selling price in this country and the selling price abroad.

Mr. SIMMONS. I said the export selling price of merchandise.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the selling price, of course, to the country, but I will say the export price. The bill is not made upon that basis, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then the Senator ought to eliminate section 315 (a).

Mr. SMOOT. Not at all. Section 315 (a) is quite a different proposition. Section 315 (a) does not apply——

Mr. SIMMONS. Upon what theory is it based, then? Is it the difference in the cost of production here and abroad? Will the Senator, if it is based upon the difference in the cost of production here and abroad, tell me where I can go to find the figures upon which he lays these rates?

Mr. SMOOT. I have said once or twice that the bill is made upon numerous reasons and bases. The Senator knows that the exchange of money is entirely different in one country than it is in another. Conditions of labor are quite different in one country than in another. Those matters have to be taken into consideration, and in taking them into consideration we have to know where the goods are coming from into this country. There is no one basis that could be adopted to make the bill, and there was no one basis used.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, when the committee proposed to confer upon the President of the United States the power to increase these rates within the limit of 50 per cent, they declared that he should make those increases according to the intent of the bill, and then——

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not object to the Senator interrupting me, but I hope he will not interrupt me right in the beginning of the first sentence when I am laying down a proposition; that is all.

Mr. SMOOT. But the very first sentence the Senator uttered was wrong. Section 315 (a) will tell the Senator just what the basis is upon which the President is to act.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am going to read it.

Mr. SMOOT. Very well, if the Senator wants to take the time to read it he may do so.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; I shall do so.

Mr. SMOOT. Read it all, and not merely the first paragraph.

Mr. SIMMONS. I shall read section 315 (a), and I will let the Senate see whether my statement was correct or not.

Mr. SMOOT. I am glad to have the Senator do that.

Mr. SIMMONS. This is the section conferring powers upon the President, and it says:

That in order to regulate the foreign commerce of the United States and to put into force and effect the policy of the Congress by this act intended—

That is what I said, "the policy of the Congress by this act intended." Now, the committee then proceeds to set out what that policy is and directs the President to pursue that policy, as follows:

Whenever the President, upon investigation of the differences in conditions of competition in trade—

That is, in barter and sale—

upon investigation of the differences in conditions of competition in trade in the markets of the United States of articles wholly or in part the growth or product of the United States and of like or similar articles wholly or in part the growth or product of competing foreign countries, shall find it thereby shown that the duties fixed in this act do not equalize the said differences in conditions of competition in trade he shall, by such investigation, ascertain said differences and determine and proclaim the changes in classifications or forms of duty or increases or decreases in any rate of duty provided in this act shown by said ascertained differences in conditions of competition in trade necessary to equalize the same in the markets of the United States.

Now, Mr. President, if that does not lay down the rule to govern the President, and if that does not declare the policy by this bill intended, I do not understand the English language.

The Senator from Utah says that other things are taken into consideration, such as the depreciation in currency and the difference in cost of production. The President is not authorized to take any of those things into consideration. The President is authorized to bring about a condition by the increase of these duties that will equalize the conditions of competition in trade between this country and other countries. That means the difference in the selling price in the American markets of the foreign product and the domestic product. It can not mean anything else.

Mr. SMOOT. But the Senator has not read it all. The Senator has read only the first part of it. Why does not the Senator read paragraph (c), for instance, on page 274?

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask the Senator why he did not strike out section 315 (a)?

Mr. SMOOT. That is a part of section 315.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will read all of it if the Senator desires. There is nothing in the balance of it that changes the portion which I have read.

Mr. SMOOT. Let me read paragraph (c) for the Senator and see if it is not different.

Mr. SIMMONS. But paragraph (c) is dealing with a different proposition altogether.

Mr. SMOOT. Not at all; it is a part of section 315.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will read it:

(c) That in any investigation provided for in this section account may be taken of the price at which like or similar merchandise is sold in the United States and competing foreign countries, wages, prices of materials, and all other items in costs of production of such similar merchandise in the United States and competing foreign countries and any advantages of domestic and foreign producers in competitive trade, including laws and regulations affecting the same; that no proclamation shall issue under this section unless reasonable opportunity shall be afforded to all persons directly interested in the production and distribution of such merchandise affected by such proclamation.

I suppose it is unnecessary to read the remainder of it.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the rule laid down.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the President may consider those things, but after considering those things he is to fix the rate so as to bring about equality in competition in trade.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. So that it can not mean anything else than that duties are to be imposed so as to raise the price of the foreign article to the price of the domestic article; and I say that it is necessary that Senators on the other side of the Chamber should tell us what is the wholesale selling price of the domestic article. The Senator from Utah has stated the Summary of Tariff Information was prepared by the Tariff Commission. Yes, it was prepared by the Tariff Commission, but the summary prepared by the Tariff Commission does not at all relate to the wholesale selling prices of the domestic products; it fails to mention them; and when they became such an important factor in determining the question of rates, I say it was the duty of the Finance Committee to have said to the Tariff Commission, "Make an additional investigation in order that we may have an official finding as to the American wholesale selling prices," and not have to rely upon the statements of interested parties or have to rely upon certain market reports.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the rates which are provided for in the pending bill are not to be applied on the basis which the Senator from North Carolina states. If after an investigation there are rates in the bill which the President finds, under the rule laid down in section 315 (a), are not proper, then the President has the power to transfer those rates from the basis of foreign valuation to the basis of American valuation. Then he will have to ascertain the wholesale selling price of the article in the United States; but the President will not have to do that as to one article in one thousand.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am not talking about the section which authorizes the President to substitute the American for the foreign valuation; I am talking about the section which allows the President to increase the rates.

Mr. SMOOT. I am talking about section 315 (a), and that is the section about which the Senator is talking.

Mr. SIMMONS. Oh, certainly, that is the one about which I am talking.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to say that the Finance Committee can not blow hot and cold about this matter; they can not come in here and say, "We give the President authority to raise the rates upon one principle, but we levy the rates upon another principle." Necessarily when they gave the President the authority to raise the rates we must assume that they laid down directions as to how the rates should be raised, and fixed the principle upon which they should be raised. We must also necessarily assume that the raises were to be made upon the same principle as the one upon which the duties were originally prescribed. Any other argument would be absurd.

Therefore, I say that taking section 315 (a) we have a key to the situation, and we have an interpretation of the rule that is applied by the committee; but we have no information about the essential facts with reference to the American selling price.

More than that, the foreign selling prices which we have here stated and upon which the rates are based were the foreign selling prices of August, 1921, as found in the Reynolds report, which based its prices upon the prices of August, 1921. I say that since that time the foreign export prices have enormously increased. In the case of Germany they have increased over 50 per cent.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I call the attention of the Senator from North Carolina to the fact that when the President under the powers granted him by section 315 undertakes to ascertain what these differences are, the first thing that he is required by subdivision (c) to consider is the price at which like or similar merchandise is sold in the United States.

Mr. SMOOT. That is just what I said.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The President, therefore, must, of course, have some information on that subject, and, as pointed out by the Senator from North Carolina, inasmuch as the bill recites that the rates provided in the bill were fixed upon the principle which is laid down as a guide for the President, the committee in fixing the rates must in like manner have had information concerning the prices at which these commodities were sold in the United States. I understand the contention of the Senator from North Carolina to be that the most reliable information concerning what the price is at which like or similar articles are sold in the United States would properly come from the Tariff Commission, which was created for the purpose of providing Congress with the appropriate information when Congress should be called upon to frame tariff laws. That is the contention, as I understand, which has been made by the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. Exactly.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator from North Carolina had said that the House bill was based upon the wholesale selling prices of comparable articles in the United States he would have been right, but the Senate committee has entirely abandoned that principle and has based the rate of duty upon the wholesale importation price of those articles on the day of their landing.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If the Senator will pardon me, he has not apparently appreciated the point I am making. The Senate committee—not the House—has laid down a rule for the guidance of the President. It has directed what elements the President shall take into consideration in the application of the rule; and the first element he is called upon to consider is the price of the article in the United States. The Senate committee—not the House, but the Senate committee—has declared that that is the principle upon which this bill, speaking for themselves, of course, is framed; that is to say, the differences are to be determined by considering the selling price in the United States and the other circumstances adverted to in subdivision (c). Accordingly the Senate committee has declared to the Senate that it was guided in the work which it did by the desire to equalize the differences in the conditions of trade, and they have laid down a rule to guide the President; they have prescribed the elements which he shall take into consideration, the first of them being the price of the commodity in the American market. The contention of the Senator from North Carolina, as I understand, is that, while the committee have told the Senate that that is the principle upon which they have framed the proposed statute and fixed the rates, they have provided the Senate with no information at all concerning the very first element to be considered, namely, prices in the domestic market.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Montana is entirely wrong. Wherever the President shall exercise the authority given him in paragraph 315 (a), then he must of necessity find out what the wholesale price is, because of the fact that the basis of the duty is transferred from the foreign valuation to the American valuation.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Oh, no.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the fact.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator must not become confused about that. There is a provision of subdivision (b) which authorizes the President to transfer the dutiable basis from foreign valuation to domestic valuation, but that is not provided for in subdivision (a) at all. Under subdivison (a) he may leave the form of valuation exactly as it is.

Mr. SMOOT. Absolutely.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The foreign valuation is provided for generally, and he may leave that exactly as it is, only he is permitted to raise or to lower the rates.

Mr. SMOOT. I said whenever the President exercises his power under section 315 (a)—and it will not be exercised in many cases; there is not any doubt of that—then he would have to follow the direction or the rule, may I say, found in subdivision (c) of that section.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no doubt about it. That is the only time when the question of the wholesale selling price will be taken into consideration.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Montana will pardon me for a moment, subdivision (a) has nothing to do with subdivision (c). The President may do certain things under subdivision (a); he may do an entirely independent thing under subdivision (c).

Mr. SMOOT. All of the provisions respecting this subject are under section 315 and subdivision (c) embodies the rule laid down for the President. Unless there were a rule laid down it would be unconstitutional for the President to act.

Mr. SIMMONS. Subdivision (c), Mr. President, does nothing except to authorize the President to take into consideration a number of conditions, and, having taken those conditions into consideration, then he fixes the rate; but when he fixes the rate he fixes it so as to equalize the differences in conditions of competition in trade in this country. That means the difference between the price at which the foreign article would be sold and the price at which the American article would be sold.

So far as the question of the President desiring to change the basis of valuation from the foreign to the American basis is concerned, that is another part of the section; that is another subject. Under that authority the President is invested with entirely different and independent powers from those vested in him in subdivision (a) and subdivision (c). That is to say, under that section the President's power is directed to the question whether he will change the valuation basis of the bill. That is all that section relates to.

Mr. President, I do not wish to prolong this argument. There can be no question about the soundness of the position which I have taken with reference to the powers sought to be conferred upon the President; there can be no doubt that this section in giving those powers to the President declares by implication, which can not be resisted, which is absolutely conclusive and precludes all controversy, that in raising the rates the President is directed to follow the principle upon which the rates in this bill have been based.

Mr. President, I make the point of no quorum, and then I will be glad to have a vote upon this question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Borah	Hale	McKinley	Smoot
Brandegee	Harris	McNary	Spencer
Broussard	Harrison	Moses	Sterling
Bursum	Heflin	Nelson	Sutherland
Calder	Johnson	Newberry	Swanson
Capper	Jones, N. Mex.	Oddie	Townsend
Cummins	Jones, Wash.	Overman	Trammell
Curtis	Kellogg	Phipps	Walsh, Mont.
Dial	Kendrick	Pittman	Warren
Dillingham	La Follette	Poindexter	Watson, Ga.
Fletcher	Lenroot	Robinson	Watson, Ind.
France	Lodge	Sheppard	Willis
Gerry	McCumber	Shortridge
Gooding	McKellar	Simmons

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-four Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The question is on the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. McCUMBER. I suppose the Senator from North Carolina has no objection to these amendments that change the classification?

Mr. SIMMONS. Upon this amendment I shall not ask for a yea-and-nay vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 2, line 21, it is proposed to strike out "less than 80 per cent" and insert "not medicinal," so as to read:

Tannic acid, tannin, and extracts of nutgalls, containing by weight of tannic acid less than 50 per cent, 4 cents per pound; 50 per cent or more and not medicinal, 10 cents per pound.

The amendment was agreed to.

The READING CLERK. On page 2, line 22, the committee report to strike out "and 80" and insert "50," and in the same line, after the word "more," to insert "and medicinal," so as to read:

50 per cent or more and medicinal, 20 cents per pound.

The amendment was agreed to.

The READING CLERK. On page 2, line 24, after the word "acid," the committee report to insert "3 cents per pound," so as to read:

Arsenic acid, 3 cents per pound.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, with reference to this item I want to say to the Senate that I happen to know that the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], who has been specially looking after this schedule, has prepared himself to discuss this particular item, and he desires to be present when it is considered. He also has prepared himself to discuss several items that follow this one; and in view of the fact that the Senator from Utah is very ill this afternoon, suffering very much, and had to go home, I am going to ask the Senator in charge of the bill if he will not now be willing to adjourn or take a recess at this time?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I understand from the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] that he has an appropriation bill for hospitalization here that he would like to put through at this time; and if there is no objection on the part of other Senators I will make none on my part, that the Senate may now proceed to the consideration of that bill, and that this bill may be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the bill is temporarily laid aside.

ADDITIONAL HOSPITAL FACILITIES FOR PATIENTS OF VETERANS' BUREAU.

Mr. WARREN. From the Committee on Appropriations I report back favorably without amendment House bill 11547, making an appropriation for additional hospital facilities for patients of the United States Veterans' Bureau, and I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wyoming asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill just reported by him. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That for carrying out the provisions of the act entitled "An act to authorize an appropriation to enable the Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau to provide for the construction of additional hospital facilities and to provide medical, surgical, and hospital services and supplies for persons who served in the World War, the Spanish-American War, the Philippine insurrection, and the Boxer rebellion, and are patients of the United States Veterans' Bureau," approved April 20, 1922, there is appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $12,000,000, and in addition to this amount the Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau, subject to the approval of the President, may incur obligations for the purposes herein set forth not to exceed in the aggregate $5,000,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment. If there be no amendment to be proposed, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I did not quite understand the language of the bill as it was read. Is $5,000,000 to be authorized in addition to the appropriation of $12,000,000?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, this bill is to carry out exactly the provisions of a bill which has already been passed authorizing the appropriation of $17,000,000. The bill appropriates directly $12,000,000, and permits the incurring of obligations to the extent of another $5,000,000 for our appropriation hereafter.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I quite understand that that is the purpose of the bill, but I just wondered if the language used would carry it out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will reread the part of the bill to which the Senator refers.

The reading clerk read as follows:

There is appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated the sum of $12,000,000, and in addition to this amount the Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau, subject to the approval of the President, may incur obligations for the purposes herein set forth not to exceed in the aggregate $5,000,000.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. That is quite sufficient. I am satisfied. I overlooked some of the words.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. PHIPPS. From the Committee on Appropriations I report back favorably amendment No. 1 to the District of Columbia appropriation bill, H. R. 10101, and move that the Senate concur in the amendment with an amendment, that amendment being a slight change in the language so as simply to avoid a possibility of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia at any time raising the rate of taxation on intangible property above the rate provided for real estate.

Mr. POINDEXTER and Mr. HARRISON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I assume that the Senator making the report will not ask for its immediate consideration. I ask that it may go over under the rule and be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that upon objection the report of the committee must lie over under the rule.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I desire to state the language suggested to be added in the form of an amendment to House amendment numbered 1. It is as follows:

On page 3 of said amendment, in lines 6 and 7, after the word "discretion" and within the parentheses, insert the following:

to any rate not in excess of the rate imposed upon real estate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the entire report lies over for a day, under the objection of the Senator from Washington.

ORDER FOR RECESS.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate closes its business for this calendar day it recess until 11 o'clock on Monday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

DYER ANTILYNCHING BILL.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I ask leave, out of order, to present a petition in favor of what is known as the Dyer bill. I ask that the text of the petition may be printed in the RECORD. It is only two or three paragraphs. I should like very much if I could print the list of names, which is a very unusual one; but I ask that a condensed list of a number of names which I have prepared may be printed with the petition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The petition.

To the Senate of the United States:

The killing and burning alive of human beings by mobs in the United States is a reproach upon our country throughout the civilized world and threatens organized government in the Nation.

Since 1889 there have been 3,443 known mob murders, 64 of the victims being women. In only a few instances has prosecution of the lynchers been even attempted. American mobs murdered 64 persons in 1921, of whom 4 were publicly burned at the stake.

The House of Representatives on January 26, 1922, in response to insistent country-wide demand, passed the Dyer antilynching bill, which invokes the power of the Federal Government to end the infamy of American mob murder.

This bill is now in the hands of the United States Senate. The undersigned United States citizens earnestly urge its prompt enactment.

The petitioners: Twenty-four State governors; 38 mayors of principal cities, including mayors of Charleston, S. C., San Antonio, Tex., and Louisville, Ky.; 3 archbishops; 85 bishops and churchmen, all denominations; 47 jurists and lawyers, including 2 former Attorneys General of the United States—Palmer and Wickersham; and 19 judges and justices of the highest courts in various States.

Twenty-nine college presidents, including Charles W. Eliot (emeritus), Harvard University; L. B. R. Briggs, Ratcliffe College; U. L. Burton, University of Michigan; John Grier Hibben, Princeton University; David Starr Jordan (emeritus), Stanford University; Charles F. Thwing, Western Reserve University; Benj. Ide Wheeler (emeritus), University of California.

Editors of great newspapers, including Charles H. Dennis and Victor F. Lawson, Chicago Daily News; William Allen White, Emporia Gazette; Edwin F. Gay, New York Evening Post; Louis Wiley, New York Times; Hamilton Holt, New York Independent; Glenn Frank, Century Magazine.

Eminent citizens: Bishop William Lawrence, of Massachusetts; Edward W. Bok; Henry Van Dyke; Hugh M. Dorsey, former Governor of Georgia; John G. Milburn; Moorfield Storey, former president American Bar Association; Jane Addams; Corinne Roosevelt Robinson; Mrs. Alice Ames Winter, president general Federation Women's Clubs; Rev. W. S. Abernethy, D. D., Washington, D. C.; Theodore D. Gratton, Episcopal bishop of Mississippi; Alfred Harding, Episcopal bishop of Washington, D. C.; Cameron Mann, Episcopal bishop of southern Florida; D. J. O'Connell, Catholic bishop of Richmond, Va.; William T. Russell, Catholic bishop of Charleston, S. C.; Charles E. Woodcock, Episcopal bishop of Kentucky; James R. Winchester, Episcopal bishop of Arkansas.

SPECIAL CANCELING STAMPS.

Mr. WARREN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House bill 10941, authorizing the Postmaster General to grant permission to use special canceling stamps or postmarking dies. It is a very short bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads with an amendment, in section 2, page 2, line 10, to strike out the word "revoked" and insert in lieu thereof the word "revocable," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, to grant permission for the use in first and second class post offices of special canceling stamps or postmarking dies for advertising purposes in the following cases only: First, where the event to be advertised is for some national purpose for which Congress has made an appropriation; second, where the event to be advertised is of general public interest and importance and is to endure for a definite period of time and is not to be conducted for private gain or profit: Provided, That such permit shall not be for a longer period than six months and the duration of the event to be advertised: Provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to authorize the expenditure of any postal funds or appropriation, either for the purchase of special canceling stamps or postmarking dies or for adapting canceling machines for the use of such stamps or dies or for installing the same, but all expense shall be prepaid by the permittee.

SEC. 2. That any permission granted under this act is hereby revocable in the event the Government shall find it expedient or necessary to use special canceling stamps or postmarking dies for its own purposes.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, the bill which is now before the Senate grants general authority to the Postmaster General and will thus avoid the constant introduction and passage of bills granting this privilege to particular cities. That point was raised by several Senators the other day, so we reported this bill, granting general authority, instead of having Senators bring in special bills.

Mr. ROBINSON. What is the authority granted to the Postmaster General?

Mr. TOWNSEND. To permit the use of special cancellation stamps, without any expense to the Government, by those cities which are authorized by the Postmaster General, on some special occasion, in connection with some celebration in a city. We have been doing it for years through special acts. We now by this bill grant general authority, instead of having a special bill introduced for each particular case. The bill has passed the House, and we have made one little amendment in order to carry out the clear intent of the House. It is just a change of one word.

Mr. HARRISON. If this is a general rule to be followed, I take it that the community applying for a special stamp will pay the expense of having it prepared?

Mr. TOWNSEND. It is provided in the bill that that shall be done without any expense to the Federal Government. There is no expense to the Government incurred in any of these cases.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time; the bill was read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a resolution of the Washington (D. C.) Board of Trade, protesting against the enactment of legislation increasing the standard of assessment on real estate in the District of Columbia from two-thirds to full valuation, increasing the tax rate on intangibles by 66⅔ per cent, creating a surplus fund of District moneys to lie unused in the Federal Treasury for the purpose of protecting the National Government, which it alleges needs no such protection, as it controls the fiscal relations of the District with the United States, and also protesting against the method of consideration of the proposed legislation without hearing or opportunity for consultation on the part of the taxpayers, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SPENCER presented resolutions adopted by the Salt River Presbytery, at Farber, and the St. Louis Presbytery, at St. Louis, both in the State of Missouri, favoring the enactment of legislation providing for compulsory Sunday observance in the District of Columbia, which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. PHIPPS:

A bill (S. 3568) to continue the land office at Durango, in the State of Colorado, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

By Mr. SMOOT:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 195) providing for the disposal of articles produced by patients in the United States Veterans' Bureau; to the Committee on Finance.

ENFORCEMENT OF ANTITRUST ACTS.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to submit a resolution, which I ask may be read and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The resolution (S. Res. 285) was read and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as follows:

Resolved, That the Attorney General be directed to transmit to the Senate a statement of moneys in unexpended balances available at the time of his assumption of office and of moneys which are now available and authorized by appropriations of Congress for the enforcement of the Sherman Antitrust Act and the Clayton Act, together with a statement of what moneys have been expended during his tenure of office for said purposes; the number of attorneys and agents who are presently employed for said purposes, and the names of special attorneys who are employed for said purposes, and the amount of money paid and being currently paid to each; the number of trials, both civil and criminal, involving violations of said act which have been conducted, and the result of such trials; the number and titles of civil actions which are pending charging violations of said acts; the number and titles of indictments which have been found during his incumbency of office for the violation of said acts, and whether such indictments are being prosecuted, and if not, why not; what steps are being taken to procure indictments for the enforcement of said acts; why further prosecutions have not been instituted; why the prosecution of a certain indictment recently found in New York for the violation of the antitrust act has been stayed; and whether the district attorneys of the United States are required to obtain the consent of the Attorney General before bringing suits and instituting proceedings for the violation of said acts.

MERGER OF STEEL COMPANIES.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I submit the resolution which I send to the desk and ask that it lie on the table subject to my call.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 286), as follows:

Whereas definite reports in the daily press and in financial journals state that there is about to be consummated a merger of seven of the largest iron and steel corporations, namely, Midvale Steel & Ordnance Co., Republic Iron & Steel Co., Lackawanna Steel Co., Inland Steel Co., Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co., Steel & Tube Co. of America, and Brier Hill Steel Co., having a total annual capacity of more than 10,000,000 tons of steel; and

Whereas it is also reported that the Bethlehem Steel Corporation, while not a part of the present merger, will join the combination when it has been successfully accomplished; and

Whereas the complete consummation of this plan will result in the creation of a billion dollar corporation, controlling substantially all of the steel-producing capacity of the country which is not now controlled by the United States Steel Corporation; and

Whereas this will create a complete monopoly of the steel industry in the hands of two gigantic corporations, resulting inevitably in the suppression of such competition as now exists in the manufacture and sale of this essential product and in the restraint of trade and commerce among the several States and the District of Columbia and with foreign nations; and

Whereas experience has shown the impossibility of dealing effectively with such combinations and mergers after they have been consummated, regardless of the damage which they may inflict upon competitors and of the injury to the public welfare; and

Whereas section 4 of the Sherman antitrust law (act of July 2, 1890) specifically provides:

"The several circuit courts of the United States are hereby invested with jurisdiction to prevent and restrain violations of this act; and it shall be the duty of the several district attorneys of the United States, in their respective districts, under the direction of the Attorney General, to institute proceedings in equity to prevent and restrain such violations:"

Resolved, That the Attorney General of the United States and the Federal Trade Commission be requested to inform the Senate as soon as possible what steps they have taken or propose to take to ascertain the purposes and probable effects of the proposed merger; what have been the results of any investigations which they may have conducted; and what actions they have instituted to protect the public interest;

Resolved, That the Attorney General be further requested to inform the Senate whether or not it is advisable, in his opinion, to proceed under the appropriate provisions of the Sherman law and the Clayton law to prevent and restrain this impending combination.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie on the table subject to the call of the Senator from Wisconsin.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, announced that May 6, 1922, the President approved and signed S. 667, an act for the relief of John B. H. Waring.

NOMINATION OF NAT GOLDSTEIN.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, on Friday last the President of the United States, at a conference with the newspaper representatives, in answer to a question touching his appointments, or some of his nominations, more particularly that of Nat "Gold-stained," said he neither apologized for nor boasted of his nominations.

The St. Louis Globe-Democrat is one of the great Republican papers of the Middle West.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. In a moment I will yield. The St. Louis Globe-Democrat has a very large circulation, and has for a long time enunciated Republican doctrines. In its issue——

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. In a moment I will yield.

On Friday of last week there appeared an editorial in the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, this influential Republican paper, styled "The Reward of Goldstein."

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I desire to have this editorial read in my time.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRISON. I will yield after the editorial is read.

Mr. SPENCER. I merely want to ask the Senator——

Mr. HARRISON. I refuse to yield at present. Wait until the editorial is read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Mississippi has the floor. The Secretary will read the editorial as requested.

The editorial was read, as follows:

[From the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, Friday, May 5, 1922.]

THE REWARD OF GOLDSTEIN.

The nomination by the President of Nat Goldstein for the office of internal-revenue collector at St. Louis is a recognition by the administration of the political service of the courthouse ring, and is in effect an indorsement of its pernicious activities. More than that, it is, in effect if not in fact, an approval of the acts of Goldstein and others in connection with the Lowden campaign fund of 1920 and a reward for those acts. It is a public expression of approbation for political immorality, in the face of a struggle in St. Louis and Missouri for the establishment of political morality.

What other construction can be placed upon this nomination? Nat Goldstein has been for some years the most active figure in that combination of professional politicians which constitutes the Republican machine in St. Louis, and is the head of that part of the machine known as the courthouse ring. This machine dominates elections and government in St. Louis and makes of democracy a farce. It is a self-perpetuating oligarchy existing solely for the benefit of its members and its forces, and concerned in public welfare only so far as its own interests may be promoted. It is not a government by or for the people, but a government by and for the party bosses, and Nat Goldstein is a ringleader among these. But for the political power which this gives him his appointment would not have been thought of. It is a recognition of party service, past and prospective, and an implied approval of the character of that service.

This, however, is a local matter. Goldstein in 1920 became unfavorably known to the State and to the Nation through his connection with the Lowden campaign-fund scandal. Governor Lowden's manager gave $38,000 to J. L. Babler and Liv Morse to secure a delegation from Missouri to the Republican National Convention at Chicago "friendly to Lowden." Babler gave $2,500 of this money to Goldstein, who at first denied that he had received a cent, but admitted that this denial was an untruth when the evidence before the investigating committee at Washington compelled confession. The Missouri delegation was "friendly to Lowden," and Goldstein was one of these delegates. There is a widespread belief that the disclosure of this deal prevented the nomination of Lowden. But, however that may be, it created a sensation throughout the country, and aroused such indignation in Missouri that a revolution was effected in the Republican organization in this State. In St. Louis the feeling centered upon Goldstein as the head of the courthouse ring and the chief St. Louis figure involved in the scandal. In the primary in August the party bosses in St. Louis and Kansas City were overwhelmed, and virtually all the elements of the State committee having even the remotest connection with the Lowden scandal were eliminated. When the new State committee met it repudiated Jacob L. Babler, Missouri member of the Republican national committee, and commended the "activities of the Republicans of Missouri in seeking to rid the party of those of their organization who were found to have been guilty of gross improprieties," a direct reference to the Lowden fund scandal. The house-cleaning campaign, which was organized after the Lowden disclosures by Missouri Republicans concerned for the honor and integrity of the party, swept the State not only in the August primaries but in the November election.

The Republicans of Missouri fought a great battle for morality in politics and won. But Babler could not be eliminated by State action, and Goldstein, secure in his office and his ward, retained his place and power. Their acts were publicly condemned by the votes of the party, but none the less Babler has continued to be recognized in Washington as representative of the party, and the majority of Federal appointments in Missouri have been obtained through the influence of him and his coworkers. The moral and political effect of the house-cleaning campaign of 1920 has been thereby practically nullified by Washington. And now comes the appointment of Goldstein, one of the chief of those who were formally charged by the party with "gross improprieties," to the important office of collector of internal revenue, in clear opposition to public opinion, to the opinion of the Republican Party, as it has been expressed in Missouri in condemnation of the conduct of Babler, Goldstein, and their machine colleagues. The fight for clean politics won in Missouri has been lost in Washington. And it has been lost with the deliberate connivance of Senator SPENCER, whose eulogy of Goldstein fixes his own place within the courthouse ring. He can not pretend to represent the moral elements of the Republican Party in Missouri and at the same time hold Nat Goldstein up to the public eye as a paragon of virtue.

Mr. Harding, we repeat, has by implication and with full knowledge of the facts, approved the pernicious courthouse ring, long obnoxious to St. Louis, and approved the conduct of the men implicated in the Lowden scandal. This is not only bad in morals but it is bad politics. The people of this country are tired of machine domination; they are tired of party bosses; they are tired of municipal rings; they are tired of the expenditure of large sums of money to acquire office; they are tired of the political graft and corruption which grows out of these offenses against pure democracy and public morality. This has been shown in Missouri; it has been shown recently in Illinois; it has been shown in the general indignation over the Newberry affair; it was shown just the other day in the primary election in Indiana, in which the party machine was defeated. Such appointments as that of Goldstein are an offense to American ideals of citizenship and of government. They are wrong in principle and they are wrong in policy.

And we regret to see the admission by Governor Hyde, who was the leader and the chief beneficiary of the house-cleaning movement, that he consented to the appointment of Goldstein. "I did not indorse the appointment of Goldstein," he says, "but I agreed to it;" and he excuses his agreement on the ground that it would eliminate Goldstein from city and State politics. But Goldstein himself has announced that he will not be eliminated from politics; that he will continue to hold his place on the city committee; and, it is to be presumed, will continue to exercise his influence in city and in State politics, backed, as he will be, by the power of the Federal office he will hold and the distinction which the indorsement of the national administration gives to him. In this concession Governor Hyde has failed in loyalty to the cause he led and to the Republicans who elected him. To agree to the appointment of Goldstein on the ground of political expediency is to abandon the moral ground on which he won his battle.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HARRISON. I understand the Senator from Missouri desires to ask me a question, and I yield to him for that purpose.

Mr. SPENCER. I do want to ask the Senator a question, and, if the Senator will yield further, I should like also to make a statement.

I wish first to correct a misrepresentation which I am sure the Senator from Mississippi unintentionally made when he called the Globe-Democrat a Republican newspaper. He must know that for years that newspaper has not been a Republican newspaper, and boasts of the fact that it is not a Republican newspaper. It now calls itself nominally an independent newspaper. It once was a Republican newspaper, but has not been so for some years. I think it is perfectly fair to say that in the general estimation of the people of the State of Missouri its leanings are quite Democratic. It certainly is not a Republican newspaper.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

Mr. SPENCER. Will the Senator indulge me in one other statement?

Mr. HARRISON. I desire to say in that connection that I am very glad to hear the Senator from Missouri say that the Globe-Democrat is getting away from Republican policies and becoming more Democratic all the time. I am sure just such action as the Senator has brought about in St. Louis of having Goldstein appointed collector of internal revenue will not only make the Globe-Democrat a thoroughly Democratic newspaper but it will also make other newspapers which are now Republican change their policies and become Democratic.

Mr. SPENCER. The Senator from Mississippi is mistaken. The Globe Democrat is not getting away from the Republican Party. The Globe Democrat got away from the Republican Party when it bought out, at a very good bargain, a Democratic newspaper. In order to keep the circulation of that newspaper its politics was changed; and I fancy that it very much regrets the change in its politics. I think the time may come when it may get back to its first and fundamental love.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the Senator from Missouri if it is not a fact that every St. Louis newspaper, Republican and Democratic, through its editorial columns has condemned the nomination of Goldstein as collector of internal revenue for Missouri?

Mr. SPENCER. The Senator from Mississippi is equally mistaken in that statement. There is but one Republican newspaper in the city of St. Louis—that is, the St. Louis Times—and there has not been in that newspaper a word of condemnation, but I was about to say there has been strong approbation of that appointment. I can not, however, now put my finger upon the editorial which I have in mind; and so I shall refrain from making that statement, but the only Republican paper in the city of St. Louis has not uttered a word of condemnation of the appointment.

I may say further to the Senator from Mississippi—and then I shall leave the matter, Mr. President, because so far as I am able I do not want by anything I may say to contribute at all to any delay in the consideration of the tariff bill which we all know is now before the Senate—that he is doing, doubtless unintentionally, a real injustice to a man whom I have known for 25 years.

If I may say one other thing to the Senator from Mississippi, whose friendship I value and whom I love very much, the other day in the RECORD for some reason, I do not know why, he brought in the name of Mr. Roy T. Davis, who is now the minister of the United States to Costa Rica, and of Mr. W. H. Allen, who is now the Federal prohibition director in Missouri, and of Mr. W. L. Cole, who is now an Assistant Attorney General of the United States.

The inference from what he said was that in some way those men, neither of whom could defend himself or have any opportunity to defend himself, were tied up or associated with something that was wrong or to be condemned.

I remember very well, Mr. President, long before I came to the Senate during the course of a hearing in the House of Representatives with regard to some post office matter with which I had no connection, somebody for some reason saw fit to make some reflection upon me. Fortunately Mr. Alexander, who was a Representative in Congress from Missouri, a man of opposite politics to mine, and who, as we all know, subsequently served in the Cabinet of President Wilson as Secretary of Commerce, at once wrote in condemnation of the reflection. I have never forgotten the impression, first, of indignation that my name should be brought in, and second, of appreciation of what Mr. Alexander did.

I want to say to the Senator from Mississippi that Mr. Davis and Mr. Cole and Mr. Allen are three as high-class men, of as high integrity as there are in these United States, and that there is not a single thing, when the facts are presented, that can reflect upon either one of them in the slightest degree. I regret exceedingly that their names should have been put in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and spread all over the country with some taint of suspicion to them. I would have answered the Senator's statement immediately at the time had I heard it, but I did not see it until a day or two afterwards. I know well enough that the Senator from Mississippi does not intentionally want to do any injustice to any man.

Mr. BORAH obtained the floor.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, does the Senator from Idaho want to ask a question of the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BORAH. I will yield to the Senator from Mississippi if he desires to ask a question of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. HARRISON. I merely wish to say to the Senator from Missouri that I only read from the record, and the record from which I read shows that Mr. Davis, who has been appointed minister to Costa Rica, received, I think, some $500 of the corrupt Lowden fund. I merely read from the record—and I read from the record really without any elaboration—the fact that Mr. Cole received $500 of the corrupt Lowden campaign fund and $1,250 from Mr. Daugherty, the present Attorney General of the United States, who was then acting in the interest of Mr. Harding's candidacy, and that since then he had been appointed a special assistant to the Attorney General of the United States.

I read also that some other gentleman, whose name I do not now recall, received $400 of the corrupt Lowden campaign fund, and he was appointed United States prohibition director. I have forgotten his name. What was his name?

Mr. SPENCER. I think the Senator refers to Mr. Allen.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes. He received $400 of the corrupt Lowden campaign fund. I merely stated to the Senate that it seemed to me a little peculiar that these men who had received contributions from the Lowden corrupt campaign fund, which the country condemned and which was the one factor, more than anything else, that eliminated Lowden as a presidential possibility, are now getting all the good offices in Missouri; and also that it seemed a little strange that Mr. "Goldstained," who received $2,500 of the Lowden corrupt campaign fund, was now, upon the recommendation of the Senator from Missouri, nominated collector of internal revenue for Missouri.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, let me assure the Senator from Idaho, whom I will thank for his courtesy if he will yield to me for a moment, that I do not want to take up time, and I am not going to indulge in any defense of the men to whom the Senator from Mississippi has referred; but the Senator from Mississippi has repeated precisely what he said the other day, much to my disappointment, if I may use that word, for the Senator knew as he repeated it that the statement which he made cast suspicion and a slur upon those men. I let the case rest now with the statement that if the Senator from Mississippi had looked into the facts, or will look into the facts, there will be not one thing with regard to either one of these three men that he himself will in the slightest condemn; and that is the very unfairness of the thing—to read into the RECORD an extract or a statement, unexplained, without any of the surrounding circumstances, without any opportunity of the man to be heard; because some one, somewhere, has said something that reflects upon a man's character, then to put it into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and spread it, unexplained, all over the country. No one knows better than the distinguished Senator from Mississippi how unfair that is, and that is the very thing for which I rise to my feet.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator yield for just one interruption, and then I am through?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. I merely want to suggest to the Senator that other Senators here were not in a position to know all these facts as the Senator from Missouri was. He was a member of the committee investigating this corrupt fund; and I ask him now if the facts in the record do not disclose that each of the men whose names I have just stated received a part of that corrupt fund, and if they were not appointed to these various offices?

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I will yield the floor if this matter is going to continue.

Mr. SPENCER. I beg the Senator not to yield the floor, because I do not want to impose upon his courtesy.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, my understanding is that the rule about speaking twice upon any one proposition is going to be enforced, and therefore I object to any further speeches on this subject.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has recognized the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. MOSES. Will the Senator yield to me while I propound a request to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. BORAH. I think the Senator had better do it in his own time. I will lose the floor if I yield to the Senator; I can tell by the way the Vice President looks. I will yield in a few moments, however.

Mr. MOSES. I am afraid my request will lose its pertinency if I am not able to make it now.

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator, then.

Mr. MOSES. I merely wish to ask the Senator from Mississippi, who seems to be so anxious to spread in the RECORD these facts about Missouri politics, if he will not also put into the RECORD the letter of the former President of the United States to Mr. Higdon, peremptorily ordering Mr. Higdon out of the Democratic primary in Missouri, and if in that connection he will not print the comment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] on that, in which he said of former President Wilson that "he is the boy who is running Missouri politics"?

Mr. HARRISON. I suppose the Senator from Idaho will give me an opportunity to answer the request made by the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. BORAH. If it will help the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], I will yield.

Mr. HARRISON. I have no objection in the world to putting that in the RECORD, and also the fact that the Senator from New Hampshire was the directing force of General Wood's campaign fund——

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I make a point of order.

Mr. HARRISON (continuing). Where he expended $1,500,000 for his candidate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Indiana will state his point of order.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. The Senator from Mississippi has subsided.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho is recognized.

MR. BORIS BAKHMETEFF, RUSSIAN AMBASSADOR.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I recognize the great necessity of making progress with the tariff bill; but in view of the fact that we have no morning hour it is almost necessary at times to take a few moments with reference to matters which come up and seem not easily dismissed without some consideration.

The program which is now obtaining with reference to the examination of Mr. Bakhmeteff is a peculiar program, but I am not the author of it. It appears that some $187,000,000 was loaned to the Kerensky government at Mr. Bakhmeteff's request. We never have been able to get anything so far except a general statement as to what became of that money. It may be that a detailed statement will explain everything, but the general statements throw very little light on what has become of it. In view of the fact that the Secretary of State seems to think it proper that the examination go on through the State Department, and that the responses of Mr. Bakhmeteff be transmitted to the Senate, I know of no way to secure the details except to ask the Secretary of State to take into consideration some suggestions which I am about to make, and see if the examination can be conducted in this way satisfactorily to the Secretary of State and to the Senate.

The details which I desire, Mr. President, are:

First. What is the date of the credentials accrediting Boris Bakhmeteff as ambassador to the United States? Attach copy of the credentials to the reply.

Second. Give the date of the message of D. R. Francis, our former ambassador to Russia, transmitting the notification upon the part of the soviet government of Russia that Boris Bakhmeteff was no longer recognized as Russian ambassador. Attach copy of the same to the answer.

Third. What part of the $187,000,000 round figures loaned by this Government to Boris Bakhmeteff, or loaned by this Government to the Kerensky government at his instance, has been repaid to the Government of the United States?

Fourth. What amount of money is now due the Government of the United States by reason of said loans and advances made to Boris Bakhmeteff or to the Kerensky government at his instance and request?

Fifth. What amount of this money, if any, was transmitted or paid to the Russian Government or to the Russian authorities and to whom?

Sixth. Give a list of all contracts made with the Kerensky government at the instance of Boris Bakhmeteff, the parties with whom the contracts were made, the kind of goods contracted for, the amount of each contract, and the security or guaranty given in each instance.

Seventh. If these contracts or any of them were settled and adjusted by the Kerensky government or any subsequent government of Russia by Boris Bakhmeteff or any guaranty or surety thereon, give in detail the settlement.

Eighth. If these contracts were completed and executed by the American manufacturers in part or in whole, state what kind of goods or property was delivered under them to the Russian authorities, and to what Russian authorities these goods or property were delivered, and when.

Ninth. State in full and in detail what money, goods, property, or commodity reached Russia, and to whom they were delivered as a result of these loans made by this Government to the Kerensky government or to Boris Bakhmeteff.

Tenth. If at the termination of the war or any period during the contracts above referred to, any compromises or adjustments were made with the manufacturers with regard to the unfinished sales or delivery of the contracts, state what the compromises were in detail.

Eleventh. State by what authority Boris Bakhmeteff made the adjustments and the dates of the adjustments.

Twelfth. In other words, give us in detail the amount of the goods purchased for Russia, of whom purchased, the names of the manufacturers, the kind of material supplied, to whom in Russia delivered, the amount involved, and the final adjustment of the contracts.

Thirteenth. If any of these goods or material purchased in the first instance were afterwards sold to the United States, state the kind and amount of material and the amount of money paid by the United States for such goods, and to whom paid.

Fourteenth. What became of the amount of money, if any, received from the sale of goods or property originally purchased for the benefit of Russia?

Fifteenth. Give us the details with reference to the sale of certain powder to the English Government, whether or not the powder was afterwards rejected, and the terms of final settlement or adjustment.

Sixteenth. What amount of money has been supplied to Boris Bakhmeteff since November 17, 1917, for the purpose of maintaining the embassy here?

Seventeenth. About June, 1919, there appeared large advertisements in a great many papers throughout the United States urging the recognition of the Kolchak government. Out of what money were these advertisements paid for, and who paid for them?

Eighteenth. What amount of money, if any, has been transmitted by Boris Bakhmeteff to Georges Brandt, the Czarist consul in Rio de Janeiro, during 1920, or at all?

Nineteenth. What relationship did Gregorie Semenoff, as you understand, bear to the Kolchak government? Was it your understanding that he was acting under the authority of the Kolchak government?

Twentieth. Did Semenoff advise you, when he called upon you in the city of Washington about April 1 or 2, of his purposes in this country, and what did he say about raising money in this country for future activities in Siberia?

Mr. President, I dislike to conduct this kind of an examination; but if it is possible for me to ascertain what has become of the $187,000,000 which was loaned to Bakhmeteff, I am going to do it, even at inconvenience to myself and the Senate.

FINANCIAL AND POLITICAL DISORDERS IN HAITI.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I have before me a letter written by Mr. Lansing, former Secretary of State, under date of May 4, 1922, addressed to Hon. Medill McCormick, chairman of the Select Committee on Haiti and Santo Domingo. Mr. Lansing gives the history of the events leading up to our occupancy of Haiti and a part of what occurred thereafter. In view of the interest which this matter has excited throughout the country I ask that this letter may be incorporated in the RECORD without reading, and that it be printed in 8-point type.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD in 8-point type, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 4, 1922.

Hon. MEDILL MCCORMICK,
Chairman Select Committee on Haiti and Santo Domingo,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Complying with your request for a statement from me regarding Haiti, I beg to submit the following as embodying the contemporary views of the State Department on the financial and political disorders in Haiti, which caused a critical state of affairs during the last days of July, 1915, and on the attitude of the German Government toward Haiti, because largely upon those two considerations were based the instructions of the State Department to the United States Legation in Haiti and, through the Navy Department, to the United States naval commander in Haitian waters. The events to which I shall refer in this statement were succeeded by the ratification of the present treaty between the United States and Haiti, which had for its objects the insurance of Haiti's future welfare upon a permanent basis of law and order and the prevention of foreign intervention in the future based on political and financial disorders in Haiti.

On July 30, 1915, the U. S. S. Connecticut came into the harbor of Port au Prince just as President Guillaume Sam was being murdered and his body mutilated by an infuriated mob. This was an act of vengeance for the massacre of some scores of prisoners in the prison at Port au Prince who were political opponents of Guillaume Sam's government. The crowds attending the funeral processions of these victims of tyranny turned from them in a frenzy, dragged Guillaume Sam from the asylum which he had sought in the French Legation, killed him, dismembered his body, and paraded through the streets exhibiting the ghastly fragments. Revolutionary forces were at the time in possession of other principal ports of the country and threatened to attack the city of Port au Prince. There was no government to preserve order in the city or in the country. On the contrary, there was anarchy and armed insurrection. Universal fear prevailed, while the lives of Haitians and foreigners alike were imperiled by the conditions which existed. The violation of the extraterritoriality of the French Legation indicated the ruthless lawlessness of the revolutionaries. In the circumstances the forces of the United States were landed as a matter of urgent necessity.

The murders and atrocities perpetrated marked the complete breakdown of Haitian institutions, the culmination of a process of disintegration which had been in progress for a generation or more. It was evident from the state of affairs that there remained no possibility of a civilized government functioning without external assistance. The limit of tolerance for such conditions, which menaced the lives and property of Americans and other foreigners, was finally reached when the French Legation was violated. The restoration of order and government in Haiti was as clearly the duty of the Government of the United States as was the landing of the marines. If the United States had not assumed the responsibility, some other power would. To permit such action by a European power would have been to abandon the principles of the Monroe doctrine. The United States had no alternative but to act, and to act with vigor.

The process of disintegration above referred to is a matter of common knowledge. It is enough to say that none of the many Haitian governments immediately preceding that of Guillaume Sam was able to maintain itself against revolution. Those persons who were from time to time in power were irresponsible and arbitrary. The inhabitants were exploited and robbed. So insecure were they in their possessions and so frequently in danger of their lives that industry throughout the country was paralyzed. Foreign lives were not taken, but there was such recurrent apprehension of violence that few years passed without the necessity of United States ships appearing in Haitian waters. Cruisers of foreign powers often came on similar errands, and on occasions European sailors or marines had been landed. These conditions had become chronic, and they had year after year grown progressively worse. In June of 1915 a French cruiser had landed a force at Cape Haitien, and these were only withdrawn when American marines were landed to take their place. After the invasion of the French legation France dispatched a cruiser to Port au Prince and landed a force, which guarded the legation for several weeks, without objection on the part of the United States Government. It was manifest that the danger to foreign lives in Haiti, which was constantly increasing, made the possibility of European intervention more and more probable unless the United States acted.

A default in payments to European creditors presented another danger. Haitian foreign loans were held by Germans, French, and English, but not to any great extent by Americans. The foreign loans were secured by the customs revenues; thus a default would have given rise to the desire on the part of European Governments to seize the Haitian customhouses and administer the customs, a situation which, being of indefinite duration, would have caused serious political complications and been a grave menace to the peace of this hemisphere and to the immunity from European interference with American institutions. The finances of Haiti had been growing steadily weaker and the ability to meet her obligations had ceased. Interest on the public debt of about $20,000,000 had been paid with creditable regularity, but it had become necessary to borrow from the National Bank of Haiti and to make local forced loans elsewhere in order to meet these interest payments, and the limit of the ability to borrow had been reached. Amortization of foreign loans were many years in arrears. Revolutions had greatly increased the internal and floating debt. Fiat paper money was being issued but not used and payment of salaries of public employees was suspended. For this state of affairs no temporary remedy could suffice. This financial situation need hardly be treated here in greater detail.

In this connection, however, there was a more critical state of affairs than has been generally known. I refer to the attitude of the Imperial German Government in connection with the political disorders and financial straits of Haiti and the pretexts for aggression thereby afforded. There was good reason to believe that in the years 1913–14 Germany was ready to go to great lengths to secure the exclusive customs control of Haiti and also to secure a coaling station at Mole St. Nicholas. It is this feature that I would particularly call to the attention of your committee.

The United States had no wish to obtain a naval coaling station at Mole St. Nicholas. The Navy Department had long since definitely determined that a station there was not desirable, but it was also perfectly clear that a coaling station directly or indirectly controlled by another power would be a menace to the position of the United States in the Caribbean Sea, to the security of the Panama Canal, and, consequently, to the peace of this hemisphere. A privately owned coaling station, whether in the hands of Americans or Europeans, would have been a danger if ever a coal supply was allowed to accumulate there greater than necessary for current commercial needs. In case of war the station and coal stored there would have been subject to capture. In view of the possible consequences, the policy of the United States was clear. It could not look with favor on a privately owned coaling station at Mole St. Nicholas unless that was subject to its direct control. Though it did not need and it did not want such a station for itself, it could not permit a European government to secure one.

The indications were that Germany intended to obtain one unless she was prevented from doing so by the United States.

Although French is the official language of Haiti and French customs prevail, as well as the practice of sending the children of wealthy Haitian families to France for their education, there has been for many years a strong German influence in the country, resulting primarily from the establishment of German commercial houses at Haitian ports and the sending of young Germans to gain their livelihood in those concerns. A considerable number of these German residents have intermarried, so I have been informed, with the Haitians and are closely connected with and more or less active in the political and social life of the country.

During a number of years the Government at Washington was in receipt of various reports to the effect that foreign interests were desirous of obtaining coaling stations at Mole St. Nicholas, and in the year 1911 the Haitian Government, at the insistence of the then American minister, eliminated from a contract with a German national for a coastwise steamship service the granting of rights for a coaling station in Haiti.

In the year 1912 Hon. George von L. Meyer, then Secretary of the Navy, in reply to a communication from the Department of State in regard to the establishment of a coaling depot in Haiti for the steamship line of a foreign country, replied, referring to a communication made by the Navy Department to the State Department in 1910, to the effect that the Navy Department did not look with favor upon any proposition to establish so many coaling stations within such a limited geographical radius and could not contemplate favorably the prospect of having such stations in the hands of citizens of any of the European nations. The establishment of such stations would actually amount to the maintenance of a very considerable number of coaling stations close to our shores, which could be used by foreign vessels of war in the event of hostilities, and this the Navy Department believed should be prevented, if it were in the power of diplomacy to do so.

In the year 1913, and particularly in the year 1914, information was conveyed to the Department of State, through official and unofficial sources, to the effect that a German commercial firm was active in an attempt to secure extensive concessions from Haiti containing grants sufficiently broad to permit the building of coaling stations at Mole St. Nicholas, the concessions to be combined with a loan secured by control of the Haitian customs by the concessionaire. It was further stated that the German Government was back of the German commercial firm making the proposal.

On June 1, 1914, the American minister at Port au Prince reported to the Department of State that he was reliably informed that the Haitian Government would entertain a proposition to lease to the United States Mole St. Nicholas on the basis of a cash payment and a yearly rental. It was further stated that the Government of Haiti would most probably require, as an essential provision of such lease, that the United States should pledge itself not to interfere now or at any future time with the collection or administration of the customs of Haiti and would agree to afford protection to Haiti against any other nation or nations which might attempt to secure control of the customs. The minister concluded his telegram with the statement that the German cruiser Marietta had arrived the day before at Port au Prince.

As the United States was not interested in obtaining a lease of Mole St. Nicholas, no reply was sent to the minister's telegram.

Meanwhile, during the late winter and spring of 1914, financial conditions in Haiti, as a result of the political chaos existing, had been rapidly becoming more and more involved and foreign interests were increasingly anxious to obtain some form of guaranty from Haiti that that Government would continue to respect its obligations. As in most cases of this nature, suggestions were made relative to the collection and control of the Haitian customs by foreign nationals representing the foreign debtor interests. The foreign interests referred to were the holders of shares in the National Railroad of Haiti and in the National Bank of Haiti, and also the holders of the bonds representing the Haitian external debt. It was also obvious that those interested in the national bank, which was controlled by French shareholders, were deeply concerned as to the ability of the Haitian Government to continue its existing financial policy on account of its outstanding loans.

Although various plans were discussed in the Department of State which had as their object the aiding of Haiti and at the same time the protection of the interests of its creditors by means of a regulation of customs collections and their application, no agreement was reached between the Government of the United States and the Government of Haiti. However, under date of July 15, 1914, two weeks before the beginning of the World War, the American consul at Cape Haitien informed the department confidentially that he had learned from reliable source that the German minister at Port au Prince had telegraphed the German consul at Cape Haitien asking whether an American warship had landed its forces and taken possession of the customhouse.

On July 18, 1914, Mr. von Haniel, the chargé d'affaires of the Imperial German Government, spoke with the Third Assistant Secretary of State, Mr. Phillips, in relation to Haitian affairs, and on July 21 Mr. Phillips requested Mr. von Haniel to submit to him a written memorandum of the views of his Government which he had orally expressed. On July 25 Mr. von Haniel wrote to Mr. Phillips:

"MY DEAR MR. PHILLIPS: In reply to your favor of the 21st instant and with reference to our conversation of the 18th instant concerning the participation of the Imperial Government in a customs control in Haiti, in case such a control would be established by the American Government, I beg to say that my Government comprehends that the American Government, probably for reasons of interior politics, does not think it desirable, if the most interested European powers participate in an eventual customs control in Haiti, but the Imperial Government as well has to take into account the public opinion in their country. Considering our economical interests in Haiti and the part of the Banque Nationale, which is owned by Germans, people in Germany would not understand if my Government gave up their claim to participate in such a customs control. In the opinion of the Imperial Government therefore it will be the simplest solution if the status quo is maintained.

"I remain, my dear Mr. Phillips,

"Very sincerely yours, "E. v. HANIEL."

Shortly following the delivery of the note of the German chargé d'affaires war broke out between Germany and France, and the communication was not replied to until September 16, 1914, when the then Secretary of State, Mr. Bryan, wrote the following note to the German ambassador, Count von Bernstorff:

"MY DEAR MR. AMBASSADOR: Replying to the note of your Government's chargé dated July 25, 1914, regarding the matter of customs control in Haiti, I beg to say that the Government of the United States recognizes the large part which German merchants and German bankers have played in the development of the trade and enterprise of Haiti and wishes to make this correspondence the occasion for expressing the pleasure with which it witnesses the employment of German capital and the activity of German men of affairs in this hemisphere, but represents to the Government of his Imperial Majesty that German interests are not the only interests which have played a conspicuous and highly influential part in the development of the Haitian Republic and that the Government of the United States is well known to have taken for many years and without variation of policy and position that neither foreign influence nor interest proceeding from outside the American hemisphere could with the consent of the United States be so broadened or extended as to constitute a control, either wholly or in part, of the Government or administration of any independent American State.

"The Government of the United States can not depart from that policy and feels confident that the Government of his Imperial Majesty will not expect it to do so.

"Probably a participation of the Government of his Imperial Majesty in any method which might be agreed upon by which the Government of the Republic of Haiti should be assisted in the orderly, efficient, and economical administration of its customs revenues did not present itself to his Imperial Majesty's Government as a departure from the traditional policy of the Government of the United States when its note of July 25 was drafted. But this Government would regard such a participation as a very serious departure from that policy alike in principle and in practice. The Government of the United States regards it as one of the grave possibilities of certain sorts of concessions granted by governments in America to European financiers and contractors and of certain sorts of contracts entered into by those governments with European banking houses and financiers that the legitimate and natural course of enforcing claims might lead to measures which would imperil the political independence or, at least, the complete political autonomy of the American States involved, and might issue in results which the Government of the United States has always regarded it as its duty to guard against as the nearest friend and natural champion of those States whenever they should need a friend and champion.

"Whatever the Government of the United States might deem it friendly and wise to agree to with the Government of the Republic of Haiti by way of assisting her to make good her obligations and escape the risks of default or disorder to her finances would be done without intending to serve the interest of any citizen of the United States in preference to the interest of the citizens or government of any other country. It would be planned for the benefit of all concerned and upon a basis of absolute neutrality. This Government does not regard its insistence upon an exclusive privilege in matters of this kind, therefore, as a course not dictated by selfishness, but, on the contrary, as a course clearly dictated by a desire for peace and the exclusion of all occasion of unfriendliness with any nation of the other hemisphere. It is willing to give any pledges of disinterest and impartiality that may reasonably suggest themselves, but thinks that its best pledge is the course which it has, in fact, invariably pursued in matters and in circumstances of this kind. Its declared purpose in this case, should the Republic of Haiti desire a convention with regard to the administration of her customs revenues, would, as always, be made frankly and without reservation of any kind, and this it would deem the best evidence of its friendship and respect for the Government of Germany and the rights of German citizens wherever American influence may touch them. This is the way of peace and of mutual accommodation.

"Accept, Excellency, the renewed assurances of my highest consideration.

"W. J. BRYAN."

On the eve of the declaration of war between Germany and Russia the U. S. S. Connecticut and the German cruiser Karlsrhue were both in the harbor of Port au Prince. On July 31, 1914, the Karlsrhue changed her position in order to screen the movements of her crew, and a number of boatloads of German sailors with small arms and machine guns left the Karlsrhue and proceeded to the wharf, where they landed. When halfway down the wharf the Germans turned about, returned to their boats, and went back to their ship. This mysterious action took place at dusk. Shortly afterwards the captain of the Karlsrhue came aboard the Connecticut and told the captain he had received orders to proceed to St. Thomas for coal and asked the captain of the Connecticut to protect German interests while he was gone. The Karlsrhue then steamed out of the harbor to begin her commerce-destroying cruise. Shortly afterwards the captain of the Connecticut was informed by wireless that war between Russia and Germany had been declared.

There is reason to believe that the German landing party was turned back on the wharf by the German minister to Haiti pursuant to cabled orders for the Karlsrhue to leave Port au Prince at once. Thus the local situation was, by the outbreak of war, relieved of a conflict of interests, which might have caused serious embarrassment.

In the month of July, 1914, the Secretary of State sent a draft of a proposed agreement between the Government of the United States and the Government of Haiti to the American minister at Port au Prince. This agreement, which was modeled after the treaty entered into between the United States and the Dominican Republic during the administration of President Roosevelt, embodied the following provisions:

The appointment of a general receiver of customs and his assistants by the President of the United States; the payment of customs duties to the general receiver, and granting him all protection in the performance of his duties; the appointment of the financial adviser to the Government of Haiti; the application of all sums collected to the payment of interest and sinking fund of the public debt of Haiti; that the Republic of Haiti would not increase its public debt, except by previous agreement with the United States; that the United States should have authority to prevent any and all interferences with the receipt, collection, or free course of the customs, or with the free exercise of powers imposed upon the receivership.

However, a short time after the receipt of the proposed agreement by the minister a revolution broke out against the government of President Zamor, which, as usual in Haiti, started at Cape Haitien in the north and proceeded to Port au Prince via the town of St. Mark. It is interesting to observe in connection with the history of revolutions in Haiti that they have uniformly been conceived in or about Cape Haitien and have proceeded along practically the same roads in the direction of the capital, namely, by way of the strategic town of St. Mark. It has been the established belief of most Americans who have been in Haiti, and of American officials who have been cognizant of Haitian affairs during the past decade, that the majority of these revolutions have been financed in the north of Haiti by German merchants, who could expect sufficient financial advantages from the success of the revolution to warrant the initial outlay.

The revolution against the Zamor government was successful, and Davilmar Theodore proclaimed himself President of Haiti. The Government of the United States withheld its recognition of Theodore as president of Haiti pending an investigation of his activities and the incidents in connection with his seizure of the sovereign power. Before any definite policy in this connection was determined a revolution against the Theodore government was started in the usual manner and culminated in the overthrow of Davilmar Theodore and the assumption of the presidency by Guillaume Sam. The United States, consistent with its policy in regard to the recognition of revolutionary governments, refused to recognize the government of Sam, and not long after Sam had installed himself in the presidential palace another revolution, headed by one Doctor Bobo, broke out in the north. The resulting conditions alarmed the French minister, and in June, 1915, a French cruiser occupied Cape Haitien with a landing party, as has already been stated. Before the revolutionary forces had actually reached Port au Prince the massacre of political prisoners above referred to had taken place and Sam had been butchered.

During the terms of office of these Presidents various attempts were made on the part of the Government of the United States through special missions and through the minister in Port au Prince to obtain from these provisional governments an agreement as to the entrance into some form of convention between the United States and Haiti. The essential provisions of these conventions were, like the Dominican treaty, the guarantee by the United States of Haitian independence and of the stability of the Haitian Government, and the privilege of the United States minister to advise the Haitian Government in its selection of Haitian citizens as officials of the Haitian customs service, as the customs revenue was a prize which attracted revolutionists and their financial supporters.

On account of the state of the country during this period, in which violence and anarchy were rife, the overtures made by the United States, solely out of a sincere desire to aid the Haitian people to establish an orderly and law-enforcing Government, which would restore stable political and economic conditions in the island, were fruitless.

Admiral Caperton, of the United States Navy, who had arrived with his flagship in Port au Prince on the day of the assassination of Sam, landed a naval force of the United States and assumed military control of Port au Prince on July 30, 1915. The admiral and the American chargé immediately took steps to cooperate with the Haitian committee of safety for the protection of life and property in the city and adjacent country.

Various aspirants for election by the Assembly of Haiti for President presented themselves, among whom the most notable were Dr. Bobo and Senator Dartiguenave. The American representatives, under direction of the Government of the United States, discussed with these candidates and with members of the Haitian Congress the conditions upon which the United States would recognize a government in Haiti. These conditions were as follows:

"First. Let Congress understand that the Government of the United States intends to uphold it, but that it can not recognize action which does not establish in charge of Haitian affairs those whose abilities and dispositions give assurances of putting an end to factional disorder.

"Second. In order that no misunderstanding can possibly occur after election, it should be made perfectly clear to candidates, as soon as possible and in advance of their election, that the United States expects to be intrusted with the practical control of the customs and such financial control over the affairs of the Republic of Haiti as the United States may deem necessary for efficient administration.

"The Government of the United States considers it its duty to support a constitutional government. It means to assist in the establishment of such a government and to support it as long as necessity may require. It has no design upon the political or territorial integrity of Haiti. On the contrary, what has been done, as well as what will be done, is conceived in an effort to aid the people of Haiti in establishing a stable government and maintaining domestic peace throughout the Republic."

Congress elected Senator Dartiguenave President on August 12.

On August 14 the Department of State dispatched to the legation at Port au Prince instructions embodying the terms of a treaty to be negotiated, if possible, with the Government of Haiti.

On August 17 the chargé d'affaires of the United States, complying with the instructions received from the department, submitted to President Dartiguenave a draft of the proposed treaty. Negotiations with President Dartiguenave then proceeded. The President expressed his approval of the terms of the treaty, but for a month was unable to secure agreement on the part of his cabinet.

On September 15 the chargé d'affaires at Port au Prince reported to the department by telegraph that the Haitian Government had forwarded to the legation a copy of a formal protest addressed to it by the German minister, in which he stated that the American occupation and management of customs would be prejudicial to German interests. To this telegram the department replied that it would seem desirable that the Haitian Government should reply to the German minister to the effect that legitimate German interests would be accorded the same equitable and impartial treatment as would be given to all foreigners and foreign interests in Haiti.

On September 16 the treaty was signed, and on February 28, 1916, it was ratified by the Senate of the United States without a dissenting vote and without an amendment being offered. The principal provisions of this treaty were the guaranteeing of the independence of Haiti, the establishment of a native gendarmerie, the appointment of an American financial adviser, and the administration of the customs service by Americans.

It is especially to be noted in connection with those provisions of the treaty that the Government of the United States, although it had received a proposal from Haiti to cede to the United States outright without restriction, Mole St. Nicholas, declined to insert such a provision in the treaty and insisted upon the inclusion in the treaty of an article expressly embodying the idea that no Haitian territory was to be ceded to it.

On September 17 President Dartiguenave's Government was accorded recognition by the United States.

The situation which confronted the representatives of the American civil and military forces in Haiti, after the revolution and prior to the recognition of the Dartiguenave Government was briefly as follows:

The customhouses throughout the country had been disorganized by an order of the preceding Government, which directed the deposit of funds with private firms instead of with the Banque Nationale, the legal depositary, and also by the threatened seizure of the customhouses by armed insurrectionary groups. The government of President Dartiguenave had not funds available to pay the small number of troops under its orders, and these dissatisfied troops were becoming a menace to peace and order. The inhabitants of towns in which customhouses were situated were deprived of their food supply by hostile armed bands which infested the highways, and even the water system of Cape Haitian was cut by these brigands. Commerce was paralyzed and the city populations were starving, for the authority of the Dartiguenave government did not extend far beyond the outskirts of Port au Prince.

On August 19, in view of the serious conditions existing, which had been reported to the Government at Washington, Admiral Caperton received instructions to administer the customhouses so that the proceeds therefrom might be used temporarily to provide sustenance for the starving natives by paying them for labor on public works, to establish a gendarmerie to aid the Dartiguenave government in the pacification of the country, and also to prevent the diversion of the public funds of the Haitian Government into the pockets of unscrupulous persons.

The customhouses were taken over between August 20 and September 2, as rapidly as the American squadron commander could place in charge of them American officers as administrators, and could furnish them adequate protection. The customhouse at Port au Prince was the last to be taken over on September 2. On September 3 the prevailing conditions of anarchy called for the proclamation of martial law. Thereafter, until the treaty was ratified by both countries, the customs were administered by the naval forces of the United States. After ratification the customhouses were taken over by the receiver general, a treaty official.

In October, 1915, attacks were made on parties of United States marines near Cape Haitien, and thereafter a sharp campaign was carried on against the lawless bands operating in the Republic, which resulted in the restoration of order throughout the country. Many hundreds of the outlaws surrendered their arms, receiving a small sum for each rifle, and those who did not surrender were dispersed. With the restoration of order and the coming into effect of the treaty, this period of the American occupation came to a close.

As may be concluded from the foregoing review of the circumstances leading up to the establishment of treaty relations between the United States and Haiti, the Government of the United States was animated by two dominating ideas:

1. To terminate the appalling conditions of anarchy, savagery, and oppression which had been prevalent in Haiti for decades, and to undertake the establishment of domestic peace in the Republic in order that the great bulk of the population, who had been downtrodden by dictators and the innocent victims of repeated revolutions, should enjoy a prosperity and an economic and industrial development to which every people of an American nation are entitled.

2. A desire to forestall any attempt by a foreign power to obtain a foothold on the territory of an American nation which, if a seizure of customs control by such a power had occurred, or if a grant of a coaling station or naval base had been obtained, would have most certainly been a menace to the peace of the Western Hemisphere, and in flagrant defiance of the Monroe Doctrine.

Very sincerely yours,

ROBERT LANSING.

CONTINUANCE OF GOVERNMENT PUBLICATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. MOSES. I submit the conference report on Senate Joint Resolution 132, and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The Assistant Secretary read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 132) to provide for the continuance of certain Government publications, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 2 and to the title of the bill, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 1: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the House amendment insert the following: "That hereafter the head of any executive department, independent office, or establishment of the Government is hereby authorized, with the approval of the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, to use from the appropriations available for printing and binding such sums as may be necessary for the printing of journals, magazines, periodicals, and similar publications as he shall certify in writing to be necessary in the transaction of the public business required by law of such department, office, or establishment: Provided, That there may be printed, in addition to those necessary for such public business, not to exceed 2,000 copies for free distribution by the department, office, or establishment issuing the same: Provided further, That the Public Printer shall print such additional copies thereof and of any other Government publication, not confidential in character, as may be required for sale to the public by the Superintendent of Documents at the cost of printing and binding, plus 10 per cent, without limit as to the number of copies to any one applicant who agrees not to resell or distribute the same for profit; but the printing of such additional copies required for sale by the Superintendent of Documents shall be subject to regulation by the Joint Committee on Printing and shall not interfere with the prompt execution of printing for the Government"; and the House agree to the same.

GEO. H. MOSES,
ARTHUR CAPPER,
DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
EDGAR R. KIESS,
ALBERT JOHNSON,
W. F. STEVENSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator from New Hampshire the effect of the report as finally agreed upon?

Mr. MOSES. The effect of the report as finally agreed upon is to diminish the number of Government publications by more than 200 and to effect a saving in public printing of something like $2,000,000 a year and to restrict the avenues within which periodicals may be published by Government authority.

Mr. KING. Some time ago the subject was under consideration, and the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] outlined what I regarded at that time as a very admirable plan. Does this plan approximate that one?

Mr. MOSES. This plan, with some modifications, is the plan suggested by the senior Senator from Utah; and in connection with the general subject, I should like to say that the whole movement was initiated by the senior Senator from Utah at the time he was chairman of the Joint Committee on Printing, and has been carried forward along the lines which he then indicated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House still further insisted upon its disagreement to certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9981) making appropriations for the Executive and for sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes; agreed to the further conference requested by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. WOOD of Indiana, Mr. WASON, and Mr. HARRISON were appointed managers on the part of the House at the further conference.

The message also announced that the House agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4382) to provide for the application of the reclamation law to irrigation districts.

The message further announced that the House agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10941) authorizing the Postmaster General to grant permission to use special canceling stamps or postmarking dies.

The message also announced that the House agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 132) to provide for the continuance of certain Government publications.

ADDRESS BY EX-GOVERNOR HASKELL, OF OKLAHOMA.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, the Morning Telegraph of Sunday, April 30, carries an address by ex-Governor Haskell, of Oklahoma. It is a clarion call that should be heard and heeded by every lover of liberty. It is an earnest, eloquent, and unanswerable protest against the centralization of Government and the invasion of the constitutional rights of the citizen. The plea of a seasoned statesman—whose theories have been tried in the practical school—of a successful business experience, for a return to the true and tried principles, the honesty and economy of the fathers, in the conduct of national affairs. I ask permission to incorporate in the RECORD this brief and superb address in the same type in which my remarks are printed.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in 8-point type in the Record, as follows:

HASKELL URGES LIBERTY, HOME RULE, AND ECONOMY—OKLAHOMA'S FIRST GOVERNOR, AT WESTERNERS' RECEPTION, DEMANDS END OF GOVERNMENT EXTRAVAGANCE AND INVASION OF PRIVATE CITIZENS' RIGHTS.

At the Oklahoma Society reception at the Hotel McAlpin last night, Charles N. Haskell, that State's first governor and one of the men who played such a large part in shaping the former Indian and Oklahoma Territories into Statehood, was the chief guest of honor.

After several "stunts" typifying the early days of the State, former Congressman Scott Ferris introduced Mr. Haskell, who thrilled the audience of more than a thousand former Oklahomans and their guests by the good, sound sense of his words, not alone in recounting what has made Oklahoma take such a high rank in the constellation of States in so few years, but in pointing out what might be accomplished if the National Government would only release its grip upon the business of governing the people.

Particularly instructive were his words on the need of retrenchment in the expenditures by all branches of government, whether city, county, State, or National, and on the invasion of the rights of the private citizen by the great number of investigating bureaus that have been foisted upon the public service within the last few years. His auditors went away more convinced than ever that the habitat of Mr. Haskell is not alone Oklahoma or New York, but the whole United States. He said:

"Near 90 years have passed since the sages in our American Congress met and solved the question as to the immediate future of the Five Civilized Tribes of American Indians. Then the Cherokees, Creeks, Choctaws, Chickasaws, and the Seminoles inhabited their various reservations in the Southeastern States, adhering to their choice of community ownership and community mode of life. These had become objectionable to the surrounding white settlers, and demand was made upon Congress to negotiate with the Five Civilized Tribes to the end that these reservations might be obtained for settlement by white people and by communities in harmony with the white man's idea of land ownership and government.

SECTION ONCE CALLED REMOTE.

"Looking about to effect a new treaty with the Five Civilized Tribes, Congress looked to the uninhabited region of the extreme Southwest. Then the Red River was the border line between the Empire of Mexico and our own Republic. Then the Empire of Mexico extended northward almost to the mouth of the Columbia River and our own Pacific coast line was little more than 500 miles in extent. The present State of Kansas and all States to the north and west thereof did not exist, and their areas were but the home of the wild Indian and the wild coyote. Denver, Kansas City, Omaha, St. Paul, and numerous other now prosperous cities were unknown to the map of our country. The area from southwest Missouri and western Arkansas to the Mexican boundary line was practically uninhabited except for roving bands of wild Indians. And in view of the present populous, refined, and developed condition of that area to-day it may be remarkable and hardly complimentary to the foresight of the sages of 1833 when we find the most notable statesmen of our American Congress approving the contemplated adjustment of territorial difficulties with the Five Civilized Tribes, wherein they say, 'This area is so remote from the habitation of civilized people that in giving it over to the Five Civilized Tribes it will remove them so far away as to avoid any controversies in the future between them and any white neighbors.'

"Thus it was done, and the great Indian Territory, covering approximately 70,000 square miles, for the purpose of both home creation and governmental policy, was ceded to the Five Civilized Tribes. They became its inhabitants, established their homes, established their government, and during the succeeding fifty-odd years made such progress in education, in religious endeavor, in home building, and local government as to do credit to the people of any country.

BEGINNING OF CIVILIZATION.

"But this was the beginning of civilization in this area, and by 1889 the prophecies of congressional sages before quoted had been most emphatically refuted. Contrary to that prophecy, in little more than 50 years that area became completely surrounded by well-organized, prosperous and populous States. The Empire of Mexico had been compelled to withdraw its border lines, leaving room for the empire of Texas on the south, and this extended the United States direct to the Pacific, whereon our coast line had been extended more than 1,000 miles. And again Congress was confronting the old controversy; that is, shall there exist in this country a government within a government and civilized but noncitizen people of such distinct difference as to make harmony of action impossible? The Five Civilized Tribes removed from the South Atlantic States to this new country still maintained their community policies, community ownership of lands and distinct form of government. The end of this condition was in sight. Our country had no more remote and uninhabited areas to offer in exchange. Dismembering these independent governments, shaping the policies of their people to harmonize with the general policies of the United States, first the sparsely settled areas of the western part of Indian Territory were acquired from the Five Civilized Tribes by Congress and opened to settlement. The Territory of Oklahoma was formed and these lands released to the Government by the Five Civilized Tribes were made subject to settlement.

"This may be termed the beginning of the creation of a new Commonwealth and affording opportunity for home building by people of our country.

THE DAY OF AWAKENING.

"This brings us to the beautiful April morning 33 years ago when the Great Creator may be said to have finished his part of the work and presented it to humanity as man's opportunity to enjoy and develop God's bountiful blessings. This was the day of transformation. The sun rising in all its glory, lighting the way over boundless prairie made beautiful by the verdure of spring. Countless seasons had come and gone likened to this with the waving grass and flowers bloom-kissed by the morning sun, an invitation to the hand of industry and the ambition of all who would build for themselves, their children, and their children's children habitations of comfort and happiness. But it was reserved for this particular spring morning to announce that the moment had arrived when God's benevolence should become man's opportunity. Thousands were in line waiting; the signal was given, and from that moment to this we must account for our own stewardship.

"Until 1907 the dismembered Indian Territory continued a separate governmental existence, the western area as organized

Oklahoma Territory and the eastern area remained as the home of the governments and the people of the Five Civilized Tribes.

"Then, November 16, 1907, the final elimination of the governments and policies of the Five Civilized Tribes. They then became citizens of the United States and their areas became a part of the United States, subject to our uniform plan of government. The two Territories were united and the proclamation of the President proclaimed the forty-sixth State of the American Union, the State of Oklahoma—the 'baby State,' so called, for all last-admitted States are baby States. But Oklahoma came into the American Union as a State without a precedent. By special Federal census of that time the new State showed a population of 1,411,000 people, more than four times the population of any other new State ever coming from territorial government to Statehood, and although forty-sixth in number that morning it ranked as the twenty-third State in population; the seventeenth State, according to Federal statistics, in wealth production; the ninth State in railroad mileage operated within its borders; the fifth State in cotton production; the eighth State in wheat and corn production; the second State in oil production.

SOME OF THE PROBLEMS.

"With this important standing in population and commerce the new State of Oklahoma was embarrassed from the fact that all of the Indian Territory area was without municipal, county, or district organization, and with the advent of the new State there was also the advent of 45 new counties whose organization began with the organization of State government. With the immense population and the immense property interests there was corresponding immensity of controversy by strong interests all seeking to get the best of constitutional provision and governmental policy. There was the usual demand for education and eleemosynary institutions, but in the face of all of those conditions the new State was blessed with a population the overwhelming majority of whom were for the welfare of Oklahoma first and above all other considerations. For one, I remember with deep gratitude and sincere affection that love for their new State made our people patriots before they were partisans, and by this harmony of action and almost universal cooperation the strenuous work of State organization was made easy and results were produced at such an economic cost as to stand almost without precedent on any hand.

"But government, we are reminded by past observations, will be what the people make it, and we must be mindful of the fact that domestic comfort and domestic happiness are based largely upon the results of government. If our Government is oppressive you can easily count the days when individual and family life will become but a sullen, dissatisfied, and disorganized condition. We hope to see Oklahoma become from year to year a State of great consequence, great prosperity, and great happiness.

STATES ONE COMMUNITY.

"But States of this Union can not pursue distinctly different policies nor enjoy distinctly different results. There is that community of interest among all our States that makes harmony of action indispensable. One can not long enjoy comfort and happiness when other States are denied these blessings. But while we thank the Great Creator for the opportunities by Him provided to make this, the so-called land of liberty and home of the free, at the same time the home of plenty and the home of happiness, from that point we must take upon ourselves the responsibility for government that will avail our people of these opportunities. We do not need to look into the future for plans of government or diagrams of policy. The teachings of our noted and revered men of the past are a sufficient guide for the present if we are mindful of what they have said. If this land of ours is, in fact, to be longer styled the Land of Liberty, let us realize that a minimum of centralized government and a maximum of local self-government must be the basis. We must realize that individual respect for the laws and governmental policies of our country is absolutely essential to the development of individual patriotic sentiment and love of country in the minds and the hearts of our people. That happiness can not abide in any land where tax oppressions so deplete the home production as to deprive that home of reasonable provision for comfortable maintenance. With these three propositions before every citizen of our United States we may as well calmly and intelligently analyze our present policies and conditions and the results thereof.

"Of the invasion of individual rights and the sacred privilege of local self-government President Washington warned us: 'For this, though it may in one instance be the extreme of good, is the original weapon by which free governments are destroyed.'

SURRENDER TO THEORISTS.

"Quoting our Abraham Lincoln, he said: 'To maintain inviolate the right of the States to order and control under the Constitution their own affairs by their own judgment exclusively, such maintenance is essential for the preservation of the balance of power on which our institutions rest.'

"Fellow citizens, do we realize that in recent years by our own voluntary vote and act we have so completely surrendered the affairs of government into the hands of the theorist and the dreamer, whose good intentions have not been blessed by the guiding hand of practical experience; that such declarations of patriotic and unselfish leaders as Washington and Lincoln have been forgotten and their policies so completely subordinated that our so-called glorious land of liberty is but a dream of years ago; that the terms 'inherent right of the citizen,' 'individual privilege of the citizen,' 'local self-government by the local people,' are things of yesterday not countenanced nor enjoyed to-day? That legislative activity has completely eliminated the sacred, inherent right of the individual, and centralized government completely restricts and overwhelms local self-government?

"For a time the judiciary of our country was the bulwark of defense against these invasions. And let us not be blind to the fact that to-day the judiciary is constantly yielding its solemn privileges and duty to legislative invasion, and the rights of the individuals and the community that were sacred yesterday are forgotten and denied to-day. And this restrictive policy brings with it attendant extravagance in government and evil in administration.

42,000 SPIES IN UNITED STATES PAY.

"Less than a quarter of a century ago, in the greater enjoyment of individual rights and local self-government, our Federal authorities found it necessary to have upon the pay roll of the Federal Government fewer than 200 sleuths and special agents and inspectors to aid in the enforcement of Federal laws. Will any one defend the policy of the Federal Government which to-day employs more that 42,000 inspectors, sleuths, and inquisitorial agents to dog the footsteps of him who should be, in the exercise of his constitutional rights, enjoying the hitherto dignity and freedom of an honest American citizen? Such policy is an invasion of the inherent rights of the American citizen, of the rights of the local people to self-government, and of the rights of the country to limit its taxation to public necessity.

"We regret that limited time on this occasion does not permit us to go into greater detail. We are but adding our voice to the note of warning that others are sounding throughout the land. In the exercise of individual business sense no argument is required to sustain the assertion that prosperity and comfort can not result from the reckless expending of $2 where but $1 is earned. Apply this, if you like, to private life or to public affairs and the rule is equally true. Yet our country has blindly and recklessly bowled along until $8,000,000,000 will not meet the demands that taxing authorities will make in the year 1922 on the wealth-producing class of our country. From the district up to the State authorities, inclusive, approximately one-half this enormous expenditure will be required. The Federal authorities will exact as much more, and it matters not by what ingenious device this sum may be levied—whether by direct taxation or other demand, it matters not—it must all come from the producing element of our people. Against this enormous demand the entire crop products of the United States, which in fact is our great wealth-producing resource, will not provide this amount; indeed, we would find a deficiency of more than $1,000,000,000.

AN ORGY OF EXTRAVAGANCE.

"What brought about this wild orgy of extravagance? Let us not be partisans when the needs of our country call for patriots. All political parties that have participated in the affairs of government for the last 30 years have their own share in the responsibility for this unfortunate condition. We recall the occasional warning by those who had the courage to cry out against the pork-barrel policy of legislative conduct; that is, the assembling of votes to enact legislative propositions, whether in the State legislature or the Federal Congress, wherein mutual aid was the result of mutual voting.

"Unmindful of the sacred right of the taxpayer to have the demands for revenue limited to actual necessity, the pork-barrel policy aimed to build personal popularity and perpetual tenure of office for those participating therein. But the milk has been spilt. All political parties have their share in the disastrous results, and all political parties owe it to the sacred rights of our people and the future glory of our country to right these wrongs and return to a policy of economic government so well within the earning capacity of our people that mortgages will not be the only possible opportunity for prosperity. Indeed, it is a condition and not a theory that confronts us.

"But the other day I heard a substantial, honorable citizen speak of recent service as a grand juror, saying: 'We, the grand jury, decided as a policy not to indict those charged with violation of certain of our sumptuary Federal laws, excepting only those charged with a certain class of offenses.'

"Fellow citizens, do you realize the meaning of this statement? Simply this: The grand jury, feeling the extreme impropriety of the law enacted by Congress, has taken it unto themselves to be the lawmaker as well as the law enforcer.

A DANGER TO THE REPUBLIC.

"There is the most imminent danger in the enactment of laws, whether they be to restrict individual conduct and limit inherent rights or whether they be to bankrupt the taxpayer by exacting more revenue than he can earn or whether they be to collect these revenues by such extravagantly expensive and inquisitorial methods—they all make for a condition of the public mind destructive of love for country. Their only product can be a general disrespect for law destructive of patriotic sentiment. Nor should we deceive ourselves nor lull to sleep the thoughtful and conscientious citizens who too in time will join in general condemnation of the policy to centralize government, disregard inherent rights of individuals, and bankrupt our country. And the day is not in the dim distance when popular clamor will demand these essential reforms.

"These evils exist. Why delay return to the policies of government contemplated by our Constitution and to economic government that recognizes that home building and home furnishing is a more sacred demand upon the fruits of industry than unwarranted extravagance in the government of the district, State, or Nation?

"But these reforms are not automatic. They may not be realized without popular demand. Nor may we depend upon those who have brought about these conditions to effect these reforms for us. I appeal to every citizen in the State of Oklahoma, as well as to those who are sojourning in this distant city, to disregard every selfish political sentiment and unite their efforts in solid phalanx and with unwavering determination to effectuate a complete return to the just recognition of inherent rights of the individual and complete return to local self-government, wherein the community may express its wishes for local administration as distinctly, if desired, in the different localities as the climate of Florida may be distinct from the climate of Minnesota. Recognizing that the will of the governed should not be overcome by majorities entertaining different views, but inhabiting vastly different localities with different needs and different desires; recalling the language of Senator Sherman, of Ohio, when he said, on the subject of specie payment. 'The way to resume is to resume.' And I say with like determination, in the wild governmental extravagances, that the way to retrench, by the eternals, is to retrench, and begin retrenching the instant you find retrenchment necessary to the comfort, yea, to the life and living, now apparent throughout the land.

WOULD LIMIT EXPENDITURES.

"Our official agencies having the power to disburse public funds and declare appropriations to that end have no more right than the weakest citizen to incur obligations that are beyond the earning power of our people to pay. Limits must be fixed beyond which appropriations shall not pass, and when these principles on the three subjects heretofore outlined have been established and recognition enforced you may then expect to hear with fervor and the deepest reverence again being proclaimed throughout our land:

"This is the land of the free, the cradle of liberty, where individual rights are respected—government of the people and by the people recognized in every separate State of the Union—and where he who toils may surely and safely expect to reserve for himself and his family for their comfort and happiness a fair share of the fruits of his industry."

The speaker's references to retrenchments and reforms were heartily applauded throughout his address.

GOOD ROADS.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, there is now pending before the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads a bill which I think is one of the steps—whether intentional or unintentional—in the destruction of the efficacy of the Federal highway act as far as the building of primary or interstate roads is concerned. It is H. R. 11131, commonly known as the Dunn bill. I have received from my State a number of telegrams and letters with regard to this bill, and I want to have those letters and those telegrams referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, so that they may have before them the arguments and facts stated in those communications with regard to the Dunn bill.

Under the Federal highways act of 1916 it was provided that the Federal Government's participation in the building of Federal highways in cooperation with the States should be limited to $20,000 per mile. That was considered necessary in 1916. It was placed at $20,000 per mile upon the theory that the States would place an equal amount of appropriation per mile against the money advanced by the Federal Government, making $40,000 per mile for the building of these Federal highways.

In the Dunn bill, which appropriates the necessary funds for carrying on these highways in the years 1922 and 1923, the limit which the Government may advance per mile for 1923——

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator to say that the Dunn bill makes no appropriation at all. It simply authorizes $65,000,000 for next year and $75,000,000 for the year after that. Our bill appropriates for this year, but their bill makes no appropriation.

Mr. PITTMAN. What I am getting at is this: This bill has passed the House, and it limits the amount of participation by the Federal Government to $12,500 per mile for the fiscal year 1922, ending in July, 1923, and $10,000 per mile for the fiscal year 1923, ending the 30th of June or the 1st of July, 1924. That means that the total provided for the building of roads will be $25,000 per mile for the fiscal year 1922, and $20,000 per mile for the fiscal year 1923. All of the information I have received is that that will be totally inadequate for the building of the primary roads.

Of course those who have taken a particular interest in this matter of road building understand that there are two kinds of roads anticipated in the Federal highways act—primary and secondary roads. The primary roads are interstate roads, or roads that are supposed to be national highways in the real sense of the word, because they are supposed to constitute a system of transstate roads that connect and make a whole system.

Those roads are built in accordance with the plan laid down by the Federal Highway Department. They must be at least 22 feet wide; they must have a certain kind of foundation; they must be surfaced in a certain way. They are substantial, permanent, national highways.

The experience of the Federal Highway Department and of the State departments of the States, through which these roads have been constructed, proves that these roads can not be constructed for less than $30,000 or $40,000 per mile. The secondary roads, or roads which connect with the State highways, may be built of less substantial material and be less expensive, because it is not anticipated that they will have the same amount of travel over them; but the Dunn bill does not attempt to limit the expenditure of the Government as to secondary roads solely, but limits it as to primary roads, these interstate national highways, as well; and it can not be done. It means that the whole plan of Congress in this legislation will fall.

There will be no incentive for a State to match, we will say, $12,500 against the Federal $12,500 in building a road from one side of the State to the other side, when the State highway commission and the Federal Highway Commission, for that matter, state that that $25,000 will not build the character of roads that should be built. The result is that the building will stop. The result is that the States will cease to cooperate. They will not put up their money; and remember that under the Federal highway act, after the road is once constructed, it must be forever maintained at the sole expense of the State. The State is not going to participate in building an unsubstantial road, because it will mean that it will have to rebuild that road every year, and the State is not going to do it.

The plan that the chairman of the Post Office Committee had of building Federal roads solely with Federal money would have been a far better proposition than this, because that would have resulted in building substantial national highways. The only objection to it was, as I remember, that the States complained that they would not have enough influence in the matter, not enough say with regard to it; but the Dunn bill can have only one purpose that I can see, and that is to result in the destruction of the Federal highways act.

I am satisfied that the committee of the House to which this bill was referred must have had the information in the possession of the Federal Highway Department of the Government. They must have had protests from the States similar to those that we are getting. It could not have been through ignorance that they imposed the limitation that I have read; and therefore the bill can have but one purpose, and that is this:

This bill emanates from the thickly settled States of the East and the New England States, where, fortunately for them, they have their roads already built. They never have wanted this Federal highway legislation. They fought it when it came up in 1916. They are fighting it now. They could not defeat it directly, and now, by virtue of this Dunn bill, they are attempting to defeat it indirectly.

I do not know what the attitude of the Post Office Committee is. I assume that possibly they have not had time to take up this bill; but I have prepared certain proposed amendments which I am going to offer, and ask to have referred to the committee simply as suggestions. I hope that these amendments may suggest something that will enable us to pass the bill in proper form, because I doubt very much if we can defeat it; but that will come later. With the appropriation that the Post Office Committee has already made in the form of an amendment to the Post Office appropriation bill, and which is now pending in conference, the roads are taken care of. The Dunn bill is not necessary for the purpose of taking care of the roads. As the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] stated, the Dunn bill is not an appropriation bill. It is a bill simply to limit the use of money that may be appropriated by Congress for those purposes.

I shall not take up any more of the time of the Senate. I have accomplished my purpose; and instead of taking the time to read these communications, which come from the State highway commission of my State, from the State engineer of the State, and from the road societies, I will ask unanimous consent that these communications, together with the amendments that I intend to propose, shall be printed in the RECORD and that the amendments and the communications shall go to the committee for the purpose I have stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The proposed amendments are as follows:

Amendments intended to be proposed by Mr. PITTMAN to the bill (H. R. 11131) to authorize the appropriation of additional sums for Federal aid in the construction of rural post roads, and for other purposes:

On page 4, lines 8 to 16, inclusive, strike out the last proviso of section 5 and insert the following:

"Provided further, That the limitation of payments herein provided shall not apply to those public-land States containing unappropriated public lands exceeding 50 per cent of the total area of all the lands in the State."

On page 4, lines 8 to 16, inclusive, strike out the last proviso of section 5 and insert the following:

"Provided further, That the limitation of payments herein provided shall not apply to the 7 per cent of the total highway mileage of a State which shall be selected or designated as a system of highways as required in section 6 of an act entitled 'An act to amend the act entitled "An act to provide that the United States shall aid the States in the construction of rural post roads, and for other purposes," approved July 11, 1916, as amended and supplemented, and for other purposes,' approved November 9, 1921; and that the limitation of payments herein provided shall apply to other systems of highways which shall be selected or designated under said act except that said limitation is hereby increased in appropriation to the increased percentage of Federal aid authorized by section 11 of the act entitled 'An act to amend the act entitled "An act to provide that the United States shall aid the States in the construction of rural post roads, and for other purposes," ' approved November 9, 1921."

On page 4, lines 8 to 16, inclusive, strike out the last proviso of section 5, and insert the following:

"Provided further, That the limitation of payments herein provided shall not apply to the primary or interstate mileage of a State which shall be selected or designated as a system of highways, as required in section 6 of an act entitled 'An act to amend the act entitled "An act to provide that the United States shall aid the States in the construction of rural post roads, and for other purposes," approved July 11, 1916, as amended and supplemented, and for other purposes,' approved November 9, 1921; and that the limitation of payments herein provided shall apply to other systems of highways which shall be selected or designated under said act except that said limitation is hereby increased in proportion to the increased percentage of Federal aid authorized by section 11 of the act entitled 'An act to amend the act entitled "An act to provide that the United States shall aid the States in the construction of rural post roads, and for other purposes," ' approved November 9, 1921."

The communications referred to are as follows:

CARSON CITY, NEV., April 15, 1922.

S. S. ARENTZ, KEY PITTMAN, T. L. ODDIE,
Washington, D. C.:

In order that you may be advised of our position on House bill 11131, introduced April 3 by Chairman Dunn, of roads committee, which, in section 5, reduces Federal road participation to $12,500 per mile, and after June 30, 1923, to $10,000 per mile, will state that Nevada's Federal participation as a public-land State would be reduced by first $13,000 per mile and then by $17,400 per mile. The passage of this bill as now written would mean serious loss to this State for two reasons: First, reduced ratio per mile would prevent State from securing all Federal aid allotted due to lack of sufficient State and county funds; and, second, would prevent construction of any type of road except gravel or grading costing less than twenty to twenty-five thousand per mile. Will you please urge upon members of committee importance of Federal participation as at present? Please wire us present status of this bill. We are in favor of Senate amendment attached to post office bill. We would also suggest inclusion of an amendment providing $10,000,000 for improvement of roads wholly or partly within the national parks.

GEO. W. BORDEN.

STATE OF NEVADA, DEPARTMENT OF HIGHWAYS,
Carson City, Nev., April 18, 1922.

To highway departments of 10 Western States and Nebraska, North and South Dakota:

We desire to call your attention to a certain bill now pending in Congress making an entire change in the method of handling Federal aid, and to enlist your support in the defeat of same, providing you have not already taken such steps.

This bill, H. R. 11131, was introduced as the bill of the Roads Committee of the House by Chairman DUNN, of that committee, on April 3, 1922. In order that you may thoroughly familiarize yourself with the provisions of the bill, as compared to the present Federal aid law, approved November 9, 1921, I am inclosing herewith a complete copy of same.

Your attention is particularly called to sections 4 and 5, which, if enacted into law in their present form, will entirely upset the present procedure in the handling of Federal aid and will seriously handicap the work in the Western States. Section 4 contains a provision relating to failure to place under contract any approved project within one year after such approval, and no doubt will in your State, as it will in the State of Nevada, seriously hamper proposed work which can not be taken up in certain cases because of lack of local funds which must be allowed to accumulate over a period of two or three years in order to finance particular projects.

Section 5 reduces the limitation of Federal aid to $12,500 per mile, beginning with the fiscal year 1923, and to $10,000 per mile thereafter, and it also defines the term rural post roads, as used in section 2 of the original Federal aid act, which definition is entirely left out of the present Federal aid bill providing for the 7 per cent Federal aid highway system, so that if this bill is passed we will have this condition: First, a conflicting of definition of Federal aid roads, whether it shall be a rural post road or whether it shall be a 7 per cent system road; second, a limitation per mile which will prevent the construction in the poorer States, who are dependent largely on Federal aid, of anything except a lower type of road, such as gravel or grading only. The application of the graduated scale provision in section 5 will be the same as in the present bill and will raise the participation of the public-land States in the same proportion as under the present law, except that it will be based on the limitation of $25,000 per mile and $20,000 per mile, respectively.

The passage of the present Federal aid law was secured only after a very long and strenuous fight in Congress, and if the Dunn bill should now be passed it will place us back almost to where we began in 1916. We, for one, feel that the present law is a real forward step in national road legislation and we are going to use our utmost endeavors to defeat passage of the Dunn bill, and inasmuch as conditions in your State are more or less similar to the conditions in the State of Nevada, we are asking that you give us your heartiest support in this matter.

The status of the matter in Congress is at present as follows:

The Senate Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads attached a rider to the Post Office appropriation bill allotting $190,000,000 additional Federal aid for the 7 per cent system and $15,000,000 for national forest roads. This bill passed the Senate on March 20, passed the House at a later date, and is now in conference. The Dunn bill was introduced in the House on April 3 and is now No. 335 on Union Calendar and may come before the House any day. If passed by the House it goes to the Senate and will probably go then into conference. We believe the best interests of the Western States can be served by the Post Office bill and leaving the present Federal aid law untampered with for two or three years until the States can demonstrate what can be done under its provisions.

We would suggest that you take the matter up with the governor of your State and wire your Representatives and Senators in Washington at once, giving them your attitude on these bills, and lending your heartiest support to the defeat of the Dunn bill.

Please keep us advised of such action as you see fit to take.

Yours very truly,

GEO. W. BORDEN,
State Highway Engineer.

STATE OF IDAHO,
DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS,
Boise, April 11, 1922.

Mr. GEORGE W. BORDEN,
State Highway Engineer, Carson City, Nev.

MY DEAR MR. BORDEN: I am just in receipt of a letter from W. C. Markham, legislative representative of the American Association of State Highway Officials, in which he states that section 2 of House bill 11131 provides $6,500,000 for the year 1924 for forest roads and trails. He also states that he had secured the wording in the Woodruff bill and in the Robinson bill by which this appropriation and appropriations made heretofore would be expended on roads through the forests and adjacent thereto, taking into consideration the roads of interstate and intercounty importance. This would simply mean to clarify the old law, but Congressman SUMMERS told the committee that he represented those who were conversant with the work and objected to the wording.

There is no question in my mind but what this is of great importance to your State, as you have the largest forest area of any of the Western States, and I thought possibly you might be able to get in touch with the proper people to take the matter up with your congressional delegation, especially Senator PHIPPS, who no doubt would have considerable influence with Congressman SUMMERS and other members of the House Roads Committee. It appears to me that this is of sufficient importance to warrant immediate action on our part, especially in view of the attitude taken by the forest department to define the policies pertaining to the forest highway funds made available by Senate bill 1072, and therefore any pressure which can be brought to bear upon Congressman SUMMERS should be started at once.

The portion of the present bill which I believe will be of vital interest to your State, probably more than the forest section, is section 5 of the act which provides that Federal participation after June 30, 1923, is not to exceed $12,500 per mile, exclusive of the cost of bridges of more than 20 feet clear span, provided further that the payments which the section shall make from sums appropriated under the provisions of this act or any act amendatory thereof after the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, shall not exceed $10,000 per mile, exclusive of the cost of bridges of more than 20 feet of clear span. The same act also provides that the limitations of payments shall apply to public-land States except that the same is hereby increased to the proportion of the increased percentage of Federal aid authorized by the last bill, Senate bill 1072. Apparently Congressman DUNN, who presented the present bill in the House, is under the impression that the cost per mile to the Federal Government should be reduced to $7,500 a mile, and, as I understand it, he took this matter up with the President on the theory that they were coming back to pre-war prices.

I do not believe Mr. DUNN realizes the importance to the Western States of Federal cooperation in the construction of our interstate highways, and that we should do everything possible to inform our congressional delegation as to the importance of the $20,000 per mile Federal cooperation, and that under no circumstances should this amount be reduced, especially in view of the standards which have been adopted by the bureau. Speaking for the State of Idaho, we will be unable to cooperate on Federal post aid roads to any material extent if we have to maintain the standards adopted by the bureau and only receive from $7,500 to $12,500 per mile cooperation.

Yours very truly,

D. P. OLSON, Director of Highways.

CARSON CITY, NEV., April 19, 1922.

Hon. KEY PITTMAN,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.:

Your wire 17th reference Dunn bill: Ninety per cent of Nevada Federal aid expenditures goes on trans-State, in fact transcontinental, roads. To improve these roads to standard being required by Government costs more per mile than proposed limitation, and additional cost is too great for this State to bear. This reduction will also prevent construction of anything except gravel and graded roads, and our experience of past four years demonstrates these types inadequate here, due to climatic conditions. We must build concrete, oiled macadam, or some type that can withstand long, dry seasons. We are not building short, expensive types, except where traffic warrants, and even these are parts of main transcontinental roads. State can not bear additional cost above Federal aid to build types of roads required should Dunn bill pass.

CARSON CITY, NEV., April 26, 1922.

Hon. KEY PITTMAN,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.:

Your wire 25th: Highways on the primary system in Nevada can not be constructed to standard required by the Federal Government for less than eighteen to thirty thousand per mile when gravel type; twenty to thirty-five thousand, of oiled macadam or similar types; and thirty-five to fifty thousand dollars per mile of concrete, the cost on each class varying with the surface width demanded. Government demands all primary highways shall be surfaced 18 feet and 24-foot grade; secondary highways width and type deemed advisable, which is usually beyond the costs warranted by present conditions. Maintenance burden on all these highways must be assumed by the State and our experience has shown maintenance costs on gravel highways run from five hundred to two thousand dollars per mile per year, due to dry climatic conditions. Construction of better type of highway in beginning results in lowered maintenance cost, and the economic life of the paved highway is three to ten times greater than the gravel type, which, under the very best maintenance, must be rebuilt within three to seven years. Our experience has proven the economic waste of gravel roads, and our policy now is to construct grade, provide proper drainage, and as finances will permit surface with more permanent types. Even grading and drainage under Government standards runs from ten to twenty thousand dollars per mile when minimum curvature and maximum gradient are held within requirements. Under present law Federal aid can be used only on 7 per cent system, except small sums left over from prior allotments. To except this system from the bill, we believe, would make unnecessary the passage of any bill. We suggest as final compromise amendment that the primary system be excepted from Dunn bill, which would make new limitations apply only to secondary system.

VIRGINIA CITY, NEV., April 26, 1922.

Hon. KEY PITTMAN,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

Borden wiring you to-day, answering yours 25th. We appreciate your efforts in interest all the West. If Dunn bill is passed with present limitation of Federal aid it will most seriously affect not only Nevada but all of the public-land States, and in our case at least make it impossible for us to meet the Federal aid. The appropriation made by the Post Office bill in the Senate is the legislation we would like to see passed finally, rather than the Dunn bill. Best wishes.

JAMES M. LEONARD,
Chairman Nevada State Highway Department.

RENO CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Reno, Nev., April 28, 1922.

Hon. KEY PITTMAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR PITTMAN: At the last regular meeting of the board of directors of the Reno Chamber of Commerce, held Tuesday, April 25, the Dunn bill (H. R. 11131), which provides for reducing the maximum Federal participation in highway construction, was carefully considered. We have been informed of the very excellent work that you have performed in opposing this bill, but at the same time we are also anxious that you have our views in this matter. We therefore strongly urge you to strenuously oppose the Dunn bill.

With kindest regards, I am,

Most cordially yours,

CHAS. S. KNIGHT,
Managing Director.

THE TARIFF.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7456) to provide revenue, to regulate commerce with foreign countries, to encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, certain amendments to the bill under consideration recommended by the Senate Committee on Finance, designated as sections 315, 316, and 317, propose to commit to the President of the United States extraordinary powers in consequence of the exercise of which the duties to which imports would otherwise become subject would undergo most material modification. I offer for the RECORD, as an appendix to my remarks, a copy of the amendments in question, which I venture to summarize as follows:

1. The President is authorized to increase or to decrease the duties fixed by the act to such an extent as will, as shown by investigation he is authorized to make, "equalize the differences in competition in trade in the markets of the United States" as between domestic and foreign products, on finding upon such investigation that the duties so fixed by the act do not attain that result; or he may, finding that such duties are so ineffectual to the same end, change the "classifications or forms of duty" provided by the act, no change in the rate either up or down to exceed 50 per cent.

2. He may substitute the American valuation plan, provided for in the bill as it came from the House, for the foreign valuation plan indorsed by the Senate committee as to any class or kind of merchandise upon finding that "an industry in the United States is being or is likely to be materially injured" by importations, and that the foreign valuation plan "is not a certain basis for the assessment of the particular duties" applicable to such merchandise, the same, on the valuation so determined, to bear an ad valorem rate, found to be shown by the "difference in conditions of competition of trade in the markets of the United States" to be necessary to "equalize" such differences, such rate not to vary either way more than 50 per cent from that fixed by the act.

3. He may continue in force the embargo on coal-tar products, imposed by the dye and chemical act of 1921, on finding that the rates provided for in the act or imposed under the authority given to the President as above recited do not "equalize" the "differences in competition in trade in the markets of the United States" as to any article subject to the provisions of the embargo act.

4. He is authorized to inquire into unfair methods of competition and unfair acts on the part of any owner, importer, consignee, or agent of either, in respect to either the importation of any merchandise or the sale of such as is imported, "the effect or tendency of which is to destroy or substantially injure an industry or to restrain or monopolize trade and commerce in the United States," utilizing for such inquiry any existing agency of Government, and finding such method to exist, or acts to have been committed, to impose such an additional duty, not to exceed 50 per cent of that fixed by the bill, as will "offset such methods or acts," or, "in extreme cases," he may direct that "as he shall deem the best interests of the United States shall require" such merchandise "shall be excluded from entry," such direction to have the force of law.

5. The methods and acts referred to being denounced as unlawful, "whenever the President shall find as a fact that any merchandise is offered or sought to be offered for entry into the United States in violation of this section, but has not sufficient evidence to satisfy him thereof, the Secretary of the Treasury shall, upon his request in writing, forbid entry thereof" until such investigation as the President may deem necessary shall be completed. (Note that the power here conferred may be exercised when the President "finds" the condition to exist, but has not information sufficient to "satisfy" him of the fact.)

6. He may impose additional duties, not exceeding 50 per cent ad valorem, on merchandise imported from any country which, with respect to the disposition in or transportation through or reexportation from such country, imposes upon merchandise, being the product of the United States, any charge or burden, or subjects it to any restriction not equally borne by the products of any other country foreign to the offending country, or which places the United States at a disadvantage compared with the commerce of any foreign country, the amount of such additional duties being such as shall be determined by him "to be equivalent to such burdens."

7. If a foreign country, after any such additional duties shall have been proclaimed by the President, shall maintain or increase its discrimination against the commerce of the United States, he may, if he deems it consistent with the interests of the United States, proclaim an embargo against importations from such country into the United States.

8. Any such increase of duties or embargo shall extend to the whole of any foreign country or to a part thereof only as the President shall deem "the public interests require."

9. He may impose new or additional duties upon merchandise imported from any country which unduly or unfairly discriminates against the United States through any export duty or bounty, on production or exportation, or rebate of duties or other preferential allowance, such duties to be in an amount equivalent to the burdens ensuing from such discrimination.

It will occur to anyone conversant with our system of government, and the limitations imposed by the Constitution upon the different branches thereof, that the validity of legislation such as that proposed is, to say the least, open to grave doubt.

Mr. POMERENE. May I offer a suggestion there?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. The changes which are authorized to be made by the President can continue just as long as he sees fit to continue them.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. So the bill provides. The majority of the committee from which the proposals come evidently believed that misgivings would be aroused concerning them, which they endeavored to allay by the following brief paragraph in their report, namely:

> These elastic tariff provisions are regarded by the committee as undoubtedly constitutional. (Field v. Clark, 143 U. S. 649.)

It will be shown presently that Field v. Clark affords no justification whatever for the departure proposed; in fact, that if the argument of the opinion in that case is to be followed the provisions under review must be unhesitatingly condemned as violative of the Constitution.

I am not unmindful of the futility of argument in this body founded upon the limitations imposed by our fundamental law, of which recent events have afforded some added evidence, nor of the indifference with which the contention of those opposed on other grounds to legislation before the Congress, that it is unconstitutional, is regarded. Nevertheless, the obligation rests upon every Senator to reconcile his vote if he can with the oath he has taken to uphold the Constitution, and, accordingly, upon a Member whose studies have impelled him to the belief that any pending measure is violative of it to make clear the reasons which have influenced the conclusion at which he has arrived.

The Constitution in express terms vests all legislative power granted by it in Congress. (Art. I, sec. 1.) Specifically it grants to Congress power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises, and to regulate commerce with foreign nations. These powers, by repeated adjudications and according to the views of all commentators, are exclusive. They can not be delegated. The rule is expressed by Cooley in the following vigorous paragraph:

> One of the settled maxims in constitutional law is, that the power conferred upon the legislature to make laws can not be delegated by that department to any other body or authority. Where the sovereign power of the State has located the authority, there it must remain; and by the constitutional agency alone the laws must be made until the Constitution itself is changed. The power to whose judgment, wisdom, and patriotism this high prerogative has been intrusted can not relieve itself of the responsibility by choosing other agencies upon which the power shall be devolved, nor can it substitute the judgment, wisdom, and patriotism of any other body for those to which alone the people have seen fit to confide this sovereign trust. (Constitutional Limitations, 163.)

The principle is older than American constitutional law and not peculiar to our institutions, having been announced by Locke in his work on Civil Government thus:

> The legislature neither must nor can transfer the power of making laws to anybody else, or place it anywhere but where the people have. (Locke on Civil Government, sec. 142.)

It is peculiarly applicable to the taxing power, the struggle to keep it unimpaired in the hands of the elected representatives of the people, as against attempts to exercise it by or to transfer it to the Executive being, as is well known, intimately associated with the development of English liberty. The jealousy touching the exercise of the taxing power engendered by that historic struggle is reflected in that provision of the Constitution which requires that all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives.

The learned author first mentioned in another work says:

> It is a general rule of constitutional law that a sovereign power conferred by the people upon any one branch or department of the Government is not to be delegated by that branch or department to any other.
>
> This is a principle which pervades our whole political system, and, when properly understood, admits of no exception. And it is applicable with peculiar force to the case of taxation. The power to tax is a legislative power. The people have created a legislative department for the exercise of the legislative power; and within that power lies the authority to prescribe the rules of taxation, and to regulate the manner in which those rules shall be given effect. The people have not authorized this department to relieve itself of the responsibility by a substitution of other agencies. (I Cooley on Taxation, 99–100.)

Another able writer on the same subject says:

> Legislative power is a trust for the whole people which the legislature can not transfer. The best safeguard of equality in taxation as well as in other subjects of governmental action is in the responsibility of the legislature to the people. So long as the power of taxation is directly exercised by the popular representatives, each section having its representative, the burden is far more likely to be distributed evenly among the people than if the power is exercised by some person or body not directly responsible to the whole people or perhaps not chosen by them. (Gray on Limitation of the Taxing Power, 532.)

It is in the application of the principle thus announced that differences of opinion arise. I shall not enter into any general discussion of the subject of the delegation of power by legislative bodies, a topic upon which much learning has been expended, and with which judges have been called upon in multitudinous cases to deal in more recent times, in consequence of legislation rendered necessary by the increasing complexity of the social organization and the extension of governmental activities.

It will be quite unnecessary, for instance, to consider the question of the authority of the legislature to repose in municipal corporations or other subordinate governmental agencies powers legislative in their character in respect to local affairs or to inquire into the validity of acts to become effective only when approved by the voters of the State or some subdivision thereof, there being no constitutional referendum. It will be sufficient for the present purpose to canvass those adjudications and discussions which afford a basis for some rule by which to test the attempt to delegate the extensive powers which, by the proposed amendments, would be conferred upon the President, legislation for which, it is ventured, no precedent can be found in our history.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STERLING in the chair). Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I remind the Senator, in this connection, that the British Parliament would never for a moment consider a proposition to vest the King with any such powers as are proposed to be conferred upon the President by this bill; nor would the French Chamber consider such a proposition, if it were proposed by the President of France; nor did the German Reichstag ever vest the kaiser with any such power.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. As Field against Clark is not only relied upon by the proponents of the plan represented by the amendments but is a leading case on the general subject, our study may well begin with a consideration of its facts, its reasoning, and its conclusion.

It was an attack on the McKinley law of 1890 because of what were known as its reciprocity features. By the act sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides were placed on the free list. It was then provided that if at any time the President should be satisfied that the government of any country producing and exporting any of such commodities imposes duties or other exactions affecting the introduction into the same of any products of the United States deemed by him to be, in view of the admission of such commodities to our ports free, unequal or unreasonable, he might proclaim the fact, and that in such case such commodities should pay duties as provided in the act: Sugar, 2 cents per pound for the highest grade and a lesser amount for the lower grades, the rate being specifically named; coffee, 3 cents a pound; tea, 10 cents; and hides, 1½ cents. The importations giving rise to the action in Field against Clark involved none of the commodities made the subject of the specific provisions of the act to which reference has been made, but it was maintained that because of them the entire law was void and consequently the goods which gave rise to the controversy were not subject to its provisions.

The court held that there was in the law no unlawful delegation of the legislative authority vested by the Constitution in Congress; that it simply clothed the President with the authority to ascertain and proclaim a fact, namely, that some country exporting any of the specified commodities was imposing duties on or making exactions with respect to the products of the United States which he deemed unequal or unreasonable in view of the concession accorded by our Government in respect to theirs. It was clearly pointed out and importance was attached to the fact, if indeed it was not deemed a vital feature, that the President had absolutely nothing to do with fixing the rate of duty which the commodities with which the specific provisions of the act dealt should bear in the event that they were not to be admitted free, that the rate had been explicitly prescribed by Congress and went into effect automatically upon the issuance of his proclamation reciting the unequal or unreasonable exactions of the country against which it was directed. Nothing whatever was left to his discretion, either within or without limits. The following paragraph from the opinion of the court fully discloses the ground on which its judgment went:

That Congress can not delegate legislative power to the President is a principle universally recognized as vital to the integrity and maintenance of the system of government ordained by the Constitution. The act of October 1, 1890, in the particular under consideration is not inconsistent with that principle. It does not in any real sense invest the President with the power of legislation. For the purpose of securing reciprocal trade with countries producing and exporting sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides Congress itself determined that the provisions of the act of October 1, 1890, permitting the free introduction of such articles, should be suspended as to any country producing and exporting them that imposed exactions and duties on the agricultural and other products of the United States which the President deemed—that is, which he found to be—reciprocally unequal and unreasonable. Congress itself prescribed in advance the duties to be levied, collected, and paid on sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, or hides produced by or exported from such designated country while the suspension lasted. Nothing involving the expediency or the just operation of such legislation was left to the determination of the President. The words "he may deem" in the third section of course implied that the President would examine the commercial regulations of other countries producing and exporting sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides and form a judgment as to whether they were reciprocally equal and reasonable or the contrary in their effect upon American products. But when he ascertained the fact that duties and exactions reciprocally unequal and unreasonable were imposed upon the agricultural or other products of the United States by a country producing and exporting sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, or hides it became his duty to issue a proclamation declaring the suspension as to that country, which Congress had determined should occur. He had no discretion in the premises except in respect to the duration of the suspension so ordered. But that related only to the enforcement of the policy established by Congress. As the suspension was absolutely required when the President ascertained the existence of a particular fact, it can not be said that in ascertaining that fact and in issuing his proclamation in obedience to the legislative will he exercised the function of making laws. Legislative power was exercised when Congress declared that the suspension should take effect upon a named contingency. What the President was required to do was simply in execution of the act of Congress. It was not the making of law. He was the mere agent of the law-making department to ascertain and declare the event upon which its expressed will was to take effect. It was a part of the law itself as it left the hands of Congress that the provisions, full and complete in themselves, permitting the free introduction of sugars, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides from particular countries should be suspended in a given contingency, and that in case of such suspensions certain duties should be imposed.

To enforce the argument thus advanced the court continued:

"The true distinction," as Judge Ranney, speaking for the Supreme Court of Ohio, has well said, "as between the delegation of power to make the law, which necessarily involves a discretion as to what it shall be, and conferring authority or discretion as to its execution, to be exercised under and in pursuance of the law. The first can not be done; to the latter no valid objection can be made. (P. 693–694.)

And then quoted from Locke's Appeal (72 Pa. St. 491, 498):

The legislature can not delegate its power to make a law; but it can make a law to delegate a power to determine some fact or state of things upon which the law makes, or intends to make, its own action depend.

That is to say, a law may be enacted to go into effect at some time in the future, upon the happening of some contingency or upon the determination by some officer of the existence of a fact or state of things, but the law must otherwise be complete as it leaves the hands of the legislators. (6 Am. and Eng. Ency. of Law, 1023–1031.)

On this point the Supreme Court of Wisconsin in Dowling v. Lancashire Insurance Co. (92 Wis. 63) says:

The result of all the cases on this subject is that a law must be complete, in all its terms and provisions, when it leaves the legislative branch of the government, and nothing must be left to the judgment of the electors or other appointee or delegate of the legislature, so that, in form and substance, it is a law, in all its details, in praesenti, but which may be left to take effect in futuro, if necessary, upon the ascertainment of any prescribed fact or event.

So, while Field against Clark might afford justification for the amendments in question if they prescribed what the rates should be, when the President finds those fixed in the bill or any of them do not effect the equalization which it is inferred is the policy sought to be established, it is evident and must be conceded that some other authority must be found to sustain the grant of power to the President, in the contingency mentioned, to fix the rates. In that predicament the authority of Field against Clark must be supplemented, if this legislation is sustained, by some different line of reasoning from that pursued in that case or by some adjudication more nearly meeting the conditions.

It is not without significance in this connection that among the vast multitude of cases dealing with the subject of the delegation of legislative power few, if any, can be found in which the delegation of the taxing power was involved, the legislatures apparently recognizing, instinctively or otherwise, that it could not be delegated or that a well-nigh universal conviction prevails that it is unwise to do so.

Appeal may reasonably be made to those decisions sustaining the grant of authority to the Interstate Commerce Commission to establish rates for the transportation of freight and passengers and to statutes granting like authority to officials, boards, or commissions to fix rates that may be charged by public service corporations.

It is impossible to escape the conclusion that the courts were influenced in sustaining such statutes and many others challenged as delegating legislative power by two considerations, namely, necessity and well-established legislative practice. And it is not an unwarranted inference that the framers of our Constitution, by declaring that all legislative powers are vested in the lawmaking body, did not intend to deny to them authority to repose in local municipalities the authority to enact ordinances, seeing that time out of mind charters embodying the principle of local self-government were freely granted. Nor is it unreasonable to conclude that it was not intended that matters of detail, really administrative in character, which might be provided for directly by legislative act, were it practicable to do so, but which experience has shown, or which from their nature it is clear that it is not, could not be delegated to boards or officers. Doubtless it is within the power of the legislature to establish rates for the transportation by rail of freight or passengers. Such action has often been taken with reference to passenger rates, and in the early history of railroading attempts were made, by direct legislative action, to establish freight rates; but the effort was soon abandoned, simply because the problem was too intricate, the solution of it in that manner requiring time which could not be given to it and such attention to an infinity of detail, much of it technical, as a legislative body was wholly unfit to give. Out of such conditions the idea of establishing by law a general rule governing railroad rates and reposing in a commission the duty of fixing specific rates in conformity with that rule was evolved. Indeed, the law, even the common law, had already established the rule that the charges of a common carrier, and perhaps of anyone prosecuting a business affected with a public use, must be reasonable, and a right of action arose in favor of any one of whom an excessive charge had been exacted to recover so much as he had paid above a reasonable amount. The rule thus sanctioned, being declared by the statute, the duty was devolved upon the commission of determining in each case what is a reasonable rate, the law in effect declaring that it should go into effect when thus determined and proclaimed by the commission.

In Wayman v. Southard (10 Wheat. 42) the Supreme Court said:

It will not be contended that Congress can delegate to the courts, or to any other tribunals, powers which are strictly and exclusively legislative. But Congress may certainly delegate to others powers which the legislature may rightfully exercise itself.

* * * * * * *

The line has not been exactly drawn which separates those important subjects, which must be entirely regulated by the legislature itself, from those of less interest, in which a general provision may be made, and power given to those who are to act under such general provisions to fill up the details.

This language was quoted in United States v. Grimaud (220 U. S. 506–517), in which was upheld a statute authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to make rules concerning the use and occupancy of the forest reserves and making criminal the violation of such rules, the particular offense charged being the grazing of sheep within the reserve without permission of the department and in violation of the rules. The views of the court are to be gathered from the following from the opinion:

To pasture sheep and cattle on the reservation at will and without restraint might interfere seriously with the accomplishment of the purposes for which they were established. But a limited and regulated use for pasturage might not be inconsistent with the object sought to be attained by the statute. The determination of such questions, however, was a matter of administrative detail. What might be harmless in one forest might me harmful to another. What might be injurious at one stage of timber growth or at one season of the year might not be so at another.

In the nature of things it was impracticable for Congress to provide general regulations for these various and varying details of management. Each reservation had its peculiar and special features, and in authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to meet these local conditions Congress was merely conferring administrative functions upon an agent, and not delegating to him legislative power. (220 U. S. p. 516.)

Attention is directed to the remark that it was impracticable for Congress to make the necessary provision, so varying were the conditions with which it would be required to deal.

In Buttfield v. Stranahan (192 U. S. 470), the court said:

To deny the power to Congress to delegate such a duty (to fix tea standards) would in effect amount to declaring that the plenary power vested in Congress to regulate foreign commerce could not be efficaciously exerted.

The necessity for legislation of the character before the court that the power to regulate foreign commerce might be efficaciously exerted warranted, in its opinion, the conclusion that the authority to enact it had not been withheld. In the same opinion the court said:

> Congress legislated on the subject as far as was reasonably practicable and from the necessities of the case was compelled to leave to executive officials the duty of bringing about the result pointed out by the statute.

The same idea of the necessity of the delegation is a dominant note in State v. Atlantic Coast Line Ry. (56 Fla. 617, 32 L. R. A. (N. S.) 639); State v. Pub. Serv. Corp. (Mo.) (194 S. W. 287); and State v. Briggs (Oreg.) (77 Pac. 750), all comparatively recent cases dealing with the delegation of functions which might be exercised by the legislature to administrative boards or officers.

In the case first above cited, in which the validity of a statute giving extensive powers to a railroad commission was considered, is found a particularly well-reasoned opinion supported by a wealth of legal learning, from which the following is quoted:

> The Constitution should be interpreted so as not to render impotent or inoperative, but to preserve and make effective, the sovereign power of the State to regulate intrastate transportation by common carriers; * * *
> The legislature may not delegate the power to enact a law, or to declare what the law shall be, or to exercise an unrestricted discretion in applying a law; but it may enact a law, complete in itself, designed to accomplish a general public purpose, and may expressly authorize designated officials within definite valid limitations to provide rules and regulations for the complete operation and enforcement of the law within its expressed general purpose. This principle of law is peculiarly applicable in the regulation of common carriers. The complex and ever-changing conditions that attend or affect the performance of the useful public service rendered by common carriers make it impracticable for the legislature to prescribe all the necessary rules and regulations.

Note that the impracticability of dealing with the problem otherwise is stressed.

The same idea is elaborated in the Missouri case cited, from the opinion in which the following is taken:

> He reads the cases in vain who does not concede the authority of the legislature, absent an express constitutional provision which forbids, to delegate to an administrative body the power to fix rates for the carriage of freight and passengers. In practice no more fair and feasible plan can be devised than to delegate this difficult and most technical duty to a board which is perpetually in session and furnished with skilled accountants and experts. The situation as to common carriers changes from year to year, sometimes even from month to month. A fixed hard-and-fast rate made one year might be almost confiscatory next year, or, conversely, the rate fixed might become far greater than the service rendered is worth. No legislature has the time nor is it equipped with the machinery necessary to investigate matters of rate making in any manner which will serve to prevent its enactment of laws fixing alleged "reasonable maximum rates" from being other than a mere guess. That often it may guess right can not serve as an apology for the multitude of cases wherein its conceded good intentions may not save it from guessing wrong. In the very nature of things a right guess would be accidental. If the fixing of rates is to proceed intelligently along lines of fairness and justness to all concerned—to capital and labor, passenger and shipper—having due regard to the constant mutations in the cost of labor and materials; to the differences in density of population and therefore in number of passengers and amount of freight; to cost of building and operation and maintenance of the roads in the more level and populous parts of the State as compared to similar overhead costs in the rough and mountainous and sparsely settled parts; to bringing about a condition which will encourage, or even permit, areas not now served but needing service to be served by new roads yet to be built; and to periods of great commercial prosperity as compared to periods of commercial depression, it is manifest that the matter must be committed to somebody having greater flexibility in procedure, having more time for investigation, and having at hand more expert machinery to the end in view than any earthly legislature possesses (pp. 291–292).

Neither cardinal requisite, long-established usage antedating the adoption of the Constitution, nor necessity arising from the impracticability of direct legislation by Congress attend the proposed legislation. It is a departure from the settled practice of the Government since its beginning without a precedent to sustain it, the McKinley Act considered in Field against Clark differing radically from the proposed amendment, as has heretofore been shown. It can not be contended that it is impracticable for Congress to fix the duties which imports are to bear, as it has been doing so from the time it came into being, and in the very bill before us it proposes to do it again, the House offering one set of rates, the Senate very largely another, subject, however, to the provisions which give occasion to these remarks, implying that, in the opinion of the Senate, the President can or may do the job more justly or more efficaciously.

However sound that view, namely, that the Executive is more competent than the legislative branch to determine what taxes should be imposed, it is one which for obvious reasons has found little support in public opinion in America and none at all in American constitutions.

Another characteristic which attends the work of administrative officers charged with duties which might be exercised directly by the legislature is that it is always subject to judicial review, the rates fixed or the rules promulgated must be reasonable, and if they are not they will, in appropriate proceedings, be held void. Even municipal ordinances are open to attack on the ground that they are not reasonable. The principle is recognized in the following paragraph from the opinion of Judge Whitfield in the Florida case, to which reference has heretofore been made, to wit:

> In a number of well-considered cases it has been distinctly held that where a valid statute, complete in itself, enacts the general outlines of a governmental scheme or policy or purpose and confers upon officials charged with the duty of assisting in administering the law authority to make, within designated limitations and subject to judicial review, rules and regulations, or to ascertain facts upon which the statute by its own terms operates in carrying out the legislative purpose, such authority is not an unconstitutional delegation of legislative power. (Pp. 649–650.)

An able address on the general subject of the delegation of legislative power delivered before the Bar Association of the State of Wisconsin by Hon. William H. Timlin, at the time an associate justice of the supreme court of that State, a lawyer of great talent and learning, concludes with the following, expressing his deductions from a comprehensive review of the adjudications:

> I should say in conclusion that whether or not a statute is invalid, because of an unconstitutional delegation of legislative power, depends upon the extent to which the power usually exercised by the legislature in making laws is attempted to be delegated; that delegation to a greater extent is permissible where without such delegation it is impossible to make the statute effectual for the exercise of legislative power otherwise clearly constitutional; that the validity of such a statute does not depend upon the conventional or the legal name of that fraction of legislative power delegated, nor upon its intrinsic nature, but rather upon the necessity for such delegation, and the existence of a general rule of statute law covering the subject in general terms, and of which rule the delegated power is an aid or adjunct; and also that the delegated power be limited either locally or to a particular subject matter, as, for instance, the regulation of a specified corporation, department, or bureau; and that the delegated power when exercised be of a lesser degree of conclusiveness than a statute; that is to say, subject to judicial review as to its reasonableness, fairness, and impartiality.

Reference is made to his comment in this connection because of his concluding sentence thereof on the necessity that the action of the delegate be subject to judicial review, but attention is directed in passing to the importance attached to the fact that the power has or has not been customarily exercised directly by the legislature, and to the necessity for the delegation arising from the impracticability of dealing effectually with the conditions by direct legislative action.

So essential is the feature of redress in the courts in case of arbitrary action, that provision is ordinarily made in the statutes conferring such powers upon commissions for a review of its action by some judicial tribunal. The interstate commerce act, the Federal Trade Commission act, and the stockyards act are familiar examples.

In the amendment before us such provision is made with respect to the action of the President in determining that one has been guilty of unfair methods of competition in respect either to the importation of commodities or the sale of imported merchandise, but none with respect to any order he may make in establishing a punitive rate after such finding, nor has any provision been made for reviewing any order he may make establishing rates under the proposed amendments against unoffending importers.

In the case of rates fixed for services rendered or supplies furnished by public service corporations the rule is established that they are not reasonable unless they afford a fair return on the investment, the elements to be taken into consideration by the court being more or less accurately defined, including in the case of railroad property—> the original cost of construction, the amount expended in permanent improvements, the amount and market value of its bonds and stock, the present as compared with the original cost of construction, the probable earning capacity of the property under particular rates prescribed by statute, and the sum required to meet operating expenses. (Smyth v. Ames, 169 U. S. 466, 547–548.)

Any rate less than one which will afford a fair return for the use of the property is confiscatory, violative of the constitutional amendment declaring that no person shall be deprived of his property without due process of law. So an ordinance of a municipal corporation or a rule of an administrative officer or board which operates to deprive a person of any of his constitutional rights is unreasonable and void and must be so declared by the courts, to which he may appeal.

But the action of the President in establishing rates of duty under the system proposed by the amendments is not subject to review, however unreasonable and oppressive they may be, assuming that they are within the 50 per cent limit imposed by the law. It is in the nature of the taxing power that, being exercised within constitutional or statutory bounds, it is not open to judicial review, being political in character. It is for that reason, among others, that a commentator in a profound and exhaustive review of the subject of the delegation of legislative functions, appearing in the Yale Law Journal for May, 1918, in which he argues for the most liberal rule in that regard, asserts that while Congress must promulgate its policies as laws, "in the case of revenue laws they must be worked out in detail," though in all other cases it is the power that Congress must personally execute.

It will be conceded, no doubt, that the question being considered, namely, the power of Congress to make the delegation in question, is in no wise affected by the fact that the President can not increase or diminish the rates fixed by the bill by more than 50 per cent. If he may be authorized to increase them 50 per cent he may equally be empowered to effect an increase of 100 per cent, or 500 per cent, or 5,000 per cent, or to increase them at his discretion.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit a suggestion, it is true that, technically speaking, there can only be an increase or a decrease of 50 per cent; but, under another provision of the section which the Senator is so ably discussing it is within the power of the President to change the basis of levying duties from the foreign valuation to the American valuation, and very often there is as much as 100 per cent difference between the foreign valuation and the American valuation.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is true.

Nor in view of the fact that his action is not subject to judicial review is he restrained by the provision that the rates must be such as to equalize "the differences in conditions of competition in trade in the markets of the United States." It would be intolerable, even if the determination of the rate which ought to be imposed were not distinctly political in character and consequently not reviewable in the courts, to have them inquiring with respect to every rate fixed by the President whether it does, indeed, represent "the differences in conditions of competition in trade in the markets of the United States" and to be annulled if it does not, in the judgment of the court, which would, of course, have no power to fix another rate.

Obviously the proponents of the system represented by the amendments do not intend that the action of the President shall be subject to review. It is contemplated that his determination shall be final; it is in his judgment and in his discretion they propose to confide, not in those of the courts. And inasmuch as the power to be reposed in him is not open to judicial review, it can not be delegated.

Another difficulty confronts those attempting to justify this novel system of laying customs duties. The policy which is to find expression in the acts of the officer or board to which power to fix rates or establish rules is granted must be declared in the statute. It is to the judgment, wisdom, and patriotism of the lawmakers that the people have intrusted the formulation of policies to find expression in legislation. If authority to do anything the legislature might do is delegated, the thing to be done in the premises must be expressed in the statute. The officer can not be authorized to do one of two or more things as in his judgment the public interest will be best subserved. Consideration of what is for the public interest is for the legislature, not for administrative officers.

But under the amendments proposed the President may either (1) raise or lower the rates; (2) change the classification of the commodity—that is, transfer it from the dutiable list to the free, or the reverse, or from one schedule to another, or from one subdivision of one schedule to another, or, perhaps, from one paragraph to another; or (3) change the form of the duty, namely, the basis of computation, substituting a specific rate for an ad valorem rate, or vice versa. He is at liberty to take any one of three courses, his choice to be influenced presumably by his judgment as to which will best promote the public interests, or perhaps will offer the least difficulty in the way of administration, or quite likely which will most nearly equalize "the differences in conditions of competition in trade in the United States."

It seems to be recognized in the particular provision now considered that absolute equality is unattainable, a subject upon which more will be said later, and so additional elasticity is given to the proposed system by permitting the President to exercise a choice as to how best or most accurately to bring that about. The law, however, does not countenance vesting any such discretionary power in the Executive, and the attempt to do so is fatal to the system of which it is an integral part.

Many spirited debates have taken place in Congress since customs duties found a place in our fiscal system over the propriety of imposing specific or ad valorem duties in the case of particular commodities. It is renewed in connection with the preparation and passage of every tariff bill. It involves the adoption of a legislative policy, the exercise of legislative discretion, the responsibility for which Congress can not escape by transferring it to any body or official. The principle here involved is made clear by a reference to two cases decided by the Supreme Court of Wisconsin. In the first, In re Incorporation of Village of North Milwaukee (93 Wis. 616), a statute was held void which provided that if upon considering an application for the incorporation of certain territory as a village, accompanied by an authenticated census and a survey and map, the circuit court should be satisfied that the lands, or any part of them, should be included in the proposed village, and that the interest of the inhabitants would be promoted by such incorporation, it should make an order constituting the same a village. The court held that the determination of whether it was in the public interest that the village should be created being a legislative, not a judicial, question, could not be delegated to the judiciary. The law was afterwards amended so as to provide that if the court found the survey and census to be correct, and its requirements otherwise had been observed, leaving it no discretion to inquire whether the best interests of the community would be subserved, the order should be made, and as so amended was sustained in State v. Lammers (113 Wis. 398).

Willoughby, in the introduction to his comment on Field against Clark, comments on the fatal feature in any attempted delegation of authority which might be exercised by the legislature of authorizing discretionary action, the conditions being found to exist which warrant action. Reference is made to the following:

> The court can not delegate its power to make a law, but it can make a law to delegate a power to determine some fact or state of things upon which the law makes, or intends to make, its own action depend. To deny this would be to stop the wheels of Government. There are many things upon which wise and useful legislation must depend which can not be known to the lawmaking power, and must therefore be a subject of inquiry and determination outside of the halls of legislation.
> The doctrine thus declared is without objection so long as the facts which are to determine the executive acts are such as may be precisely stated by the legislature and certainly ascertained by the executive. When this is not so, the officer intrusted with the execution of the law is necessarily vested with an independent judgment as to when and how the law shall be executed; and when this independence of judgment is considerable there is ground for holding that the law is not simply one in presenti to take effect in futuro, but is a delegation by the lawmaking body of its legislative discretion (p. 1319).

This extract leads to the discussion of perhaps the most important consideration affecting the validity of the delegation attempted by the amendments in question.

It is agreed on all hands that to justify a delegation of power which might properly be exercised directly by the legislature, it is essential that the law lay down a clear rule for the guidance of the executive officer to which he must adhere in whatever action he may take. As expressed by Willoughby "the facts which are to determine the executive acts" must be "such as may be precisely stated by the legislature and certainly ascertained by the executive." The principle is peculiarly applicable in connection with the fixing of rates by an administrative agency.

An effort is made in the proposed legislation under review to meet the requirements of this rule. The President is called upon to determine whether the duties fixed in the act do or do not equalize "the differences in conditions of competition in trade" in the markets of the United States as between the foreign and the domestic products, much as he was required by the McKinley Act to determine whether any foreign Government affected by it imposed any unjust or unreasonable duties or other exactions upon the introduction of the products of the United States.

But for a most serious obscurity in the language defining what it is the President must find, to be presently noticed, the similarity in the acts would be, for all practical purposes, complete. But at that point their identity in principle ceases, for, as pointed out, the President, having issued his proclamation reciting unjust exactions, had no further duties under the McKinley Act. The statute declared the rates in that event. Under the proposed law the President's most important duties but begin when he finds the facts upon the existence of which a change in the rates ensues or may ensue.

The committee amendments, as stated, having authorized the President to act in the contingency referred to, repose in him the further authority to make such increases or decreases in the rate, or such changes in the form of the duty or classification of the commodity as may be necessary to "equalize" "the differences in conditions of competition in trade" in the markets of the United States, as between the domestic and the foreign product. Just what does that language mean? How accurate is the guide thus furnished? How shall anyone know whether it has or has not been followed?

It is widely maintained by the advocates of a protective tariff that the true principle upon which such a tariff should be framed is that the rates should be so fixed as that the duty will equal the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad. For many years well-meaning, intelligent, and patriotic men, wedded to the principle of protection, have advocated the creation of a tariff commission which should be authorized and directed to fix duties upon imports, so that there shall be paid upon their admission at our ports a sum equal to such difference in the cost of production. It has been eloquently urged that through such a commission, so empowered, the tariff would be taken out of politics.

A pamphlet advocating the extension of the powers of the present Tariff Commission, so as to clothe it with such powers, came in my mail a few days ago, and doubtless in that of every Senator. It was issued and circulated by an organization whose professed purpose is to secure an American Nonpartisan Scientific Tariff. Its views are to be gathered from the following brief extracts from the pamphlet, considering that the document explains that "production costs" applies to raw materials, "conversion costs" to manufactured articles:

> The American production and conversion costs are the only really scientific basis for fixing and levying protective duties for the United States. * * *
> Advocates of a so-called "fair tariff," or rates that will equalize the cost of production here and abroad, offer Congress no answer to the problem of how to fix a "fair" tariff (pp. 15, 7).

No one can misunderstand this language. The cost here and the cost abroad are the governing factors. The chairman of the Committee on Finance, being interrogated as to the principle upon which the rates in the pending bill were fixed and specifically to explain why acetic acid was taken from the free list and placed upon the dutiable list, said:

> Mr. President, the reason I can give for placing this particular item upon the dutiable list is the reason that permeates the bill throughout—it is to equalize the difference between what is supposed to be, as nearly as we can arrive at it, the cost of production abroad, including the cost of shipment into this country, and the cost of manufacturing in this country. (CONG. RECORD, April 25, p. 6464.)

It has been made to appear, as I think, in the debate thus far that while professing to have been guided by the rule thus asserted, the committee, in fact, made no investigation whatever, at least no investigation yielding any fruits, into the relative cost of production of the articles on the dutiable list in this country and abroad, but were guided in their action very largely, if not wholly, by the price in the domestic market and the price abroad. This will appear from the following colloquy appearing at the same page of the RECORD, viz:

> Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The truth is that the bill could not have been framed on the theory just announced by the Senator from North Dakota, because there was no attempt at any time to obtain evidence as to the cost of the production of the commodities in this country or elsewhere. I make that statement as a general proposition. There may be a few exceptions to it, but I submit that I have no recollection of a single witness bringing before the committee his cost sheets and submitting them to cross-examination.
>
> Mr. SMOOT. No, Mr. President; and that never has been the practice in the making of any tariff bill from the day the first one was made up to the present time. I will say to the Senator, however, that in making the bill there were members and experts of the Tariff Commission with the committee at all times. The price at which the foreign article sold in this market was given to the committee. The price of the domestic article sold in the domestic market was also given. The testimony that they had gathered in the investigations which they had made shows that there was the difference which I have stated. While the hearings may not demonstrate anything as to the cost of this particular item for producing it in the foreign country or in this country, all the evidence that was collected by the Tariff Commission, as well as the evidence collected by the Reynolds investigation, was presented to the committee whenever a rate was to be decided upon.
> Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, the Senator has made a statement which implies two things: First, that the Tariff Commission furnished some evidence as to the cost of production in this country and abroad. The Tariff Commission itself had no evidence upon that subject.
> Mr. SMOOT. I did not say that. I said the Tariff Commission furnished the price at which the foreign article sold in the American market as well as the price at which the product manufactured in America sold in the market alongside of it.

I need not dwell upon the essential difference there is, and the vast difference there may be, between the cost of producing an article and the price asked for it, or at which it may be sold. Under normal conditions the price will, in all probability, exceed the cost; otherwise, the article would not be produced. In exceptional cases the price and the cost may coincide or goods may be sold below cost, but as a rule the price materially exceeds the cost, representing the sum of the cost and the profit at which the article is sold. It is notorious that in recent years a margin so wide has prevailed between cost and price with reference to many products as to be scandalous. Legislation against profiteering has been enacted by Congress and by State legislatures, the public press has declaimed against it, and altogether it is an odious, prevailing outrage.

To return. Does the language of the amendments above recited direct the President to fix the duties at the difference in the cost of production here and the cost of production abroad? It can not be, or it would be so plainly stated. If it was intended to put into effect the policy so often proclaimed and so stoutly advocated, why was not the plain, simple language in which it has been so repeatedly expressed used? Will the President be at liberty, should these amendments become a part of the act, to fix the duties at the difference between the price of the articles affected in this country and abroad, or to consider those factors as a proper basis for his action, as the committee apparently did, without any searching inquiry into the relative cost of production?

Again, the able chairman of the Committee on Finance introduces an element into the rule which he says governed the committee in fixing the rates prescribed in the bill, not included in what the organization for an American Nonpartisan Scientific Tariff understands to be the scientific basis for a protective tariff. It upholds the simple doctrine of the difference in the cost of production, but the Senator from North Dakota apparently enlarges upon that, or, perhaps, more accurately speaking, reduces the margin to be taken care of by "the cost of shipment into this country." It may be that the supporters of the scientific tariff include that item in the cost of production as they use the expression, though it would not ordinarily convey that meaning. That is not important. What is important is whether the President, under the rule laid down in the proposed amendments, would be entitled to take into consideration the cost of shipment to this country and to fix the duty at such a sum only as will compensate for the difference in the cost of production abroad less the amount that must be paid for shipment to this country? If that factor is to be considered another important inquiry is presented.

Manganese ore is an important product of my State, the output of which was inconsequential until the productive capacity of the mines was stimulated by war conditions and by the earnest appeals of the Government, to which our people patriotically responded, the foreign sources of supply being unavailable to us for want of shipping facilities. Under all ordinary circumstances the cross-country freight rates are so high that the domestic product coming from the intermountain country can not compete with that brought in ballast by water from Brazil and Cuba. Many of the mines in the West, in the development of which heavy expenditures were made, were not yet producing when the armistice was proclaimed, and others were still far from returning development costs when the market collapsed in consequence of the release of shipping theretofore devoted exclusively to war uses. Special legislation was enacted by Congress for the relief of those who were induced to expend large sums to bring into the market domestic manganese, necessary to the production of steel for war purposes, but the provision was pitifully inadequate. Those who risked their all in the business of producing manganese in response to the call of the Government in its hour of peril have been looking hopefully to a protective duty on their product sufficient to meet not only the difference in the cost of mining but as well the difference in the cost of transportation to the point of consumption of the same in the United States, it being insisted that otherwise the market must be surrendered to the foreign producer. The House accorded to them a duty of 1 cent a pound on ores or concentrates containing an excess of 30 per cent of manganese, perhaps enough to take care of the difference in the cost of production, but insufficient to overcome the difference in freight rates. The Senate committee strikes out that provision of the bill and puts manganese ore on the free list. A radical difference in policy as between the two Houses prevails as to this item. Both are to be presumed to be acting in what they conceive to be the general public interest. It would be unjustifiable to conclude that the Senate committee lent a too willing ear to the importunities, the solicitations, the blandishments, or the arguments of the United States Steel Corporation and other manufacturers of steel, who, for obvious reasons, desire manganese to be admitted free. The committee must have been influenced by the belief that the producers of manganese ought to be left to bear their losses with what fortitude they can command, that the production of steel may not be burdened by the relatively trifling sum by which the price they are required to pay for manganese would be enhanced by the House provision. It, on the other hand, was doubtless moved by the belief that the rule of adjusting differences between the cost of production here and abroad or of equalizing the differences in competition ought to be applied to manganese as well as to the many other raw products entering into manufactured commodities given protection and that the domestic source of supply ought to be developed that it might be immediately available should the emergency arise such as confronted us in 1917 and 1918.

From motives of public policy the House put manganese on the dutiable list; from like motives the Senate put it on the free list. If the bill should pass as recommended in that regard by the Senate, the President may transfer it from the one general classification made by the bill, the free list, to the other, the dutiable list; that is, he may reject the policy proposed by the Senate and adopt that to which the House gave its adherence. If he does conduct the investigation and finds the difference to exist, as it confessedly does, in the case of the commodity considered, he must fix the duty as in the statute provided, but he is under no compulsion to institute the inquiry. The effect is that he is at liberty to choose which one of the two policies shall be made effective in the case of manganese, or, for that matter, in the case of any other commodity on the free list as the bill eventually passes.

Upon principles heretofore sufficiently canvassed any statute reposing in him the power to choose as between two essentially different policies to say what the law shall be, whether in accordance with the one or the other, is void. But that is a digression. When the President is convinced that in justice to the producers of manganese, and considering the best interests of the country, imports of that commodity ought to bear a duty, and he attempts to arrive at the rate, may he fix it at such a figure as will cover the difference in the cost of transportation to the consuming centers as well as such as may exist in the cost of production? The same claim is made by the producers of chrome, tungsten, and with more or less vigor on behalf of other far-western products, such as wool and citrus fruits. That the excessive freight rates to which such products are subject at present and the burdens they must bear in the matter of transportation in even ordinary times is one of the items giving rise to "differences in conditions of competition in trade" is indisputable, and yet, so far as I am aware, the principle of equalizing differences arising from the cost of transportation of the domestic product to the general market or place of consumption within the United States has never been recognized, at least never generally recognized, by the advocates of a protective tariff.

But our difficulties do not end here. Let it be assumed that the cost of transportation within the country must be taken into consideration, a conclusion which the language of the amendments makes all but inescapable. To what point and from what point is it to be calculated—from Butte, Mont., to Duluth, Minn., or from Redding, Calif., to Pittsburgh, Pa., or from Little Rock, Ark., to Birmingham, Ala.? If the problem were presented to Congress—if it deemed it wise to entertain the idea—the solution would be relatively simple, as that body may exercise an unrestrained discretion in the matter. It is not obliged to be logical. It might strike a happy medium or make an arbitrary allowance for that element. But the President, having no legislative authority save the power of veto, functioning under a delegation, must proceed according to the rule laid down by Congress.

Nor are we out of the woods yet. If the rule under which he is to act were that heretofore said to be popularly entertained—namely, the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad—he would be confronted with the indisputable fact that such costs vary through a wide range as between foreign countries seeking our markets and as between individual producers both at home and abroad. It is quite generally believed, and doubtless with some foundation, that at present production costs in Germany are extremely low, much lower than in Britain and other countries of Europe competing with her in our markets. What country would furnish the standard upon which the computation of the President would be based? Or would the true standard be the cost to the most efficient and economical producer of any country, shutting all others out and giving him a monopoly of trade with our country? And, on the other hand, what American producer would provide the standard, the one who is favorably situated with reference to most of the elements entering into his costs, commanding his own supply of raw materials in proximity to his plant, operating under perfect business management with ample credit, or the individual with an antiquated plant, pursuing archaic business methods, and hampered by limited means, or would the computation of the President be based on average costs? The perplexities suggested would be multiplied under the rule which substitutes "differences in conditions of competition" for "differences in the cost of production."

Reference was made to the contention that transportation costs ought, in the judgment of some producers soliciting protection, to be taken into consideration in fixing rules. Another item strenuously insisted upon in the hearings before the House Committee was a "reasonable profit" to the American producer. It was insisted that the enterprising American was not content, and ought not to be required to content himself, with the modicum of profit to which Europeans and Asiatics are accustomed, and that accordingly the rates should be fixed so as not only to cover the difference in the cost of production but to leave the American producer a reasonable profit—that is, something more than the profit which satisfies his foreign competitor. It was declared in the debates in the House by some of those responsible for the preparation and passage of the bill that the rates in it were fixed upon that principle. Will the President in computing the "differences in conditions of competition in trade" be entitled in like manner to fix the rates so as that the American producer may have a reasonable profit, as is the purpose of the bill? It would seem to be incontestible. If so, what is a reasonable profit? A perfectly unrestrained discretion is reposed in the President in that regard, a feature that is fatal to the system proposed.

Finally, a multitude of commodities mentioned in the bill have no identical counterpart in American production, but come into competition with articles of an inferior or superior quality, or with essentially different articles for which they serve as substitutes, while with respect to many other commodities, as shown by the Reynolds report, there are no comparable articles of domestic production.

Inasmuch as, in the language of Willoughby, "the facts which are to determine the Executive acts" are "such as may be precisely stated by the legislature and certainly ascertained by the Executive" in the case of a delegation of power which might be exercised by the legislature, the feature last adverted to assumes particular importance. Apparently the framers of the provisions under consideration were impressed with the idea that the rule under which the President is to act, as therein expressed, was neither "precisely stated by the legislature," nor was it sufficiently specific to enable him "certainly" to "ascertain" the rate which would "equalize" the "differences." It attempted to remedy this deficiency by the following provision:

> That in any investigation provided for in this section account may be taken of the price at which like or similar merchandise is sold in the United States and competing foreign countries, wages, prices of materials, and all other items in costs of production of such similar merchandise in the United States and competing foreign countries and any advantages of domestic and foreign producers in competitive trade, including laws and regulations affecting the same (pp. 274–275).

Bear in mind he must take into consideration the difference in the prices; he must take into consideration the difference in the cost of producing it here and abroad, including wages, cost of raw materials, and so on; and then he must take into consideration any other advantage which the foreigner may have over the domestic producer, including such as arise from laws, regulations, and so forth.

It will be noticed that this is a frank abandonment of the difference in the cost-of-production theory of a protective tariff, since, in determining the exact difference in the conditions of competition in trade in the markets of the United States, the President may consider not only the difference in the cost of production, including wages, prices of materials, and like elements, but also the foreign and domestic price of the commodity and any advantage either foreign or domestic producers may have, even including such as arise out of laws and regulations affecting competitive trade. While the difference in the cost of production is unquestionably the feature of paramount importance in determining what advantage, if any, one country has over another in competitive trade, the fact can not be overlooked that there are other elements entering into the problem less ponderable but none the less present.

The Congress has been for some time solicited to enact a statute for the organization of corporations to trade in China. It is urged that a company operating under a national charter would have a higher prestige than one deriving its authority from any State of the Union, and would accordingly compete on more even terms with corporations backed by the direct authority of nations recognized diplomatically in China. On the other hand, it is urged that Americans, encouraged by the opportunity to do business in China under such favorable auspices, would promote trade with their country, buying of American houses more readily than of foreigners, establishing banking connections in the United States, and introducing to the notice of the Chinese American manufactures to which they were strangers.

In the ante bellum, pre-Volstead days German beer had a large sale in Milwaukee, largely on sentimental grounds, and many articles of foreign manufacture command a premium here merely because they are imported or because they have a reputation extending through many years. This is particularly true of women's garments and of dress goods generally, if not of all fabrics. All such considerations must be given due weight, either under the general rule or the specific direction quoted above. But it is indisputable that an impossible task is imposed upon the President when he is called upon to reduce such influence to dollars and cents as to any specific item and to fix the rate of duty so as that the "differences in conditions of competition" having in mind such factors shall be equalized. It will bear repetition that whatever allowance he may make for any of these imponderables that may be present, and any allowance must, in the nature of things, be no more than a guess, his action is final, subject to review by no power, judicial or otherwise.

A further word on that subject may be pardonable, namely, the right of review by the courts in the case of delegated authority. The Supreme Court of Vermont in a recent case justifying an act granting to a railroad commission extensive powers in relation to railroad transportation against the contention that no provision was made in the law for an adequate judicial review, pointed out features of the act touching a review by the courts of the action of the commission deemed by it adequate to meet the requirements of the law, and then added:

> Moreover, the rights of a party are not necessarily limited to those which he may secure by an appeal. Section 4, chapter 2, of our Constitution, providing that "The courts shall be open for the trial of all causes proper for their cognizance," means, among other things, that by a proper proceeding the question of whether an administrative body has exceeded its powers may be brought before and determined by the established courts. No special machinery need be provided for this purpose, for the common law, which is a part of the law of this State, provides the requisite machinery. As the courts have authority to determine the constitutionality of legislative acts, so in all cases they have, and must have, authority to determine whether or not any board or commission claiming to act under legislative authority has exceeded its powers. The powers given to this court on appeal and the common law remedies for the protection of rights which can not be safeguarded by means of the hearing and appeal provided for by statute are sufficient to secure to every party interested in the orders of the railroad commission a vindication of his full rights against arbitrary and unreasonable action, usurpation of powers, and acts in excess of authority. These principles are firmly established in this jurisdiction. (State v. Speyer, 67 Vt. 502; State v. Morse, 84 Vt. 387; State v. Haskill, 84 Vt. 429; State Board of Health v. St. Johnsbury, 82 Vt. 276; Sabre et al. v. Rutland R. R. Co. et al., 86 Vt. 347, 369; 85 Atl. 693.)

But in the nature of things the exercise of the taxing power is not thus subject to review, since the power to tax, as said in McCulloch v. Maryland (4 Wheat. 316), is the power to destroy. Moreover, the President of the United States is not amenable to correction by the courts on account of acts done by him in his official capacity. The Interstate Commerce Commission may be haled before the courts to defend any order it may make and it will be annulled if it appears that the commission acted without its delegated authority or that its action was unsupported by any evidence. The extent of its amenability is thus expressed by Chief Justice White in Interstate Commerce Commission v. Illinois Central (215 U. S. 452–470):

> Beyond controversy, in determining whether an order of the commission shall be suspended or set aside, we must consider (a) all relevant questions of constitutional power or right, (b) all pertinent questions as to whether the administrative order is within the scope of the delegated authority under which it purports to have been made, and (c) a proposition which we state independently, although in its essence it may be contained in the previous one, viz, whether, even although the order be in form within the delegated power, nevertheless it must be treated as not embraced therein, because the exertion of authority which is questioned has been manifested in such an unreasonable manner as to cause it, in truth, to be within the elementary rule that the substance and not the shadow determines the validity of the exercise of the power.

In like manner the Federal Trade Commission may be brought before the court for the purpose of inquiring into the validity of its orders. But not only is the President exempt from process for his official acts (Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch, 165; Throop on Public Officers, 713; Mechem on Public Officers, 607; Mississippi v. Johnson, 4 Wall. 475) but if action should be brought against a collector of customs to recover an alleged excess duty paid under a proclamation issued by the President, pursuant to a law such as the Senate is asked to enact, he could not be called to testify as a witness touching the evidence or information upon which he acted, that it might be determined whether he exceeded the authority conferred upon him or had any just basis for his order or did not act unreasonably or oppressively in the premises. And since the presumption would be indulged that he acted within the scope of his authority and upon sufficient evidence, the taxpayer would be remediless, particularly as there is no provision in the law for making or preserving a record of the proceedings leading to or the evidence inducing the order.

It is not even required that the investigation to be conducted by the President shall be public, though it is provided that "reasonable opportunity to be heard shall be afforded to all persons directly interested in the production and distribution of" any merchandise made the subject of such investigation. The word "directly" is significant.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to inquire, in view of the interdependence of one industry upon another throughout the country, how it can be determined who are the people interested in the legislation?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The question is pertinent. The hearings are not open to anyone. No one can be heard at all except some one who is directly interested. Though those directly interested may be heard, the public generally are not necessarily afforded an opportunity to attend. A taxing system more certainly leading to scandalous abuse could scarcely be contrived or even conceived. The pernicious activities of the lobbyist are comparatively innocuous, when his facts are open to refutation and his argument to attacks by any one or more of 435 Members of the House or one or more of 96 Members of this body. How could the President, burdened as he is almost to the limit of human endurance by the duties now devolving upon him, give to the arguments of selfish, avaricious, and importunate interests the study requisite to test their strength?

Mr. POMERENE. May I suggest, too, that one of the things industries desire above everything else is a stability and permanency of the tariff. If these powers are to be conferred upon the President it will be a most excellent opportunity for any stock jobber in the country to begin some proceeding before the President either to boost the price of a manufactured product or to depress the duty, thereby affecting the market of all the industrial stocks or bonds which may be affected by that particular tariff.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is true. That, of course, touches the question of the wisdom of the policy, rather than the question of the power, which I am canvassing. I adverted to the unwisdom of the policy only incidentally and very briefly simply for the purpose of elucidating, so far as it might tend in that direction, the question of power which I am canvassing.

The subject has been followed thus far upon consideration alone of what may be regarded as the main rather than the incidental features of the system proposed, namely, the general grant of power to the President to raise or lower the rates, or to change the classification, or the form of the duty. The principles canvassed apply with equal and usually with added force to those features heretofore unnoticed in the discussion. If, conducting an investigation such as is provided for in the amendments proposed, the President finds that an industry is being or is likely to be materially injured by reason of the importation of foreign merchandise and that the foreign valuation plan "is not a certain basis for the assessment of the duty," he may proclaim the fact, and thereupon the American valuation plan shall be applied in the case of the merchandise affected. If the rates fixed by the bill do not equalize the differences the President may, as heretofore stated, (1) raise or lower the rates, (2) change the classification, or (3) change the form of the duty, or he may (4) pursue even another policy—in the case of ad valorem rates—and put in force the American valuation plan. It is true that as a condition of so doing he must find that the industry affected is being or is likely to be materially injured, but in every case in which a difference exists calling for action the domestic producer may very properly claim that his industry is being materially injured by the importation of the foreign competing goods. Moreover, by what rule is the President to determine whether an industry is being or is likely to be injured by importations?

In one sense any importations injure the business with the products of which such importations compete. So with reference to the requirement that he must find that the foreign-valuation plan is not a certain basis for the assessment of the duties. Under what circumstances is the foreign-valuation plan a certain basis for the assessment of duties and when is it not? Upon what rule is it to be determined? That, however, is of no great consequence.

Considering that the finding of the President is not open to review, it is left in his unrestrained discretion to put the American-valuation plan in force or to retain the prevailing system. In fact, as much may be said of every provision of the proposed amendments in which is mentioned the necessity of a finding by the President. The language used was undoubtedly adopted to meet the views expressed by the court that a statute may be legally enacted to go into effect upon the occurrence of some future event or upon the finding of the existence of a factor condition, while in fact the President is vested with the authority at his unrestrained will to make the changes. The provisions would be so popularly understood and rightly so understood. Some cynic, having in mind the fact that there was no international machinery by which a nation could be brought to the bar upon a charge of having violated treaty provisions intended to mitigate the horrors of war, said of such that they were but the expression of "a pious hope." So the Congress, by the language of the amendments to which reference has been made, piously expresses the hope that the President may find the conditions to exist which justify his action, knowing that it must stand whether they do or not. The liberty accorded him to act in accordance with whatever view he entertains of the public interest is an outstanding feature of the provisions dealing with unfair methods of competition. The finding being made that such methods are being pursued, he determines what additional rate will "offset" the same, or, in "extreme cases," he may exclude from entry the merchandise involved. Just how he shall compute the money equivalent of the unfair practices is a mathematical problem, the complexities of which are relieved by no word in the statutes, nor is there any rule under which he can conclude that a particular case is or is not an "extreme" case. The practical operation of this statute would be no whit different if it expressly empowered the President to assess whatever duty he saw fit, not to exceed 50 per cent or less than 10 per cent, or to deny the particular merchandise altogether.

One paragraph of the section dealing with this subject, 316, needs some revision. It authorizes the President when he finds, as a fact, that merchandise is offered for entry pursuant to unfair methods of competition, but has not information sufficient to satisfy him of the fact, to forbid its entry until an investigation is had. Just how he could find the fact if he has not information sufficient to satisfy him of its existence is difficult to understand.

Equally obnoxious from a constitutional standpoint are the provisions authorizing the President to impose additional duties upon the imports from any country discriminating against American products. Such discriminations are by some process to be reduced to a money equivalent, and the President is to fix the duties so as to balance the account. He is further vested with discretion to make his proclamation, by way of reprisal, extend to the whole of the offending country or to any part of it, and he may, in case of contumacy on the part of the offending nation, exclude all its products from entry if he deems such a course consistent with the interests of the United States. Here is a clear surrender of the power vested in the Congress to determine what is for the best interest of the United States with respect to taxation and foreign commerce.

This leads me to remark that the committee, apparently doubtful of the validity of the amendments under review, considered solely as features of a revenue law, took pains to recite in them that they are to be enacted "in order to regulate the foreign commerce of the United States." But it need not be said that Congress can not delegate the authority reposed in it by the people to regulate commerce with foreign nations any more than it can the power to lay and collect duties.

The vices pointed out in the amendments offered by the committee would, unquestionably, infect the entire act should they become a part of it. Three of the justices dissented from the conclusion reached by the majority of the court in Field against Clark as to the validity of the reciprocity provisions of the McKinley Act, though they concurred in the judgment.

It will be remembered that the commodities upon which the tax was claimed did not embrace any of the limited number, only five in all, with respect to which the President was authorized to act. The dissenting justices took the view that there was an unlawful delegation, but that the only effect of such was to invalidate the provision under which those particular commodities should become dutiable.

The provisions here considered, however, extend to every item in the bill. As heretofore recited the two Houses of Congress stand in disagreement as to the policy which should be pursued in reference to the basis upon which ad valorem duties shall be computed. The chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, speaking evidently with knowledge of the attitude of his associates in the House, publicly declared that Congress will be in session until snow flies unless the Senate recedes from its insistence on the foreign valuation. Influential members of the Senate Committee on Finance have been scarcely less outspoken touching their purpose never to yield the point. It is hoped that the House will yield its assent to the bill as revised by the Senate, in view of the "elastic provisions" which have been the subject of these remarks. They unquestionably enter so largely into the structure of the bill—they constitute in such large measure an inducement and a consideration for its passage, if it does pass substantially as proposed by the Senate—that if they fall they bring down the entire edifice. Such a result would be nothing less than a calamity to the business interests of the country, the risk of which is too imminent to be lightly assumed.

APPENDIX.

SEC. 315. (a) That in order to regulate the foreign commerce of the United States and to put into force and effect the policy of the Congress by this act intended, whenever the President, upon investigation of the differences in conditions of competition in trade in the markets of the United States of articles wholly or in part the growth or product of the United States and of like or similar articles wholly or in part the growth or product of competing foreign countries, shall find it thereby shown that the duties fixed in this act do not equalize the said differences in conditions of competition in trade he shall, by such investigation, ascertain said differences and determine and proclaim the changes in classifications or forms of duty or increases or decreases in any rate of duty provided in this act shown by said ascertained differences in conditions of competition in trade necessary to equalize the same in the markets of the United States; that 30 days after the date of such proclamation or proclamations such changes in classification or in forms of duty shall take effect and such increased or decreased duties shall be levied, collected, and paid on such merchandise when imported directly or otherwise from the country of origin into the United States: Provided, That until further provided by law the total increase or decrease of such rates of duty shall not exceed 50 per cent of the rates specified in this act, or in any amendatory act.

(b) That in order to regulate the foreign commerce of the United States and to put into force and effect the policy of the Congress by this act intended, whenever the President, upon investigation of the differences in conditions of competition in trade, in the markets of the United States, of articles wholly or in part the growth or product of the United States and of like or similar articles wholly or in part the growth or product of competing foreign countries, shall find it thereby shown that an industry in the United States is being or likely to be materially injured by reason of the importation into the United States of foreign merchandise, and shall find it thereby shown that the value as determined under the provisions of paragraphs (1), (2), or (3) of subdivision (a) of section 402 of this act, is not a certain basis for the assessment of the particular duties, he shall make such findings public, together with a description of the class or kind of merchandise to which they apply in such detail as he may deem necessary for the guidance of appraising officers; that in such cases and upon the proclamation by the President becoming effective the ad valorem duty or duty based in whole or in part upon the value of the imported article in the country of exportation shall thereafter be based upon the American selling price, as defined in subdivision (f) of section 402 of this act, of any similar competitive article manufactured or produced in the United States embraced within the class or kind of imported merchandise upon which the President has made public such a finding and proclamation.

That the ad valorem rate or rates of duty based upon such American selling price shall be the rate found upon said investigation by the President to be shown by the said differences in conditions of competition of trade in the markets of the United States necessary to equalize the differences so found in said conditions of competition in favor of either foreign manufacturers or producers, but no such rate shall be decreased or increased more than 50 per cent of the rate specified in title 1 of this act upon such merchandise. Such rate or rates of duty shall become effective 30 days after the date of the said proclamation of the President, whereupon the duties so estimated and provided shall be levied, collected, and paid upon such merchandise in the manner herein provided when imported directly or otherwise from the country of origin into the United States.

(c) That in any investigation provided for in this section account may be taken of the price at which like or similar merchandise is sold in the United States and competing foreign countries, wages, prices of materials, and all other items in costs of production of such similar merchandise in the United States and competing foreign countries and any advantages of domestic and foreign producers in competitive trade, including laws and regulations affecting the same; that no proclamation shall issue under this section unless reasonable opportunity shall be afforded to all persons directly interested in the production and distribution of such merchandise affected by such proclamation; that the President, proceeding as hereinbefore provided for the proclamation of such rates of duties, may, when he shall determine that it is so shown that the competitive advantages have changed or no longer exist which led to such proclamation, accordingly as so shown modify or terminate the same.

(d) For the purposes of this section any coal-tar product provided for in paragraph 25 or 26 of Title I of this act shall be considered similar to or competitive with any imported coal-tar product which accomplishes results substantially equal to those accomplished by the domestic product when used in substantially the same manner.

If, in any investigation under this section, the President ascertains as a fact that the rates specified in paragraph 25 or 26 of Title I of this act or imposed under the provisions of this section do not equalize the differences in competition in trade in the markets of the United States of any such article wholly or in part the product of the United States and of like or similar articles wholly or in part the product of competing foreign countries, or ascertains as a fact that an industry in the United States is being or likely to be materially injured by reason of the importation of like or similar articles into the United States, he is authorized and it shall be his duty to issue a proclamation stating such fact, and the provisions of the dye and chemical control act, 1921, as amended, shall be in full force and effect from the date and for the period stated in any such proclamation, but the aggregate period shall not exceed one year.

(e) If there is any imported article within the class or kind of merchandise upon which the President has made public a finding, for which there is no similar competitive article manufactured or produced in the United States, the value of such imported article shall be determined under the provisions of paragraphs (1), (2), and (3) of subdivision (a) of section 402 of this act.

(f) The Secretary of the Treasury is empowered to make such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary for the entry and declaration of imported merchandise of the class or kind of merchandise upon which the President has made public a finding under the provisions of this section and for the form of invoice required at time of entry.

SEC. 316. (a) That unfair methods of competition and unfair acts in the importation of merchandise into the United States, or in its sale by the owner, importer, consignee, or agent of either, the effect or tendency of which is to destroy or substantially injure an industry, efficiently and economically operated, in the United States, or to prevent the establishment of such an industry, or to restrain or monopolize trade and commerce in the United States, are hereby declared unlawful, and when found by the President to exist shall be dealt with, in addition to any other provisions of law, as hereinafter provided.

(b) That to assist the President in making any findings under this section jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the executive department or independent establishment of the Government, or both acting in cooperation, which he shall designate to investigate any alleged violation hereof on complaint under oath or upon the initiative of such department or independent establishment.

(c) That such department or establishment shall make such investigation under and in accordance with such rules as it may promulgate and give such notice and afford such hearing, and when deemed proper by such department or establishment such rehearing with opportunity to offer evidence, oral or written, as may be deemed by such department or establishment sufficient for a full presentation of the facts involved in such investigation; that the testimony in every such investigation shall be reduced to writing, and a transcript thereof with the findings and recommendation of such department or establishment shall be the official record of the proceedings and decision in the case, and in any case where the findings in such investigation show a violation of this section a copy of the findings shall be promptly mailed or delivered to the importer or consignee of such merchandise; that such findings and decision, if supported by evidence, shall be conclusive, unless a rehearing shall be granted by such department or establishment, or unless, within such time after entry of said decision and in such manner as appeals may be taken from decisions of the United States Board of General Appraisers, an appeal shall be taken from said finding and decision upon a question or questions of law only to the United States Court of Customs Appeals by the importer or consignee of such merchandise; that if it shall be shown to the satisfaction of said court that further evidence should be taken, and that there were reasonable grounds for the failure to adduce such evidence in the proceedings before such department or establishment, said court may order such additional evidence to be taken before such department or establishment in such manner and upon such terms and conditions as to the court may seem proper; that such department or establishment may modify its findings as to the facts or make new findings by reason of additional evidence, which, if supported by the evidence, shall be conclusive as to the facts unless within such time and in such manner an appeal shall be taken as aforesaid upon a question or questions of law only; that the judgment of said court shall be final, except that the same shall be subject to review by the United States Supreme Court upon certiorari within three months after such judgment of the United States Court of Customs Appeals.

(d) That the final findings of such department or establishment shall be transmitted with the record to the President.

(e) That whenever the existence of any such unfair method or act shall be established to the satisfaction of the President he shall determine the rate of additional duty, not exceeding 50 nor less than 10 per cent of the value of such merchandise as defined in section 402 of Title IV of this act, which will offset such method or act, and which is hereby imposed upon such merchandise, or, in what he shall be satisfied and find are extreme cases of unfair methods or acts as aforesaid, he shall direct that such merchandise as he shall deem the interest of the United States shall require shall be excluded from entry into the United States, and upon information of such action by the President the Secretary of the Treasury shall, through the proper officers, assess such additional duties or refuse such entry; and that the findings of the President shall be conclusive, unless within 10 days thereafter he shall revoke or modify the same, in which case such revocation or modification shall be conclusive.

(f) That whenever the President shall find as a fact that any merchandise is offered or sought to be offered for entry into the United States in violation of this section but has not information sufficient to satisfy him thereof, the Secretary of the Treasury shall, upon his request in writing, forbid entry thereof until such investigation as the President may deem necessary shall be completed: Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury may permit entry under bond upon such conditions and penalties as he may deem adequate.

(g) That any additional duty or any refusal of entry under this section shall continue in effect until the President shall find and instruct the Secretary of the Treasury that the conditions which led to the assessment of such additional duty or refusal of entry no longer exist.

SEC. 317. (a) That from and after the passage of this act, subject to the provisions of this section, all products, when imported into the United States from any foreign country, shall be admitted under the provisions of Titles I and II and sections 315 and 316 of this act.

(b) That the President shall by proclamation specify and declare new or additional duties as hereinafter provided upon the products of any foreign country whenever he shall find as a fact that such country—

Imposes, directly or indirectly, upon the disposition in or transportation in transit through or reexportation from such country of any product of the United States any unreasonable charge, exaction, regulation, or limitation which is not equally enforced upon the like products of any foreign country;

Imposes, directly or indirectly, upon the importation from the United States of any article not the product of the United States any customs, tonnage, or port duty or any other charge, exaction, regulation, or limitation whatever which is not equally enforced upon importation from every foreign country of the like article not being the product of the country whence it is directly imported;

Imposes upon any product upon its exportation to the United States any duty, charge, restriction, or prohibition whatever which is not equally enforced upon the exportation of such products to every foreign country;

Discriminates against the commerce of the United States, directly or indirectly, by law or administrative regulation or practice, by or in respect to any duty, fee, charge, exaction, classification, regulation, condition, restriction, or prohibition, in such manner as to place the commerce of the United States at a disadvantage compared with the commerce of any foreign country; or fails to accord to the commerce of the United States treatment equal and equivalent to that accorded to the commerce of any foreign country.

(c) If at any time the President shall find it to be a fact that any foreign country has not only discriminated against the commerce of the United States, as aforesaid, but has, after the issuance of a proclamation as authorized in subsection (b) hereof, maintained or increased its said discriminations against the commerce of the United States, the President is hereby authorized, if he deems it consistent with the interests of the United States, to issue a further proclamation directing that such products of said country as he shall deem the public interests may require shall be excluded from importation into the United States.

(d) That any proclamation issued by the President under the authority of this section shall, if he deems it consistent with the interests of the United States, extend to the whole of any foreign country or may be confined to any subdivision or subdivisions thereof; and the President shall, whenever he deems the public interests require, suspend, revoke, supplement, or amend any such proclamation.

(e) The President shall find as a fact the burdens placed on the commerce of the United States by the discriminations aforesaid, and when issuing any such proclamation shall declare therein the new or additional customs duties determined by him as aforesaid to be equivalent to such burdens, not to exceed 50 per cent ad valorem or its equivalent, and shall specify the date upon which such proclamation and any new or additional customs duties declared therein shall take effect, and from and after such date there shall be levied, collected, and paid on the products enumerated in such proclamation when imported into the United States such new or additional customs duties; or in case of products declared subject to exclusion from importation into the United States under the provisions of subsection (c) hereof, such products shall be excluded from importation.

(f) That whenever the President shall find as a fact that any foreign country enforces upon the exportation of any product any export duty, restriction, or prohibition, or grants any bounty on production or exportation, any rebate of duties or any preferential allowance upon exports which unduly or unfairly discriminates against the United States, any products thereof, or consumers therein, he shall by proclamation specify and declare new or additional duties as provided in subsections (b), (d), and (e) upon importation from any foreign country into the United States of the products of any industry which receives any benefit from any such discriminatory provisions aforesaid; and said new or additional duties shall be levied, collected, and paid as provided in such proclamation.

(g) All articles of merchandise imported contrary to the provisions of this section shall be forfeited to the United States and shall be liable to be seized, prosecuted, and condemned in like manner and under the same regulations, restrictions, and provisions as may from time to time be established for the recovery, collection, distribution, and remission of forfeitures to the United States by the several revenue laws. Whenever the provisions of this act shall be applicable to importations into the United States of the products of any foreign country, they shall be applicable thereto whether such products are imported directly or indirectly.

(h) It shall be the duty of such department or independent establishment of the Government, as the President may direct, to ascertain and at all times to be informed whether any of the discriminations against the commerce of the United States enumerated in subsections (b), (c), and (f) of this section are practiced by any country; and if and when such discriminatory acts are disclosed, it shall be the duty of such department or independent establishment to bring the matter to the attention of the President, together with recommendations.

(i) The Secretary of the Treasury with the approval of the President shall make such rules and regulations as are necessary for the execution of such proclamations as the President may issue in accordance with the provisions of this act.

(j) That when used in this section the term "foreign country" shall mean any empire, country, dominion, colony, or protectorate, or any subdivision or subdivisions thereof (other than the United States and its possessions), within which separate tariff rates or separate regulations of commerce are enforced.

Mr. DIAL. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. SMITH] is unavoidably detained from the Senate. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I had not expected to discuss this feature of the bill at this time; but the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] having made quite an exhaustive argument upon the subject in the early stages of the discussion of the bill, for which I sincerely desire to thank him, I feel it quite proper that on behalf of the committee I should state the general basis on which we hold this administrative provision to be constitutional. I will say to the Senate that the provision which has just been discussed by the Senator from Montana has been most carefully drawn by members of the Tariff Commission and by Judge De Vries, of the Court of Customs Appeals, after an exhaustive study of all the questions and the decisions bearing upon this important subject. I shall but most briefly indicate what I believe to be the only legal question involved.

Section 8 of Article I of the Constitution of the United States provides:

> The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises—

And so forth; and in the same section it is provided that the Congress shall have power—> to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States—

And so forth. Upon these two provisions of the Constitution is based the power which we here impose upon the President, acting through the Tariff Commission, not to fix duties himself, according to his own judgment, but to ascertain facts and then lay a duty which will be prescribed by Congress to effectuate a certain result.

Section 315 (a) of the provision discussed by the Senator from Montana reads:

> That in order to regulate the foreign commerce of the United States and to put into force and effect the policy of the Congress by this act intended, whenever the President, upon investigation * * * shall find * * * that the duties fixed in this act do not equal the said differences in conditions of competition in trade—

He may first adopt the American selling price of the article as the basis on which the duty is to be levied, and then may either increase or decrease the rate, within fixed limits, to effectuate the purpose declared.

Subdivision (c) of the same section provides that the President may take into account—> the price at which like or similar merchandise is sold in the United States and competing foreign countries, wages, prices of materials, and all other items in costs of production, * * * and any advantages of domestic and foreign producers in competitive trade, including laws and regulations affecting the same.

After ascertaining just what rate of duty will equalize these differences, the law directs him to apply that rate upon the standard of valuation which the law prescribes. The law does not state what these specific duties shall be, but it does direct that the duties shall measure up to a certain standard, to be determined by the facts, and that standard is equality of competition in the American market.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do.

Mr. SIMMONS. If I understand the Senator, he means that the President may take into consideration the difference in the cost of production here and abroad, wages and all that sort of thing; that the rule of measurement is the difference between the selling price in this market of the foreign and the domestic product, and the President, while giving consideration to the difference in the cost of production here and abroad, should so fix the rate as to bring about equality in conditions of competition in trade in this market.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator does not accurately state the position. The proposition is that the President shall take into consideration every one of these things, not that he shall take into consideration one of them or two of them, and then, if they do not properly apply, he may consider others; but he is to take into consideration every fact that bears upon the question of the competitive trade in the markets of the United States. It may include the matter of exchange, it may include the matter of freights, of labor costs, of export duties, of laws and regulations, and any other matter that affects equality of competition in the markets of the United States. No one of them is given predominance in his consideration of the subject.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; I think I understand that statement of the Senator; but when the President has taken into consideration all of these things which the Senator has enumerated, if he shall find that in taking those things into consideration the difference is less than the difference in the selling prices, then the President is directed to take the selling price as the basis for the rate instead of these differences arising out of cost of production and other things that the Senator said he may take into consideration.

Mr. McCUMBER. He takes into consideration not only selling price but any other matter that is necessary to arrive at a definite understanding of the facts. What the American manufacturer or American producer is most interested in is not so much what it costs to produce the competing article in the foreign country as what that article is being put down for in the American market, because it is in the American market that he must meet his competition.

Mr. SIMMONS. Now let me put a concrete case to the Senator. Suppose, after considering all of these elements that the Senator says the bill authorizes the President to consider, he finds that there is only a difference of 25 per cent in favor of the foreign article, but he also finds at the same time that there is a difference of 50 per cent between the selling price of the domestic and the foreign product in this market abroad and the selling price here, would not the President, under your bill, be required to raise the duty to 50 per cent instead of 25 per cent?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly not. The Senator does not for one moment want to lose sight of the declared purpose, and the declared purpose is to equalize the competition in trade. If the American producer should raise his price to an unjust amount it would not be necessary to raise the duty in order to meet any exorbitant demand that he might make.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have not made that contention in the question I have asked.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am simply making that statement to show that that is not the intent of the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. But the Senator's bill says that while the President may take into consideration all of these things with reference to production costs, and so forth, when he goes to establish this additional rate he shall establish it so as to bring about equality in conditions of competition in trade in this market. If he finds that a rate based on the difference in cost of production does not bring about equality in conditions of competition, your bill directs him practically to ignore that measure and to establish his rate upon the basis of difference in the selling price.

Mr. McCUMBER. No; I have stated that the Senator is mistaken in that. The Senator assumes all the time that the President must start upon the foundation of equalization of the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad. If he can not, by a rate, effectuate an equality in conditions growing out of the difference in the cost at home and abroad, he then may fix his rates upon some other standard. He takes all of those elements into consideration—not one of them. No one of them is given a dominant influence.

Mr. SIMMONS. That I entirely understand, but your bill says that the rates which the President is required to fix shall be laid with a view to equalizing conditions in competition in trade here and abroad.

Mr. McCUMBER. No; here—not abroad.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; differences in conditions of competition in trade in this market. But your bill provides that the President, in ascertaining this rate which he is authorized to superimpose, shall ascertain it with a view to equalizing conditions in competition in trade in this market.

That is the ultimate standard of measurement that he is to apply under your bill; but in reaching that standard he may consider these other things. The starting point is the condition of competition in the American market. His rate is to equalize that difference, to bring about equality in that respect.

Mr. McCUMBER. If there is already equality in competition, then that provision of the law will not apply.

Mr. SIMMONS. But suppose there is not equality in competition, and the President is directed to bring about equality in competition in trade. The President proceeds to find out that equality by first ascertaining the price at which the domestic product is sold in this country and the price at which the foreign product is sold in this country. He has, in the last analysis, then but one basis of determining the rate, and that is the difference between these two prices. The rate is imposed with a view to equalizing those differences. These other things that he is authorized to consider do not furnish the basis. They are merely evidence; they are merely circumstances which the President may consider; but after he has considered them he is to determine the difference in price in the domestic market of products which are produced here and sold at wholesale and products which are produced abroad and imported into this country and sold at wholesale. The rule is that he shall fix the rate with the view of bringing the selling price of the foreign article to the level of the selling price of the domestic product.

Mr. McCUMBER. The rule is that he shall bring about a condition of equality in competition in the markets of the United States. That is the rule by which he must measure the duties, and it is the only rule that is to guide him. He has to consider what duty is necessary to effectuate that purpose.

Mr. SIMMONS. But the President is to bring about equality, in the end, in the selling prices of the two products.

Mr. McCUMBER. In competition. It does not necessarily mean the selling price by any means. An imported article which is no better than the American article, because of the fact that it is imported may sell for an even higher price than the American product, and the President is not authorized to attempt to equalize the selling prices of the two articles by the duty. He is to look only to the one question, of equalizing the competition in the United States market.

Mr. SIMMONS. The conditions of competition in trade——

Mr. SMOOT and Mr. WALSH of Montana rose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield first to the Senator from Utah, as he rose first. Let me say to the Senator from North Carolina that in stating that I yielded to the Senator from Utah before yielding to the Senator from Montana, I did not wish to cut off the Senator from North Carolina in an unfinished sentence.

Mr. SIMMONS. All I wanted to say was that equalizing conditions in competition in trade must be taken to mean with reference to the selling prices of the two products in the American market. That does not mean, as the Senator has said, that there must be absolute equality in price, without taking into consideration any difference in quality. They might be the same articles; one might be a little better, and the President would consider that element, of course, but in the final analysis the rate is levied upon the basis of obtaining equality in price, because competition in trade has reference to price.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, let me again correct the Senator, and I can explain that by the illustration I gave. An imported article that is of exactly the same quality as the American-made article may sell for a higher price in the markets of the United States than that of the American article. We seek in no way to attempt to balance those prices. They may be competitive, but the very fact that the foreign article is sold for a greater price than an equally valued American-made article would indicate that there would be no necessity whatever for intervention.

Mr. SIMMONS. But I assume that nobody would apply to the President to invoke this power if the foreign price were higher than the American price. They would only apply to him when the foreign price was lower than the American price. The point I want to make is that while the President is authorized to consider in this proposition the element of the difference in the cost of production here and abroad in fixing these rates, he is not directed to be governed by that but is expressly directed to be governed by another rule, namely, the difference in conditions in competition in trade, and price is, of course, the dominating and controlling factor. The difference in cost of production is a mere element, but that is subordinated to the controlling element, namely, difference in price. It is only a circumstance for consideration. The controlling element which must guide the President in this matter is whether the prices and selling conditions in the American market of the foreign product and the domestic product are equal or unequal. If he finds that the selling price of the foreign product is below that of the American product, he is authorized to bring it up to the selling price of the American product, and thereby bring about equality in competition.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is not as I understand it, Mr. President. Now I yield to the Senator from Utah, if he cares to speak.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not know that I want to discuss the question any further than to say now that I disagree with the Senator from North Carolina, and I think the Senator from North Dakota has correctly stated the position of the committee.

I may add, while I am on my feet, that the committee have already reported to the Senate the rates of duty which they think are sufficient to meet every case, with a very few exceptions, to which we may call attention during this discussion. The President does not have to transfer the basis of valuation from foreign valuation to American valuation unless it becomes absolutely necessary. He has the power under this provision to increase the rates on the foreign valuation, and I doubt very much whether there will be any increase made on more than one out of a thousand items in this bill, as I said. But if an industry is of sufficient importance to the United States, and if it is found that it is absolutely necessary, in order that that industry shall survive, for the President to exercise this power, I do not think the American people would object.

Mr. SIMMONS. May I ask the Senator one question?

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator from North Dakota will yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. I would like to have a categorical answer, if the Senator is able to give it. Is the basis upon which the President is authorized to fix these rates the difference in the cost of production here and abroad, or is the basis upon which, in the last analysis, he is required and directed to fix it, the fixing of a rate which will bring about equal conditions in competition in trade? Which is the basis?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I can not give any different answer from that which the Senator from North Dakota has already given. The rates in this bill are not fixed entirely upon the one question of the difference between the cost of production in this country and in foreign countries.

The Senator knows that conditions in the world to-day are entirely different from what they ever were before. He knows that the conditions in one country are quite different from those in another; and the President must have power or Congress will have to act, and the Senator knows it is impossible for Congress to act in time to save an industry. Action must be had in certain cases which would never have been thought of under conditions existing in the past.

How are you going to meet this situation? The committee thinks they have reported the only way in which it can be met, and that it is not a question whether or not it will be the price at which the goods will be sold in this country. I say that there may be particular items—and I think I could mention a few of them to the Senator at this time—as to which that would be the only way in which it could be protected under the provisions of this law. But we must have a rule laid down for the President of the United States to act upon, and without that rule being laid down, I think, myself, the Senator from Montana would be right in saying that it was unconstitutional. But the rule laid down here is so plain and so definite that there is no question in my mind but that it will be held constitutional.

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield now to the Senator from Montana, and then, as I intended to take only a few moments on this matter, I would like to finish my statement, as I have not yet gotten to the meat of it at all.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I ventured to interrupt the Senator from North Dakota because of the statement made by him to the effect that in some cases—perhaps only a few cases—the imported article will sell for a higher price than the domestic product simply because it is imported.

Mr. SMOOT. When it has a foreign name to it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I understood the Senator to say that that fact would not be taken into consideration by the President in fixing the rate.

Mr. McCUMBER. He would have to take all of those matters into consideration.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am not speaking about all of them.

Mr. McCUMBER. I simply stated that the fact that the foreign article was sold at a higher price in the United States would not necessarily mean that the President must change the rates in order to meet the situation.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I did not understand the Senator to make a statement of that character at all. I understood him to say that that fact would not be considered under the rule.

Mr. McCUMBER. Every fact relating to the cost and to what the article sells for must be taken into consideration.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. We are altogether away from the question of the cost of production. We all agree that that is an important element to be taken into consideration. I understood the Senator to say, however, that though the imported article might sell in the markets of the United States for a higher price than the domestic article of the same character simply because it is imported—having a reputation as an imported article—that fact would not be taken into consideration and could not be taken into consideration by the President.

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, no; I did not intend to say that. All of those facts, of course, would be taken into consideration. What I intended to say, and what I think I did say, was that in a case of that kind the President would not necessarily, and probably would not be called upon to, put into effect a different rate to meet that situation.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there is just one other thing I rose to speak of. I wish to call the Senator's attention to the fact—and the Senator knows it to be a fact—that many times foreign goods are sold in the American markets below the cost of production in a foreign country. I could cite hundreds of instances on this floor if I had the time. But we all know that many times goods manufactured in a foreign country are sold in the American markets below cost; at least until the American industry is destroyed, and then prices are advanced.

Mr. POMERENE. And many times American goods are sold in foregin countries at very much less than what they were sold for in this country.

Mr. SMOOT. A few of them.

Mr. SIMMONS. All I desired to accomplish by the interruptions I have made was to find out exactly what was to be regarded in this discussion as the rule upon which these rates were levied, whether it was the difference in the cost of production here and abroad, or whether it was to equalize conditions in competition in trade. It seemed to me that the bill clearly indicated that in the last analysis the rates were made in the bill, and were to be made by the President in case he increased those rates, with a view to equalizing conditions in competition, although, in order to do that he might have to impose a rate much higher than would be necessary to measure the difference in the costs of production.

I think it is very well to have that clearly fixed and determined, because we can not get along very well in discussing these rates if we have two rules by which to measure them. I can readily see that the difference in the cost of production here and abroad might be only 25 per cent, and yet the difference in the selling prices of the domestic and foreign product might be 50 per cent. The question is, Are these rates levied with reference to the one measure or with reference to the other measure?

When it is said that we take into consideration the cost of production; that does not meet the situation. The question is, In the last analysis upon which rule of measurement is the rate to be determined? There may be many elements outside of the cost of production to be taken into consideration, but in the last analysis, the bill, according to my conception of it, is not based upon the difference in the cost of production, which I consider and believe to be the only correct rule upon which the protectionist principle can be justified, but is fixed upon the basis of equalizing conditions in competition, which is an entirely different thing, and which is a deviation from the rule heretofore laid down by the Republican Party.

If the rates are going to be fixed upon the basis of equalizing conditions of competition, the profits that are charged by the domestic producer, as compared with the profits that are charged by the foreign producer, become an important factor in the problem, and we have absolutely no evidence to determine these relative profits, which would manifestly constitute an element in the levying of the rates. For instance, to make clear what I mean, suppose it is sought now to bring about equality in conditions of competition. The foreigner has a profit in his price of only 25 per cent. The American has a profit in his price of 50 or 100 or 200 per cent. These facts as to relative profits in a case of that kind would of necessity require consideration and we have no evidence whatever to enlighten us, and I assume the committee in fixing these rates had none.

Mr. McCUMBER. May I resume the argument now, may I ask the Senator? Of course, I am not complaining at being interrupted.

Mr. SIMMONS. I simply wanted to make my position clear. The Senator will remember that I asked several days ago that the majority should give us a clear statement of the rule adopted in measuring the protection which should be accorded an industry. The Senator has not until this time undertaken to answer that question. I wanted to get clear in the minds of Senators what was the rule now for the first time announced by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I only say upon the last suggestion made by the Senator from North Carolina that I was a member of the committee when the last tariff bill was passed, the Simmons-Underwood Act, and I know the difficulties the Senator himself had in attempting to ascertain the difference between the cost of an article at home and abroad. Of course, the Senator abandoned that generally when he drafted his bill, which was a tariff for revenue only, but the Senator understands that it is almost impossible to get the cost of the production of an article abroad. We get the very best information that we can. The tariff experts and those who have had to do with the collection of the customs duties practically all agree that there is at all times, under normal commercial conditions, a very close relation between the cost of production of an article in a foreign country and the selling price of that article in that country, and an equally close relation between the cost of production of an article in this country and the selling price of the article in this country; and that, therefore, if we should take the basis of the selling price, which we do to a certain extent in fixing our rates of duties, we have arrived at as close a relation as it is possible for us to reach in determining the necessary duty.

Mr. SIMMONS rose.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish the Senator would allow me now to discuss the real subject which I intended to discuss when I rose, and that is the basis on which we claim this provision in the bill to be constitutional.

We have authority in Congress to regulate commerce between the States. A rate of duty or a tariff rate or a freight rate is an incident to the regulation of interstate commerce. So a duty upon imported goods is an incident to the regulation of commerce between this and foreign countries. The duties may regulate that commerce—may prohibit commerce entirely in certain articles. Congress has the same right and the same authority over its foreign commerce that it has over interstate commerce, and the same rules would apply in fixing rates of duty in our foreign commerce as would apply in fixing tariff rates or passenger rates over our railways.

Just remember that the policy of the proposed bill, with the exception of the dye embargo act, which is continued in force for two years, is to enable the American producer to continue to produce and sell his product in the United States and at the same time to permit the foreign producer to enter the markets of the United States.

Were it possible to ascertain the cost of production of any or every imported article in the country of origin and the cost of production of the same or like article in the United States, we could undoubtedly appoint a commission or authorize and direct the Treasury Department or the President to ascertain those two facts, and then by law direct the Treasury Department to apply a rate of duty that would bring the cost of the foreign article landed in the United States to an equality with the cost of the American article in the United States. It seems to me there can be little doubt of our authority not to delegate to the President the right to fix a duty but to delegate to him the right and duty to ascertain a fact and then by the law itself declare what the duty shall be, based upon the fact so ascertained, such duty to measure up to a prescribed requirement; in this instance, to equalize conditions of competition.

Now, it so happens that these two facts standing alone may not give the proper basis for determining what duty is necessary to equalize the differences in conditions of competition in the American market. There are laws, regulations, export duties, bonuses, differences in rates of exchange, freight rates, and many other facts, all of which will have a direct bearing on the question of equal competition in our markets. All of these facts are to be taken into consideration.

The whole purpose of the section is to secure equality of trade in the American markets. And if we have the authority to authorize the President to declare a rate which measures the difference, say, between the cost of production in one country and the cost of production in the other, if we have the right to say that the rate may be fixed upon these two bases, we have an equal right to say that the President shall take into consideration 10 different bases in arriving at a proper rate to effectuate this equality in trade. The President exercises no legislative function. He simply applies a rate to conform to the rule declared by Congress.

In its control over interstate and foreign commerce, Congress has the undoubted right to protect our navigable streams. Congress has the right to direct that a dike between certain points on the Mississippi shall be 150 feet wide at its base and 20 feet high. But instead of so doing, Congress has a right to declare that a dike shall be built of sufficient width and sufficient height to protect the channel and to prevent the overflow in case of flood, not to exceed, if it so desires to say, 150 feet wide at its base and 20 feet high. And it may direct a commission of experts, of engineers, to take into consideration the volume of the flow under normal conditions, the volume of the flow under the highest flood known, the angle at which the current strikes the banks at the particular point, the descent of the river at that point, and the consequent force of the current, the character and composition of the banks, and then direct that a dike be erected of sufficient width of base and height to protect and hold the waters within the channel, such base and height not to exceed the limitations laid down in the law itself. This would not be a delegation of power.

The same kind of a law might be enacted with regard to obstructions and the construction of bridges and approaches. Congress might authorize such construction not to seriously interfere with the navigability of the stream. And it might authorize a commission of experts to determine what would seriously interfere with the navigability and authorize them to prohibit any construction that would interfere with the navigability of the stream or seriously affect it.

The provision of this law does not even approach the authority given to the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix railway rates. I want to read that law and see how much broader it is. If we were to apply to it the criticisms that are applied by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], that law could not stand, it seems to me, for a single moment. Here, in brief, is the declaration of authority:

> That the commission is authorized and empowered, and it shall be its duty whenever, after full hearing upon a complaint made * * * it shall be of the opinion that any of the rates, or charges whatsoever, demanded, charged, or collected by any common carrier or carriers, * * * are unjust or unreasonable, or unjustly discriminatory, or unduly preferential or prejudicial, or otherwise in violation of any of the provisions of this act, to determine and prescribe what will be the just and reasonable rate or rates, charge or charges, to be thereafter observed in such cases as the maximum to be charged; * * * and to make an order, etc.

It will be observed that not only is the commission authorized to determine and prescribe what will be just and reasonable rates, but it is given authority to exercise a judgment as to whether any rates are unjust or unreasonable or unjustly discriminatory or unduly preferential or prejudicial or otherwise in violation of the provisions of the act.

The determination of what are unreasonable or discriminatory rates may be said to smack of a judicial rather than a ministerial finding; and yet, so far as I know, not even the delegated power to determine what are just and unjust and what are discriminatory rates at least has ever been questioned by our court of last resort. It can not be doubted that the rate-fixing power is an incident to the regulation of interstate commerce, and, as I have said, the fixing of tariff rates is a matter of regulation of foreign commerce.

Mr. President, I have prepared quite a lengthy brief upon the constitutionality of this provision in the bill. I shall refer to it when in regular order we reach the particular provision. I am, nevertheless, glad that the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] has raised the question at this time, in order that Senators may have full opportunity before we arrive at that section of the bill thoroughly to investigate the question. I think the Senator has called our attention to some matters that are well worthy of consideration and to which the committee may give further consideration before we come to consider that particular provision of the bill.

I had some doubt when the matter was first proposed as to whether or not the provision was within at least the twilight zone of constitutionality, but as I have examined it further and had an opportunity to consider the briefs that have been furnished on the subject I have come to the conclusion that it is clearly within the constitutional provision, and I shall attempt to demonstrate that when we reach the section itself.

Mr. UNDERWOOD obtained the floor.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I merely desire to say in connection with the observation just made by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] that in my discussion of the matter I proceeded upon the assumption that the power delegated by Congress to the Interstate Commerce Commission and by the legislatures of the State generally to railroad commissions is indisputable. It does not help the situation very much to base the argument upon the question as to whether or not that kind of a delegation of powers is within the limits of the Constitution. The greater portion of my argument was devoted to pointing out what I conceive to be essential differences between the delegation of power in the bill and the delegation of power to the Interstate Commerce Commission. Among other things, at least, the power delegated to the Interstate Commerce Commission is subject to review by the courts. That is one essential difference. Others I sought to point out. I suppose in due course those differences which I conceive to exist will have attention.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I do not think the suggestion goes to the real question of the constitutional authority to delegate to the President the right to ascertain a state of facts and fix a rate upon that determination. Whether or not we should give to the court the right of review is entirely another question. I am inclined to think that we can not deny the court, in some form, the power of reviewing any decision that may be arrived at; that if the court can not reach the decision in one way it may reach it in another without expressly declared authority on the part of Congress.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama yield to me?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] has discussed at length the opinion of the Supreme Court based upon the reciprocity provision of the McKinley tariff law. It seems to me that under the provisions contained in the pending bill we shall have vested almost unlimited discretion in the President with respect to the fixing of rates. Of course, I understand there has been an attempt to make competitive conditions the criterion. I think I understand what is in the mind of the Senators who propose this legislation.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Of course, if that does not stand, the entire bill falls. I admit that.

Mr. POMERENE. But, as bearing upon that, it is proposed by the pending bill to give the President unlimited discretion when it comes to the reclassification of different articles which are the subject of tariff rates. It is proposed to give to the President unlimited discretion to change from either the ad valorem system of levying duties to the specific system, or from specific duties to ad valorem duties. It is proposed to give the President unlimited discretion to change from the foreign valuation scheme to the American valuation scheme; and, I take it, that the bill contemplates changing, if the President should see fit, from the American valuation scheme to the foreign valuation scheme.

In addition to that the bill proposes to give the President unlimited discretion within the limits of a 50 per cent increase or a 50 per cent decrease. It seems to me that the proponents of this legislation have lost sight—and I say this with all due respect—of an essential principle in all tariff legislation.

We want, if it is possible, to have tariff rates stabilized. I think we all agree as to that. When the tariff question is discussed with the business men of the country, no matter whether they take a view favoring a revenue tariff or a high protective tariff, they are more interested in having the rates definitely fixed than they are in any particular rate. The thing that troubles me most about the situation is that, within the limits which I have indicated, it is proposed to clothe the President with legislative discretion, only hemmed in by the boundaries which I have indicated, and I think, looking at it from a constitutional standpoint, that is a very grave difficulty contained in this provision.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President, I noticed that the Senator from Montana presented that feature of the difficulty with a great deal of force, and that is what I referred to when I stated that he had presented matters which I thought justified further and more careful consideration at the hands of the committee. I merely desire at this time to answer the suggestion of the Senator as to having fixed any definite rates of duty. We all admit that we want definite rates established; but, on whatever basis we may impose a duty, at the present time, when prices are fluctuating as they are and conditions are abnormal, they can not be definite. I absolutely expect that the prices of foreign commodities are going to increase somewhat.

Mr. POMERENE. They are increasing now.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I expect that the production costs in the United States are going to be reduced. I trust that hope will be realized; it may be realized; but if it shall be, then I want the authority given to the President to reduce as well as to increase any particular duty, so as to do justice in the American market, both to the importer and to the manufacturer. If we had normal conditions to-day, I would be absolutely opposed to this provision in our tariff bill. I think we need a new tariff law, but, as I stated in the beginning of the debate, the present is probably the worst time in the history of the country to fix the duty upon any one article because of fluctuating prices, due to abnormal conditions throughout the world.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator that when it comes to fixing tariff rates, whether the question be looked at from the protective tariff viewpoint or the revenue viewpoint, we must take into consideration to some extent the rates of exchange and the varying industrial and economic conditions in different countries; there can not be any question about that; but it seems to me—and I base this statement very largely upon the able discussion of this subject by the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS]—that the cost of production in European countries has increased very substantially within the last few months. I think there can be no doubt about that. I realize the difficulties that have confronted the Finance Committee, but at the same time the provisions which have been so ably discussed by the Senator from Montana, in my judgment, raise a very serious constitutional question.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-three Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, the debate on this bill this morning has thrown a great deal of light on the situation in so far as the bill will affect the public generally, and in so far as the enactment of this bill into law will change existing conditions in levying taxes at the customhouse.

Of course, we have all known that almost from the beginning the Republican Party has favored a protective tax at the customhouse, and that the taxes levied on most of the articles, where they were highly competitive, prohibited foreign competition. Of course, under every tariff bill a certain number of articles come in that are either produced only in a foreign country, or they are articles of which the American production does not equal the American consumption, and almost any tax will allow importations and produce revenue; but there is a class of articles where competition governs the situation, and if you put the tax high enough—and sometimes it does not have to be very much of a tax to be high enough—it prohibits importations.

This bill in its administrative features, as shown by the discussion to-day, authorizes the President to adjust rates under certain conditions where they do not equalize the difference in conditions of competition in trade. I know no measure by which you can judge of the equalization of conditions of competition in trade other than the price of the article. The bill does not say whether "conditions of competition in trade" means wholesale conditions or retail conditions. Of course, it would be very much more extreme if we assumed that it meant to equalize the difference in trade in retail conditions, with retail profits added, than if we assumed that it referred to wholesale conditions; but it must mean one or the other. It must mean that the President can equalize the difference in competition in trade between foreign goods after they have landed on American soil and homemade goods on American soil, as governed by either the wholesale or the retail prices, because that is the only way in which he can measure it. It does not say "wholesale or retail prices," but that is the measure of the equalization of trade conditions. For the purpose of this argument I will assume that the language of the bill means the milder form of equalization of trade, namely, wholesale prices.

It demonstrates how far this bill has gone in the opinion of the drafters of the bill, in the way of excluding foreign competition entirely, when the distinguished senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] announced to-day in the course of the debate that these provisions authorizing the President to put in operation the machinery of this bill to equalize the conditions in trade probably would not take effect in reference to more than one article in a thousand. I think I quote him correctly in what he said just a moment ago. Of course, I think the Senator from Utah was a little extreme in his statement, because, if I correctly remember, when the present law was prepared I had an estimate made as to the number of articles embraced in the bill—not an accurate count, but an estimate—and it was estimated that about 4,000 articles were embraced within the sheets of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I had reference to all the basket clauses and the items which fall in the basket clauses.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. They are articles; they are affected. There were 4,000 articles, and the Senator from Utah said that this provision authorizing the President to equalize conditions in trade would relate to only one in a thousand. That would mean four articles in the bill, if I am correct, but if it is twice as many as I say then it would be only eight articles. I think it would apply to a good many more.

What does that statement mean? I am sure there has been no man on the Finance Committee who has more diligently pursued the making of this bill than the distinguished Senator from Utah, and no man is better informed as to what will be accomplished, and there is no man who has a seat on the floor of the Senate who is more faithful in his advocacy of a protective tariff than is the Senator from Utah, and he interprets a protective tariff in this bill, the report on which he joined in, as equalizing trade conditions here and abroad. Yet he proclaims that there is not more than one article in a thousand of those named in the bill where that has not already been accomplished by the rates in the bill; that the rates in this bill as fixed now, without any action by the President, so equalize trade conditions that they come within the terms of the presidential mandate authorized in this bill, and it would not be necessary for the President to pursue the subject further.

What does that mean? If that be the case, if that be true, then, except for one article in a thousand in this bill, the rates are high enough to equalize the difference in conditions of competition and trade between the American and the foreign article.

Where is that competition going to be equalized? Is it to be equalized in Salt Lake City, with freight rates often equaling the value of the commodity to carry them to Salt Lake City? Or is it to be equalized in Chicago or Buffalo or New York? It is reasonable to assume that the equalization will take place where the competition is met—that is, on the seaboard.

If that is what is meant by this bill, and the President must levy a tariff duty high enough to make the wholesale price of the foreign commodity at least equal to the wholesale price of the home-produced commodity at the seashore, as most of these articles are made in the interior, the moment the foreign article starts toward the interior freight rates are added to its price, accumulating on the price above that of the wholesale American manufacturer, and that will absolutely prohibit its sale in the American market.

The Senator from Utah admits that practically all rates fixed in the bill—the rates in the bill itself—without intervention of the President, are as high as the announced standard of levying duties would require. Therefore, the rates will be prohibitive at the customhouse. It will be so that the foreign manufacturer will not be able to enter this market at all.

If that is the viewpoint taken, of course I do not assume that the Senator meant it to apply to that class of articles which are not produced in this country or that class of articles, such as sugar, of which the American people consume twice as much as is produced in America. Those classes of articles necessarily will have to come in, and I suppose the Senator means to have his statement apply to that class of articles where the American manufacturer is able to supply the larger part of the American market, because in all reason it could not go further than that.

If that is the case, then the very terms of your bill, the admitted terms of your bill, have destroyed competition from abroad. Of course, from a protection standpoint it may be said that the American producer is entitled to the entire American market, and if you were not levying taxes on the American people you might be justified in trying to produce that result; but when you produce the result of giving a monopoly to the home manufacturer by levying taxation at the customhouse high enough—admittedly high enough—to prevent foreign competition, then you are making the consuming masses of the American people pay the price of industrial monopoly, and there is no doubt in my mind that that is what this bill would do.

Mr. SMOOT. I have never admitted that these rates are prohibitive.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; I know the Senator has not.

Mr. SMOOT. I admit that they are protective. Some think they are not. There may be some of the rates which are not, but I think, taken as a whole, they are protective.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. In other words, the Senator thinks they may have overlooked a point here and there and not given what he calls a protective rate. That is probably true. You probably have made a bad guess somewhere; with all these articles to deal with that is probable, but it is not so in many cases, I venture to say. I think you have done your job pretty well, and if I read the rates aright you have established what you call a protective tariff. But the majority of the Finance Committee wrote this bill. They define in this bill what they mean by protective tariff, and the Senator from Utah himself has asserted on the floor of the Senate this morning that not more than one article in a thousand does not come up to the standard—that is, that the rates in this bill equalize the differences in conditions of competition and trade, and equalizing the differences in conditions of competition in trade means that the wholesale prices in the American market will be equalized, and whenever you put your taxes high enough at the customhouse to bring the wholesale price of the foreign importer up to the wholesale price of the American producer you drive the foreign importer out of the American market. You are not merely protecting the cost of production, which is a fixed fact, a condition which can not be changed; but when you are equalizing trade conditions, equalizing wholesale prices, you are levying a tax to protect profits—at least, the wholesale profit, if not the retail profit. When you raise the tax at the customhouse so that the foreigner, if he sells at all, must sell after paying a rate which equalizes the cost of production here with the cost abroad with the wholesale profit added, it is only necessary for the American producer, who is not hampered, who is not tied, who can do what he pleases, after that has been adjusted by a declaration and proclamation of the President, to forego half of his wholesale profits for a short time, drive the foreign competitor out of the market, and then reestablish the price to suit himself.

In other words, admittedly you are preparing to build a tariff wall by this bill which will foster and build monopoly in American industry and do what the beneficiaries of the protective system have clamored for for 30 years, and which Congress has never intentionally heretofore granted them—that is, a protective tariff to protect their profits, a tariff which lets them put their profits on top of their cost of production, and then stands behind them to drive the competitor out of the American market. That is what this bill does, and that is the condition under which you face the country.

I listened this morning with much pleasure to the very clear and able debate of the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] as to whether this clause authorizing the President to equalize trade conditions in the American market is constitutional. I did not believe in the beginning that the clause was within the terms of the Federal Constitution, but the distinguished Senator from Montana clearly convinced me that there can be no question of a doubt on the subject.

It is true that the Congress may delegate to the executive branch of the Government the power to administer legislative provisions, but it has never been held yet that the legislative branch of the Government can directly transfer to the administrative branch of the Government the power to legislate.

When you come to a customhouse tariff act, of what does legislation consist? Does it consist of levying taxes? That is the primary thing. The question is not on what articles you are going to levy primarily; it is the question of levying taxes for the benefit of the Government.

Is there not one equation in the question of levying taxes which primarily and above all other things constitutes the power of legislation, and that is the determination of what the tax shall be? It may be that when the power was delegated to the Interstate Commerce Commission to regulate rates under the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution, which provides that Congress may regulate domestic and foreign commerce, there can be delegated the fixing of the rates, because primarily the rate is not what the Constitution had in mind for regulation, but it was the control of commerce. But when the Constitution gives to Congress the power to tax, the rate of taxation is the primary thing to be accomplished.

In the pending bill it is to be left to the discretion of the President to fix any rate he may choose between nothing and 50 per cent. If that is constitutional, then we may say that it shall be left to his discretion to fix any rate he may chose between nothing and 1,000 per cent and abandon all control of the matter itself. So when there is left discretionary with the President the main feature that should be determined by the legislative mind, the rate of taxation, the burden which the American people must bear, I say then there is an abandonment of the power granted to Congress by the Constitution, and that it has been turned over absolutely to the executive branch of the Government. But it does not stop there.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Does the bill fix any rule by which the President is required to act in the exercise of his discretion?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is in dispute. On some sides it is contended that under certain conditions he has to call these provisions into existence. I contend, and those who believe with me contend, that the provisions of the bill are so indefinite in that regard that they do not fix a rule; that there is no established fact on which a rule is based, and therefore it is left entirely to the discretion of the President as to whether he will put the clause into effect or not. Of course, it is contended on the other side that that is not so, but there is no contention whatever about the fact that as to the rates to be charged the President has the right to exercise an unlimited discretion within the range between nothing and 50 per cent.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Without any rule?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Without any rule. Of course, he does not begin to levy his tax until the rule is invoked that he shall invade the subject, and there is no rule whatever governing his discretion as to whether the tax shall be 1 per cent or 50 per cent.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I would not call the happening of a condition which is requisite to exercising his power a rule within which he is to operate in the exercise of the power, because I understand that he can not use the power at all until a certain condition of facts develops, and then he is authorized to exercise the power within certain limits. But is there any rule laid down governing him in the exercise of his power?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] will say there is. I contend there is not. I mean there is not any definite rule. I do not mean to say that the bill does not talk about it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have not the bill before me. That is the reason why I asked the question.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would read it to the Senator, but it is long and I prefer not to dwell on the various clauses. But I am not basing my argument on that ground. I agree with those who contended this morning that there is no happening of any specific event. We all recognize the fact that we may delegate the power, upon the happening of an event, for the Executive to put into force a tax that has already been agreed to by us; but I say there is no definite event fixed in the bill for that happening; that the happening is a matter of discretion with the President and not a fixed event. However, I am not discussing that at this time. There is no dispute about the fact that when the event has happened, if it does ever happen, the President exercises his power, and that he can fix any rate of taxation between 1 per cent and 50 per cent.

I say the primary thing in taxation is the rate, and that Congress in the bill has abandoned any control of the rate of levying taxation on the American people except a limitation of 50 per cent. If that is held constitutional, then next year it can be made 1,000 per cent or 2,000 per cent, and the Congress can abandon its control of taxation entirely to some subordinate bureau of the Government.

Of course we all recognize that, although we are speaking in the name of the President of the United States, we are delegating to him a power which he could not exercise himself because he has not the time to put it into force. The moment we delegate this power to the President he must turn it over to a subordinate bureau of the Government to exercise for him—a bureau without direct responsibility to the American people, giving to a bureaucracy the unlimited power to control industry, the unlimited power to levy taxes on the American people.

Mr. POMERENE. And that in time of peace.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; and, as my friend from Ohio suggests, that in time of profound peace. But the bill does not stop there. Suppose this is the policy of the Government. This is a new policy that the majority are injecting on the American people, an untried policy that some may be willing to experiment with at the customhouse, but there is no difference between taxation at the customhouse and taxation at home.

If Congress can delegate to the President of the United States the right and power to levy taxes on the value of imported articles coming into the customhouse, with a discretion of levying anywhere from 1 to 50 per cent, the same power can be delegated to levy it on home consumption.

Congress could authorize the President to levy a tax within his discretion on sales of home commodities to produce a certain amount of revenue. We could transfer the discretion to the President of the United States to determine, without enactment of Congress, how much and what the rate shall be in reference to the income taxes levied in America. If we can do that, we can go further and leave the discretion with the President of the United States to determine whether we will raise the revenues which are necessary to carry on the Government by direct taxes on the American people, consumption taxes, or whether we will raise them through an income tax, a tax on wealth. You not only leave it to the President, but when you start into the domain of surrendering the great trust that the Constitution of the United States has given you to protect the American people you do not leave it to the President, but you leave it to a bureau chief, you leave it to a Government bureaucracy to determine what burdens the American people shall bear in the future.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LADD in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Does the Senator object to conferring this discretionary power upon the President because of the range permitted the President—that is to say, that he may be permitted upon proper showing to raise or lower the rate 50 per cent—or does he deny absolutely that discretionary power in any instance?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not think there is any constitutional right in it, but if there is a constitutional right I certainly object to the representatives of the American Government turning their power over to a bureaucracy not responsive to the will of the American people.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Let me ask the Senator this question, if he will permit me: Suppose we fix the rate at 10 cents a pound on a given article and we provide that if upon a proper showing properly made to the President he is convinced that 10 cents a pound is not sufficiently protective of the industry in the United States engaged in producing that article he may raise the rate to 15 cents a pound, fixing the absolute rate, does the Senator say that is unconstitutional?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I undoubtedly do; but even if it is not unconstitutional it is wrong. It has never been necessary in the past. When the Democratic Party was in control of the Government without question for 50 years, industry was not destroyed. When the Republican Party came into power they had the intelligence—although I did not agree with their principle or their theories of levying taxes—to write tariff bills or fix rates on the statute books which carried out their theory of Government. But now, for the first time in the history of this great Republic, we find a party in power which contends that it has not the ability to write a tariff bill which will carry out its protective theories, but must surrender that power to a bureaucracy controlled by the President of the United States.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. But does not the Senator recognize—and I can not make a statement because I have no desire to take him off the floor——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am perfectly willing to yield to the Senator——

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I must content myself with a question.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Just so I do not lose the floor.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I decline to make a statement because I am insisting on the enforcement of the rule. Does not the Senator recognize that conditions now are entirely different from what they have ever been before in the history of the world, that prices are more shifting, that values are more fleeting, that costs of production are more uncertain, and that something must be done besides levying a mere rate of tariff if under the Republican theory of protection we are adequately to protect American industry?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; I do not recognize that. I recognize a part of the Senator's statement. I realize, of course, that growing out of after-war conditions the entire fabric of the business of the world has been demoralized, but the Senator need not be so apprehensive that he will have to change this tariff from hour to hour to carry out his theory to prevent a debacle in American business.

I call to the Senator's attention the fact that the war was over in November, 1918. On the 11th day of November of this good year 1922 four years will have elapsed from the time the war ceased. Business, of course, throughout the world has been thrown out of alignment by reason of war conditions, but the three and one-half years which have elapsed since that time have demonstrated in the average industry of the United States that it was not importations from abroad that were injuring American industry, but that the importations were not serious and in many cases had ceased entirely.

The difficulty with the American manufacturer was that there was no market left for him at home or abroad. He had no market in which to sell his products. Industry is moving to-day. I admit that it has not come back to the prosperous times of four years ago, but there is not a business man in America who does not say that his business is improving at this hour, and it is improving under a Democratic revenue tariff law. The tariff-for-revenue basis the protected manufacturer spews out and discards; and yet on that basis business is coming back; it is not being destroyed. These gentlemen, however, seek not merely to impose certain tariff rates but, under the plea that conditions may change from day to day, from hour to hour, from month to month, from year to year, they seek to give the President the authority to increase the rates whenever foreign competition may so much as put its nose across the international boundary line and challenge for one good moment any rights in the American market. Yet as to most of the commodities which are covered by the pending bill the only way by which the American consumer may be protected from the exactions and extortions of those controlling trade interests in America is to insure some competition. In many cases the only place from which such competition can come is across the international boundary line; but when a tariff tax is imposed such as is admitted here in the Senate to be prohibitive we cease to use the taxing power for the benefit of the Treasury of the United States and use it entirely for the benefit of a certain class of protected manufacturers, for when a foreign commodity can not come in at the custom-house, when it can no longer enter into American trade, it does not come at all; there is no tax levied, and therefore when we build a prohibitive tariff wall we erect a tariff barrier that keeps out importations and at the same time keeps revenue out of the Treasury.

Mr. President, when I sat on the Committee on Ways and Means in the House of Representatives which wrote the present tariff law and reviewed the Republican law that preceded it I found that at least one-fourth of the articles included in the Republican tariff law, except those embraced in the free list—and under the Republican tariff law they were articles which were not produced at home, such as sugar, of which we did not produce enough for home consumption—of the real competitive articles there were more than one-fourth as to which the tariff rate was placed so high that no imports could come in. When I say "no imports" I do not mean that a pair of shoes could not come in despite the shoe schedule, but there was not one-thousandth of 1 per cent of importations compared to the consumption of the American market.

Republicans then were content to erect a wall high enough to exclude entirely competition as to one-fourth of their favored industries, and to cut off revenue to the Federal Treasury to that extent; but now they come on the floor of the Senate and admit that they have prepared and devised a scheme by which tariff rates may be imposed for the benefit of their entire favored classes at all times and under all conditions; for it goes without saying that when we delegate to the President the unlimited power to increase the rate on any article 50 per cent above those in the pending bill, the rate may thereby be raised high enough to exclude from competition in America the article included in the class.

Mr. President, I had not intended to enter upon a general discussion of the bill at this time, but with this important matter up for discussion on the floor of the Senate to-day, I did not feel that I could go back to the item in the bill which is under discussion until I had said a word at least as to why I think the entire scheme of this bill is wrong; as to why I believe it will lead to oppression of the American people; and as to why I believe that, in the end, it will destroy the business and trade of America.

I hope at some later day to be able to discuss the theory of the bill more fully and completely than I am able to do now; but the real purpose for which I ask the floor was to discuss the item which is now before the Senate for consideration, and that is the amendment which proposes to change the rate on arsenic acid from a general blanket clause rate of 25 per cent ad valorem to 3 cents a pound, and on arsenious acid or white arsenic from 25 per cent ad valorem to 2 cents per pound. They constitute two amendments, but are found in the same paragraph and relate to the same subject matter; so I will discuss them together.

Mr. President, I think if you will follow me for a moment and consider this particular commodity and the rates levied on it you will find that what the distinguished senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] predicted a while ago will come true, that the extraordinary power delegated to the President to prohibit the importation of foreign goods into America will only be exercised in the case of one item in a thousand in this bill. It is true in this case.

Now, what is the history of this particular proposal? It has a history behind it. I read a description of the commodity and its uses:

Arsenious acid, or white arsenic, the most important and the commonest form of arsenic in commerce, is an acid anhydride rather than a true acid. It is also known simply as "arsenic" or as arsenic trioxide. Arsenious acid is a white insoluble powder with a slightly metallic taste and vaporizes without melting when heated in the open. Arsenic acid is chemically different and is obtained by oxidation of white arsenic. It occurs in commerce as a true acid, a thick sirupy liquid packed in steel drums, and in the form of the acid anhydride—arsenic pentoxide, which by the addition of water forms arsenic acid. Both of these acids, as well as all soluble salts of arsenic, are extremely poisonous.

Arsenious acid is used in the manufacture of insecticides—

That is the point of the matter. I repeat—

Arsenious acid is used in the manufacture of insecticides, chiefly lead and calcium arsenates, in plate-glass manufacture, as a preservative for green hides, and in the manufacture of arsenic acid and arsenic salts. Arsenic acid is used in the preparation of organic medicinal chemicals containing arsenic, and its salts have medicinal uses.

Keeping that quotation in mind, I desire to call attention to the difference between the present law and the pending bill. The party in power proposes to levy a rate of 3 cents a pound on this important article. The present law, for which the Democratic Party stands responsible, placed this article on the free list. One of the important uses of the American article is as an insecticide to aid the farmer in preserving his crops. In many seasons his potato crop would be absolutely destroyed if he did not have the use of the insecticide, made from arsenic which it is proposed to take off the free list, upon which it is proposed to place a tax of 3 cents a pound.

Let me review a portion of the history of this bill for a moment. I understand that some of our friends on the other side who are very friendly to the farmers of America are saying that this bill will be of great benefit to them, because it raises the tax on their wheat at the customhouse. I will not go into that question; I never have believed that such a tax was of any benefit to the farmer; but we are having placed before us glaring pictures to illustrate how the bill is going to benefit the farmer by an increased tax on wheat, an increased tax on certain classes of cotton, neither of which will ever be of any benefit to the farmer or put a dollar in his pocket. Down under the cover, however, there are found in the bill short paragraphs, which nobody digs out, taxing the necessities of life vital to the farmer, taxing the necessities by which agriculture lives. When the present law was written not only were all kinds of fertilizer which might come into the United States and be of use in the development of agriculture placed on the free list, but binding twine for the wheat farmer and cotton ties and cotton bales for the farmers of the South were likewise placed on the free list, because the bulls of the wheat crop had to go to a foreign market, a free-trade market, for its ultimate market of consumption and fight in that market with the wheat raised by men who did not pay taxes on their binding twine; and the same was true of cotton.

The cotton must be baled and bagged, and half of the crop had to go to a free-trade market to fight in competition with cotton where there was no tariff levied on the bales and the bagging. The present Democratic tariff law put those articles on the free list. Under the terms of this bill you propose to put them back on the tax list and tax them once again, and yet there is nothing in the history of this country to show that either of those industries has been destroyed. You are putting them back on the tax list in order that a monopoly may benefit by higher rates that it will levy on the purchasing price from the farmer.

You have indulged in putting taxes on some of the fertilizers coming into the market, and many of the commodities from which fertilizers are made are embraced within the terms of this bill. You may think the American farmer will not find it out, but he will. It will be known before this bill is many months old, and he will pay the price of taxation for the pleasure of keeping company with you at the polls, if in the future he determines to do so. Here, however, is one of the articles. I will point out some of the others as we go along, but I will not take time to discuss them now. Here is one of the articles confronting you right now; and when the roll is called to put this tax on arsenic, commonly known in the trade as Paris green, used by pretty nearly every farmer in America to preserve his crops, and also necessary to preserve the hides of his cattle before shipment to the ultimate market of consumption, I want to find out whether the column on the other side of the aisle that is going to put over this bill is going to vote to levy these high taxes, these prohibitive taxes, on the necessities of the American farmer, or is going to stand with us and put them back on the free list, where they belong. There is no reason why these articles should not be on the free list, and none whatever as to this particular article.

We have often found previous Republican tariff bills taxing fertilizers and taxing the other necessities of farm life, but on this article they are starting to make a new rule. Under the act of 1909, known as the Payne-Aldrich Act, this article was on the free list. Under the present law, the law for which the Democratic Party stands responsible, it is on the free list. Such competition as comes comes freely to hold down the price; and this is not alone for the benefit of the American farmer. The American consumer gets the benefit of this. Put the tax on this article to a prohibitive point, put it so high that the American farmer can no longer afford to use the article, and a large portion of his crop will be destroyed by insects; and when that happens the consumer in the city will pay the price, because in the last analysis, with short food crops, the man who works in the city must pay for the result.

Here are the facts in this case:

The domestic production—

And what is meant by "domestic production"? It means the production here under free-trade conditions, because for nearly a quarter of a century there has been no tax on this article, but there has been absolutely free competition from abroad. Let us see what the American production is.

The domestic production of white arsenic has increased from 1,497 short tons in 1910—

The Payne-Aldrich Act, if I remember rightly, was signed in 1909; so, under the glorious protection of free trade the production of this arsenic—has increased from 1,497 short tons in 1910 to 6,323 short tons, valued at $1,213,000, in 1918. The 1919 output was 6,029 tons.

Remember that the war had been over more than a year at the close of the calendar year 1919 and the conditions were free trade.

White arsenic is obtained chiefly in the United States as a by-product of smelting copper and lead ores.

Understand it is a by-product of the smelting industry. I might say "the smelting monopoly," but I will not, because I do not believe in abuse, but we all know that the smelting industry is in the hands of a very few producers and that arsenic is not made as their primary purpose. It is a refuse, a by-product that is thrown off, and of course a few men can get together and put the price at whatever figure they want to in the future unless you allow some competition to come in from abroad to regulate their prices. They just simply ask that you take from the pockets of the American farmer and the other people who use this commodity 3 cents a pound for their benefit, because you can not say that the industry has gone down under free trade. In 12 years under free-trade conditions it has increased from 1,497 short tons to 6,323 short tons.

How much have been the imports?

Imports of arsenic and arsenious acids from 1908 to 1918 have averaged—

Of course, a good deal of this period was before the war and not governed by war conditions—

2,725,575 pounds, valued at $126,828.

It is readily to be seen that the importations under free-trade conditions, as shown by that statement, on the average have amounted to only about 10 per cent of the American consumption. In the year 1921 they were greater, and they have varied from time to time; but, according to this book, the unit value of this article coming into the customhouse—and that means, under the present law, the value in the country from which it was imported—is 8 cents a pound. The House bill put a tax of 25 per cent on it. The Senate was not content with that. It put a tax of 3 cents a pound—which is over 33⅓ per cent on a value of 8 cents a pound, nearly 40 per cent—on this article that the farmer has to pay for, when the importations over a period of years were only about 10 per cent. But even if the importations were a third of the American productive value—and that is the extreme limit to which they could claim them—bear in mind that this product is a by-product of the smelting industry, that it is not a necessity for them to make of itself, that whatever price they get out of it is their profit. Are not the American people under conditions of that kind entitled to have free importation of a great necessity of life of this kind? It is not destructive of American industry, because American industry has been built up, has increased as much ar fourfold, under the existing free-trade conditions, without taxation.

I do not know who is responsible for this tax, who put it into the law, but I do know that a very large proportion of the smelting industry is carried on in the far West, and of course they have to pay the freight rate to the Atlantic seaboard. There is no doubt in my mind that greed to control this market, and put up the price, has made them insist on a tariff rate on white arsenic, a component part of Paris green, a necessity for plant life, and to make the American people pay their freight rates through a tariff tax and an increased rate, so that they can not only compete at the American seaboard, but drive foreign competition out of the country entirely.

If that is the kind of law you want to pass and put on the statute books, of course, you can do it. There may not be a great many millions involved; it may not mean a great deal of money to each farmer in the country. It may be a comparatively small amount which will be taken out of his pocket every year, but you are pursuing the theory in the passage of this bill which you announced, that you have a right to go down into his pocket and take his money out in order that a monopoly such as this may flourish in industry, and make him pay the price of that monopoly.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator made a remark with reference to the present foreign price of this product, 8 cents a pound. The Senator was correct in his statement. The remark the Senator has made gives me an opportunity to make a statement which I think is enlightening, when we consider what we have heard as to what influenced the Finance Committee in the levying of these very high duties.

Their contention has been that the foreign price, especially the German price, is excessively low, and that the very low prices which are now being charged by the producers in foreign countries for the goods they are bringing to this country justify these very high rates.

The Senator from Alabama has just said that the present foreign selling price of the product he is discussing, which is arsenic and arsenious acid, is 8 cents. That is true.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is according to the last report of the department.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is shown by the official report. The official report as to the prices between 1908 and 1918 shows that the unit value of this very product, shipped into this country, in 1908 was 4.8 cents; in 1909 it was 3.3 cents; in 1910 it was 3.1 cents; in 1911 it was 3 cents; in 1912 it was 2.9 cents; in 1913 it was 3.9 cents; in 1914 it was 3.6 cents; in 1915 it was 3.8 cents; and so on, showing that the present foreign price of this particular article is twice as high as in any year from 1908 to 1915. Therefore the contention that the present selling price of the foreign product in this country is abnormally low does not seem to be warranted.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Undoubtedly; and it was at those prices that the Payne-Aldrich bill continued them on the free list.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; that is true.

Mr. SMOOT. The figures the Senator read, however, were not only as to arsenious acid, but they included also white arsenic itself. They included both.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; of course.

Mr. SMOOT. There is quite a difference between the price of arsenious acid and white arsenic. Arsenious acid is made from white arsenic.

Mr. SIMMONS. The figures the Senator from Alabama has just given are under the head of arsenious acids or white arsenic. It is a continuation of the other, and the articles are described exactly alike.

Mr. SMOOT. I am simply saying that the prices quoted by the Senator in the report which was made were for both of the articles, because they were both on the free list and they are under one head.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. What does the Senator say the price ought to be?

Mr. SMOOT. The price to-day for white arsenic is 7 cents a pound, and the difference between the price of arsenious acid and white arsenic is between 2½ and 3 cents a pound. If it were 2½, the price of arsenious acid would be 9½ cents; and if it were 3, the price would be 10 cents.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. You adjust your rates accordingly; but if to-day the price is 7 cents, instead of putting a tax of over 30 per cent——

Mr. SMOOT. It is 2 cents on that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. On the first commodity, which you say is 7 cents, you put a tax of 45 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. No; there is a tax of 2 cents a pound on the white arsenic and 3 cents on the arsenic acid.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the price is 7 cents, you put a tax of 35 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. A little less than 30 per cent.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Let us say 30 per cent. I am not going to fall out with the Senator about his figures, because it is not necessary. You tax the importer one-third of the value of the article where the industry is thriving and growing under free-trade conditions. It has developed under these free-trade conditions from 1,400 short tons to over 6,000 short tons, and under those conditions you can not say the industry is being destroyed. It has been growing under those conditions, and yet, according to your own statement, you are asking the Senate of the United States to tax it 35 per cent, not to build up industry, but to put dollars into the pockets of a monopoly which has already grown rich.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am not going to discuss the rates in this item, but I wish to say to the Senator that the war was what brought on the increased production of these two articles in the United States. I know that in my own State arsenic mines were actually opened at the request of the Government.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Arsenic mines?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Does not the arsenic which comes out of the Senator's State come from the refining of zinc ores?

Mr. SMOOT. A part of it does.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I never heard of any other method of getting it.

Mr. SMOOT. There is not an ore produced in the Western country that does not have arsenic in it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly; the arsenious ores, in the production of which arsenic is a by-product.

Mr. SMOOT. No; they are not arsenious ores.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. They are ores carrying arsenic.

Mr. SMOOT. They are lead ores, and nearly all of them carry a little arsenic. We wish they did not, because we are penalized for it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. They produce that arsenic, because they have to get it out of the ore in order to refine it; they produce it in the raw shape, anyhow.

Mr. SMOOT. I know the Senator wants to be very fair.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; and I think I am.

Mr. SMOOT. It was 12 years ago that the first bag houses were put into the refineries of the West, and those bag houses are very expensive, indeed. I do not know whether the Senator has ever seen one of them in operation or not.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have seen zinc-refining plants. I have seen them in the Senator's State, and I have seen them in Tennessee, and I have kept as far away from them as I could, as any other Senator will do.

Mr. SMOOT. The zinc mining is very different from the production of arsenic. The arsenic in the fumes kills all the vegetation for miles around. But in order to save the arsenic, and also to prevent the killing of all vegetable growth of every name and nature, the smelters were compelled, about 12 years ago, to put in bag houses, and to put one in is very expensive, so that the gathering of the arsenic is rather expensive. You can not take the arsenic out of the ore. It goes into the fumes. The bags catch the arsenic, and it is extracted from the bags. Instead of the arsenic going into the air, the bags gather it in that way, and it is produced.

I shall not go into the figures at length, but the production increased in 1919 so greatly in quantity, from 4,100,000 to 6,000,000, from the very fact that every mine which had been useless before the war, I know so far as my State was concerned, was put into operation, and the Government even went so far as to say, "If you make any losses in it, we will make those losses up to you, if you will only operate those mines."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But not on account of the arsenic alone. There were other things.

Mr. SMOOT. I say to the Senator that in the Deep Creek country no ore has ever been handled because it was so high in arsenic. In fact, some of it went as high in arsenic as 15, 16, and 17 per cent. No smelter could possibly handle that arsenic. In fact, that was about all there was in it, with the exception of about half of 1 per cent of copper. That ore could not be handled, but the mines were worked during the war, and that ore was sent clear to Denver, and the high freight rate to Denver was paid in order that it could be run through a smelter especially provided at that time for the handling of arsenious ores.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator from Alabama a question.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Very well; but I was going to answer the Senator from Utah.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Then I will wait until the Senator is through.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Before the Senator from Alabama proceeds, will he permit an interruption?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator from Utah is quite right about the growth and development of this industry. It is only within a comparatively recent period that the copper smelters of the West have begun the production of arsenic in commercial quantities, and the Senator is quite right in saying that they are required to produce the arsenic. They could not operate their smelters if they did not produce the arsenic.

Arsenic volatilizes at a relatively low temperature, and in the ordinary smelting operation for years has gone off in the fumes through the smokestacks. The result of that is that, as indicated by the Senator from Utah, the vegetation within a very wide radius is utterly destroyed. Actions were brought by the Government of the United States against a number of smelters to enjoin their operation because the fumes were destroying the National forests in the vicinity of the smelters, and they were enjoined from operation unless they installed a plant for the extraction of the arsenic from the fumes going off in the air. They do so now, so they produce a commercial product as a by-product of their smelting operations which formerly was lost.

Really, I would like to hear what the Senator from Utah has to say as to why, under those circumstances, there should be a protective tariff on the production of arsenic, which the smelters are compelled to produce whether they want to do it or not.

Mr. SMOOT. So far as arsenic is concerned I will say to the Senator that would be the case if we did not know that if they were compelled to sell their arsenic below cost they certainly would add that difference to the smelting of ores like lead, copper, gold, silver, and every other metal that is mined and smelted in the western country. That is one reason. I have stated twice, I think, why I was not going to discuss the rate upon white arsenic.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator must recognize the amount of custom ores handled is inconsequential. The Anaconda Copper Mining Co. does not smelt, I suppose, custom ores to the extent of one-half of 1 per cent of what they produce, and I am perfectly certain the Utah Consolidated does not, nor does the Clark Smelter, nor does the Ely Smelter.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is right about that; but the Senator knows that the great majority of all ores produced in Colorado, Nevada, Wyoming, and Utah carry a certain percentage of arsenic. There is not a contract that is signed by a producer of ore of any kind with a smelter anywhere in the West that does not contain a penalizing clause for arsenic. For every unit of arsenic that is found they are penalized. The only effect it could have upon copper, gold, silver, and lead—because it generally comes in lead more than it does in silver or gold ores—would be that unless there is this protection, and if they have to sell it below what it actually costs, that difference will be added to the cost of smelting.

The Senator from Montana knows how expensive the process is. The bag houses are very expensive, indeed, to operate. If there is a loss, an additional price would be put upon the smelting of every pound of silver or gold or lead or copper ore.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now we come right down to the proposition. I am very glad to have heard the Senator from Utah. We have this matter analyzed right down to the question involved. Here is a great industry in the United States that is smelting lead or zinc or some other ore commodity. It has to get rid of the arsenic in the ore and it smelts it for that purpose. It throws it off as a by-product. It is not the product of labor. There is a mechanical device that catches the arsenic as it comes off. I do not mean to say there is not some labor used. Of course, somebody must hang up the bags.

Practically it is not a question of cheaper ore here or abroad. The Senator puts his argument on the basis that the bag houses, where they catch the arsenic vapors, are expensive. In other words, he is making an appeal for the capital invested in the equipment that is put up to catch the by-product. I have not heard that in these days the cost of the capital is any cheaper abroad than it is in America. In fact, we know it is not, that we have the money supply of the world, and that the countries with which we compete are paying a very much higher price for capital than we do. But I do not think the American people ought to be penalized in order to protect the capital invested in the bag houses.

Mr. SMOOT. Neither do I, if that were all, but whenever I see a man working in those bag houses, I realize, as I have seen him come out from work there almost a ruined man, that something more is involved. He is handling deadly poison. As the fumes pass through the bag the metallic arsenic is caught by the bag, but that is only a small part of what has to take place. So far as labor is concerned, if any man could be paid enough for working in these bag houses, I do not know what it would be.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would not work there, and neither would the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. No; and I do not believe any man would work there unless he was paid what he thought was sufficient to justify him in taking a chance on his life by going in there and working. That is what they are all paid for.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Undoubtedly, and they would not do it either if they were not getting their price.

Mr. SMOOT. Japan to-day in New York is offering white arsenic at 5 cents a pound. It is not a question, as I said, of discretion, but the law compels the smelters where now located to catch the arsenic and not let it escape. It is true that it is a by-product, but every contract that is made for the smelting of silver, every contract that is made for the smelting of gold, contains no protection in any way, shape, or form, and should not do so. If this by-product is an expense to them, the man who has to go to the smelter and have his gold ore or his silver ore smelted will pay more for it. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama pardon me for another interruption?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BALL in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield further to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am interested in the view expressed by the Senator from Utah in justification of this particular tariff. As I understand him, the man who has custom ore which he takes to the smelter will benefit by the tariff, because otherwise the charge would be greater than it is without the tariff. Let us test that by actual fact. The smelter, of course, being able to market this product which formerly went away in smoke, is in a situation to do his smelting for a less price; but does the Senator tell us that the man with the custom ores can now get his ores smelted at a less charge than before the smelter was able to put this particular product on the market?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I will say to the Senator that they have, and I can name a number of contracts which I know have been made.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Made how?

Mr. SMOOT. They have been made within the last few years at lower rates than before, and it is because of the fact that the price of arsenic has increased.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator undoubtedly is able to show contracts for smelting copper ore that contained a rate less than contracts which were made 10 years ago for smelting copper ore.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not say 10 years ago.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. To what extent will the price which the customer pays for smelting his ore be reduced by reason of the fact that there is a tariff of 2 cents on arsenic?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not say it is because there is 2 cents a pound on arsenic or because arsenic is on the free list, but I know of several contracts which have been made within the last year where there has been no penalty clause imposed, provided the price of arsenic at the time of the smelting of the ore was at a certain figure. That I know to be a fact. If the price of ore is not as named in the contract, then there will be the usual penalty which the Senator knows has been imposed for the last quarter of a century.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The condition of which the Senator speaks of the reduction to the independent producer of the cost of smelting these ores that come to the smelter from outside is not due to the prices, because the price in 1918 was 12 cents per unit of value at the customhouse, and that indicates that the price must have been higher in America. It has been a falling price since that time. It went down in 1920 to 7 cents at the customhouse and now has risen to 8 cents.

Of course, the Senator says he knows of a case where some Japenese white arsenic was sold in New York at 5 cents a pound. I do not know why it was sold at that price. I have known almost every commodity at some time or other to sell under the market. It may have been a short lot. The storage may have been too great. There could be a thousand reasons. But why should the official report, not the independent cases but the official reports of all the cases, show the situation to be as I read in the beginning?

When I call his attention to the fact that the great cost of production of this article was capital, the Senator from Utah appeals for the labor in these factories. I agree with him, and anybody else would, that the man who is working in one of those factories making arsenic is entitled to the highest degree of wages. I do not know what he is getting now, but I know the wages must be sufficient to tempt a man to take such a job. More than that, I know that if this tax is levied at the customhouse the man working in the industry will not get the benefit of it. It will go to the capital account for the bag houses. Not one dollar of it will go to the American labor in those plants. It never does.

The scale of wages is fixed by wage competition, not material competition at the customhouse, and the result is that if this tax is put on where an industry is growing and developing under free-trade conditions, it will be putting a tax on the farmers of America for an insecticide to protect their crops, and if it succeeds it may be it would make every man in the city pay the price of higher duties for the products on his home table.

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] started to ask me a question a moment ago. I yield to him now.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I would like to ask the Senator whether he stated that the imports were only 10 per cent of the domestic production?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The committee stated it in this book which I have in my hand.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The Tariff Commission gives the domestic output in 1919 at 6,029 tons, which would be 12,000,000 pounds, and the imports, chiefly from Germany, Canada, England, and Belgium, as 8,778,000, which would be practically 70 per cent; in 1920 it was 20 per cent; and in 1921, for the nine months, there were 2,705,000 pounds, or 20 per cent.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The figures I read to the Senator were from the book, Summary of Tariff Information, 1921, relative to the bill H. R. 7456, prepared by the United States Tariff Commission. Whenever I start to discuss this book, some Senator produces some later figures from the Tariff Commission, or from some interested man in the industry, to dispute these figures.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I am reading from the figures at page 18 of the same book.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is what I read.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The Senator will find the figures which I quoted are on page 18, if he will look there.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will tell the Senator where the difference is. He was talking in pounds and I was talking in dollars.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I am quoting percentages.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. So was I.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Eight million seven hundred and seventy-eight thousand pounds of importation against 6,323,000 pounds of domestic production, or 70 per cent of domestic production.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But the "summary of tariff information" to which I have referred says that the domestic production of white arsenic has increased from 1,497,000 short tons in 1910 to 6,323,000 short tons, valued at $1,213,000, in 1918, and that the imports in 1918 were 2,725,557 pounds, valued at $126,000. The sum of $126,000 is just about 10 per cent of the value of the American product.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The Senator hardly quotes the figures correctly. They represent the average from 1908 to 1918.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. And not the total for the year 1918.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The figures quoted represent the average. However, at the last moment, in the year when the figures have not come down to date, we always hear of some abnormal increases or some great development when a tariff bill is under consideration; but in the last analysis we know the industry has grown and prospered and thriven under free-trade conditions, regardless of what the imports were. Nobody has denied that it has grown under free-trade conditions. The Senator from New Jersey may not have been here, but I pointed out that those free-trade conditions existed under the Payne-Aldrich law as well as under the present law; and yet the industry has very greatly developed. Why at this time should Senators favoring this bill come in here and seek to impose on the American farmers a tax that will probably prohibit importations?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield the floor to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I simply wish to place in the RECORD the statement that so far as the domestic production of white arsenic is concerned the importations show a great increase. According to the figures of the Tariff Commission in 1918, as against 12,000,000 pounds which were actually produced in the United States, 3,000,000 pounds were imported from Germany and Japan; the importations in 1919 increased to 8,779,000 pounds, and in 1920 7,479,000 pounds were imported.

As I understand, the demand for protection comes from the smelting companies because of the cost of recovery. If I am correctly informed, a sales price of 4 or 5 cents a pound will not permit the smelting companies to recover it, because it can be produced in Germany and Japan at 3 cents a pound. Therefore, in order to stimulate American production through the smelting companies, if my information is correct—I know very little about the smelting business, but I understand that arsenic is one of the by-products of smelting—it is necessary to protect it against the growing importations from Japan and Germany. If we are to protect the industry, and if that is necessary, it would seem as if 2 cents a pound on a 5-cent pound cost of recovery as against the production cost of Germany and Japan of 3 cents would not be an unusual burden or a large tariff.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I merely wish to call the attention of the Senator from New Jersey to a fact which it seems to me has been the occasion of some confusion in his mind as to this industry. The Senator says that he desires that a tariff shall be placed upon arsenic in order to stimulate production. If the Senator is at all familiar with the smelting industry of this country he will understand why there has been a falling off in production. Smelters have been closed down because there is no market for their copper; and if the smelters have closed down because they can not sell copper, a 2 cents a pound duty on arsenic will not start them up. If the Senator will merely look over the statistics he will find that the increased importations of arsenic were during those periods when the smelters were closed down. Last year some of the smelters started up again, and the Senator will find that the importations of arsenic began to fall off so that in the first nine months of 1921 the importations of arsenic were only 2,705,000 pounds. I repeat, there is no hope of starting up any smelter by putting a duty of 2 cents a pound on arsenic.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Of course the Senator from New Mexico knows more about the smelting business than I do. I only have before me the hearings. The Senator comes from a section which I presume is very largely interested in the mining of copper, and, therefore, he knows something about it; but I am reading from the testimony before the committee given by Mr. Loeb, the vice president of the American Smelting & Refining Co., who says:

> On the general theory that the country is interested in conserving its raw materials, we believe the prices of arsenic are not high enough to warrant its recovery as a by-product. A sales price of 4 cents or 5 cents a pound will not warrant its recovery; whereas a selling price of 7 or 8 cents a pound will, in our opinion, warrant its recovery.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, Mr. Loeb knows they have got to recover it whether they want to or not.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I am simply reading from the statement in the hearings, and trying to arrive at some conclusion as to what duty it is necessary to impose. If the domestic producer is facing a 3-cent production cost in Germany and Japan, which countries export this commodity, I presume that 2 cents is not an unusually high or outrageous tariff to protect the American industry against foreign importations. Of course, if it is desired that arsenic should come in free; if it is desired to have a competitive foreign market against our American market, the commodity should be free; but I do not subscribe to that theory. I think that this by-product is entitled to protection just the same as manufactured products, and, therefore, I do not think that a duty of 2 cents a pound is outrageous or too high.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I think that arsenic is one of those articles as to which we have been having competition in such way as to keep the price down to a reasonable point. Putting a duty upon arsenic will have the effect of increasing its price without stimulating the industry at all, and it seems to me that, according to the protection theory, the proposed duty is not justified, but is a mere gift. We might just as well say to the smelting interests, "Your coal is costing you a little too much, and therefore we will levy a tax upon something else, and raise money to lower your coal prices." The recovery of arsenic is a thing which is compelled by the courts of the country. My notion is that the proposed tariff rate would be a gift to the smelting industry, amounting to about a quarter of a million dollars a year. I think that would be the effect of it.

The proposed duty will not increase the production of arsenic at all, but will simply constitute a present to that industry of about a quarter of a million dollars a year. If we want to tax the people in order to make a present to the industry—and I repeat that they are forced to recover arsenic in the smelting of ores—we might just as well buy their coal for them or do anything else for them and tax the people to pay the bill.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Before the Senator makes that suggestion, will he yield to me for a moment?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I withhold the suggestion.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. As a contribution to this discussion I wish to read a brief report on this industry by Mr. V. C. Heikes, statistician of the United States Geological Survey, as follows:

ARSENIC INDUSTRY.

(By V. C. Heikes, statistician, U. S. Geological Survey, Salt Lake, Utah.)

Producers of arsenic in the United States marketed in 1921 approximately 5,732 short tons of crude and refined white arsenic, compared with 11,502 tons, valued at $2,021,356, in 1920. A considerable amount of arsenic is held at points of production and in consumers' hands and only a small quantity of the supply was manufactured into fungicides.

Large stocks of calcium arsenate, said to aggregate 5,000 tons, were reported at the close of 1920, so the situation was not encouraging to producers. A part of the supply was sold in 1921, and the remaining portion, about 1,000 tons, which had begun to deteriorate, was in the hands of manufacturers and distributers. These warehouse stocks of insecticides were accumulated by an anticipated demand, so that, when the South did not buy, producers had no outlet for their holdings.

The largest producer of arsenic in 1921 was the United States Smelting, Refining & Mining Co., whose output for the most part was made into fungicides at its Midvale plant. Very little of the white arsenic produced at Tacoma, Globe, and Anaconda was put on the market, and most of this was sold to manufacturers of fungicides and refiners making the higher grade arsenic demanded by plate-glass works.

The price of white arsenic gradually fell from 11 cents per pound in February, 1921, to 6 cents per pound in November, with few offerings. Toward the last of November there was an improvement in the insecticide business, and agricultural buying for spring trade was a feature of the market, with forward deliveries commanding a premium.

Prices for white arsenic near the close of 1921 were 7¼ cents per pound. Red arsenic decreased from 15 to 11 cents per pound during the year, and quotations for calcium arsenate were steady, ranging from 16 to 20 cents per pound.

An increased demand for the products made from arsenic suggests a better price for the raw material in the near future. It is not likely that the foreign arsenic will interfere with the domestic production, as most of it, except that produced in Mexico, will be consumed locally or shipped to foreign dealers.

The future of arsenic production depends mainly on its use in the cotton regions and on railroad rights of way, but there is a prospect that the alfalfa-growing regions will develop a considerable demand, and the use of arsenical insecticides on intensively grown crops is steadily increasing.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, in the year 1919 there were imported into the United States, in round numbers, 8,778,000 pounds of white arsenic or arsenious acid. During the same year there were produced in the United States 6,026 short tons, or, in round numbers, 12,000,000 pounds, so there were imported almost 9,000,000 pounds as against a home production of about 12,000,000 pounds, or, in round numbers, 75 per cent.

The House bill provided for a duty of 25 per cent ad valorem on these articles. The Senate committee, after hearing the evidence which was produced on behalf of the manufacturers and on behalf of the mining interests, were led to believe that, while 25 per cent would be a sufficient ad valorem duty under the present prices, it might not be a sufficient protection in case there was a great reduction in the importing price of this commodity, and therefore they provided for a duty of 2 cents a pound, which would be equivalent to about 25 per cent on the then prevailing prices.

If the price is 7 cents a pound, of course, it would be 28 per cent; if it is 8 cents a pound, as it was in the first nine months of 1921, it would be an equivalent of 25 per cent ad valorem.

I do not know just what part arsenic plays in the production of copper. I understand that in some of the States it is necessary that the arsenic be eliminated from the smoke for the protection of the vegetation, and that it must be conserved, whether it costs more to conserve it than it is worth or not. That may justify the assumption that there should be no duty whatever, because the producers of copper are compelled to produce and conserve the arsenic.

But, Mr. President, I suppose that the value of the mining industry depends not only upon what can be obtained from the copper but also what may be obtained as a profit from the sale of the by-products. It may be that there are other causes which entirely govern the production of copper, but the testimony before the committee was that the arsenic would not be recovered and sold for less than 7 cents per pound.

The evidence further substantiated the claim that with 8 cents as the selling price they would practically need no duty, but that it might be produced in the foreign countries for about 3 cents; that it was then being imported from Japan and laid down in New York for about 5 cents a pound; and therefore those interested in the business desire a duty of 3 cents to make up the possible difference between the price of arsenic brought in from Japan and 8 cents, for which it could be sold in competition. The committee gave them a rate of 2 cents a pound, which, as I said, amounts to about 25 per cent ad valorem on an 8 cents a pound basis and a greater percentage, of course, if the price falls below 8 cents per pound. In either event the duty is not a heavy one.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, as I understand it, the rate proposed by the Senate committee is an increase over the rate fixed by the House.

Mr. SMOOT. A little.

Mr. DIAL. I sincerely hope that that amendment will not be agreed to, and I also hope that the amount fixed by the House will be stricken out at the proper time.

We are finding a great use for this article now in our part of the country in trying to protect the cotton crop. Last Monday I saw one of the films which the United States Government is sending out to be used in the picture shows showing the ravages of the boll weevil. They have invented machines which spread arsenic over the cotton. Some of those machines are being propelled by hand, and some even by horses. It is absolutely necessary that we should check the ravages of the weevil; otherwise there would be a very great reduction in the production of cotton. In fact, I would not be surprised if there would not be almost a cotton famine in the next year or two unless we provide a means to eradicate the weevil.

Only last year we made 8,000,000 bales of cotton in the United States, whereas a 10-year average crop was 13,500,000 bales.

The prospect for the crop just now being planted is exceedingly blue. The season has been late on account of floods in great sections of the country which have been overflowed, and the winter was mild, and the weevil has gotten a start already.

I noticed some time ago an account of some experiments the Government had carried on, as a result of which they found that the weevil had multiplied more last winter than perhaps at any time in the history of its existence. The acreage of cotton is being decreased, and to my mind within another 12 months there will not be enough cotton raised in the United States to much more than supply the consumption in this country.

These views are well expressed in a short article published in the New York Times to-day on page 28, which I shall ask to have inserted at the conclusion of my remarks. (See appendix.)

I warn the Senate and the Congress that nothing should be done which would retard the production of cotton. As I said, there will be a great scarcity of that article; in fact, I would not be surprised, if we do not find some way to eradicate the weevil, if in a year or two we will not have to discover some artificial means to stimulate the production of cotton.

APPENDIX.

[From the New York Times, Monday, May 8, 1922.]

SOUTH'S VIEW OF ADVANCE IN COTTON—LAST WEEK'S RISE PARTLY ASCRIBED TO GOVERNMENT CONSUMPTION ESTIMATE—ACREAGE MAY BE SMALL—EFFECT OF RECENT FLOODING OF THE PLANTATIONS IN CUTTING DOWN EXPECTATIONS.

[Special to the New York Times.]

NEW ORLEANS, May 7.—As the southern market sees it, last week witnessed a turn in the tide, so far as cotton speculation is concerned. The change from the long hesitation of the market was in large measure brought about by the Commerce Department's report issued a week ago to-day and forecasting a world's consumption of approximately 21,000,000 bales this season, or virtually a return to the consumption of pre-war times. Since current statistics have tended to bear out this estimate and the outlook for the crop now starting was becoming daily more unpromising, it was not unnatural that people who have been successfully trading in grains and stocks, not to mention bonds, should have turned a share of their attention to cotton, so long neglected.

According to conservative opinion the frequent and heavy rains in Texas and Oklahoma and the almost as frequent if less heavy downpours in Arkansas and Louisiana, coupled with the overflowing of streams in the first-named State and the overflow of approximately 200,000 acres of good cotton land in Louisiana already seeded, have virtually assured a late crop in the western half of the belt, as well as a smaller crop generally than was originally proposed. Owing to the scarcity and high price of good seed, it is not likely that all the acreage damaged by excessive rains and floods in the Western States will be replanted this year, and the Louisiana commissioner of agriculture says in a statement issued Friday that none of the 200,000 acres overflowed by the break in the levee at Ferriday, La., will be free of water in time to replant with cotton this season.

QUESTION OF NEW CROP ACREAGE.

While conditions in the eastern half of the belt are more promising, it is not thought likely that the acreage has been increased on an average much over 5 per cent, and the use of fertilizer will not be very much larger than last year, owing to the difficulty experienced by growers in securing financial advances.

There would therefore seem to be a prospect of another comparatively small crop this season, when production of about 13,000,000 bales is actually needed to meet the world's needs and at the same time leave a sufficient reserve supply. As the southern trade sees it, consumption and exports to date have not only absorbed the equivalent of all last year's production but have so far cut down the carried-over supply from last season that the total carry over on July 31 next will scarcely exceed 4,000,000 bales of American cotton, or barely a normal supply.

Despite the New England strike and the apparent indifference of spinners to the raw cotton market, consumption is running far ahead of last year. It is therefore evident that the mills are rapidly using up their reserve stocks and have been keeping out of the raw market merely because the foreigners have been staying out. Now, however, that the export demand has become active, it is believed in this market to be reasonably certain that domestic spinners will buy more freely in southern markets; in fact, it is reported from Boston that New England mills are buying spots there after showing indifference for many months.

CONSUMPTION AND SUPPLIES.

The statistics indicate that England, France, Germany, and Italy are increasing their consumption of raw cotton rapidly, having in fact consumed 50 per cent more of the staple in the last six months than they did in the preceding half year. Should the Genoa conference result in restoring peaceable conditions on the Continent of Europe as well as in the Near East, traders here believe that there will be an active demand for all classes of cotton goods.

In the meantime supplies of cotton, both at the ports and in the interior, are rapidly diminishing and the world's supply of American cotton is considerably short of what it was last year, hence the possibility of another comparatively small crop, especially so with the growing crop delayed by bad weather and therefore menaced by the boll weevil. The cotton situation is undoubtedly interesting.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] has now invoked a new proposition, one which has not hitherto been discussed. I think it brings into prominence and into very great significance division (b) of section 315. By that section the President is authorized to change rates, under certain conditions which have been referred to quite frequently this afternoon; but I will read it again:

(b) That in order to regulate the foreign commerce of the United States and to put into force and effect the policy of the Congress by this act intended, whenever the President, upon investigation of the differences in conditions of competition in trade, in the markets of the United States, of articles wholly or in part the growth or product of the United States and of like or similar articles wholly or in part the growth or product of competing foreign countries, shall find it thereby shown that an industry in the United States is being or likely to be materially injured by reason of the importation into the United States of foreign merchandise—

He may change the duties and change the classifications, and increase the rates as much as 50 per cent.

This item, according to the statement of the Senator from North Dakota, is a specific item with that very principle in view. It has been stated that this bill is framed upon the policies which are to control the President of the United States.

The Senator from North Dakota stated that, so far as this item is concerned, the producers of the commodity were not complaining of present prices. He said that if they could sell this arsenic at 7 cents a pound, they would not need any duty at all. What is the record upon the subject? According to this report of the tariff commission, the unit value upon which the dufy was levied, which means the foreign market price at home, in 1918 was 12 cents a pound; in 1919 it was 7 cents a pound; in 1920 it was 7 cents a pound, and in 1921 it was 8 cents a pound.

Mr. SMOOT. That is, both kinds, the acid and the white arsenic.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. That may all be true, but they are put together. The arsenious acid and the white arsenic are put in the same sentence; but that is the foreign price. There is no indication here of that foreign price falling; yet the Senator from North Dakota says that is the only reason they want to impose this additional duty. The item is on the free list now, but they can read the future, and; because in the course of time the price of the foreign article may be reduced, they want to anticipate a thing which may never occur. That is what permeates this bill. That is a concrete illustration of what division (b) of section 315 means, when they confer that power upon the President to anticipate injury, which is all they are doing by imposing this tax.

No one complains that he is being injured now. The prices of this product are even higher now than they have been, and the importation is not increasing. It requires a stretch of the imagination even to prophesy as to the injury to this industry in the near future. But that is the only theory on which this increase in duty can be justified.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator knows that in the testimony it was stated that arsenic from Japan is being offered in New York at 5 cents a pound. The figures the Senator quoted, 8 cents, were for the first nine months of 1921, but the testimony shows that the price of white arsenic has fallen to 5 cents a pound.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. What is the date of that?

Mr. SMOOT. It is in the hearings. I do not remember just the date.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. It was last fall some time, according to my recollection.

Mr. SMOOT. It was, perhaps, somewhere along in December.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Those hearings, I think, were had before that time.

Mr. SMOOT. These were the latest hearings, the supplemental hearings.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. We took up those hearings in the order of the schedules. I do not remember just what the date was, but we do not know how much was offered; we do not know what the cost of transportation was, and those foreign prices on which the duty is to be figured do not include the overhead charge of the importer.

Mr. SMOOT. This was the price of the article delivered at New York.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. The witness said:

As a matter of fact, arsenic is being offered from Japan in New York at 5 cents a pound.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Just imagine that. Assuming what was said by this witness to be absolutely true, and of course he supposed it to be true or he would not have made the statement, is that sufficient testimony on which to increase the duty upon this item of such importance to the people of the country?

Even at 5 cents a pound you have to have your dealer's profit figured in; you have to transport it to the place of consumption, and upon that testimony alone—that somebody at some time offered some arsenic in New York at 5 cents a pound—they put this duty of 3 cents a pound upon it, when, according to all the figures of importation into this country during the whole of the year 1921, it averaged 8 cents a pound. This shows what the President will no doubt do when this authority is conferred upon him. He will prophesy, or, rather, some bureau chief will prophesy, as to what the price of arsenic may be next year, and he will add a little higher duty to it. That is all this amounts to. There is no injury so far. The importations are falling, according to the statistics. The price is rising, but it may be that at some time in the dim future the price will fall; therefore we will increase the tariff on arsenic.

Senators, I do not see how you can justify a thing of that sort. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator withhold that suggestion for just a moment?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I am glad to withhold it for a moment.

Mr. McCUMBER. I stated just a few moments ago that it was claimed by the producers that as long as arsenic was selling at 8 cents a pound in this country they would not need any protection. The Senator from New Mexico immediately got up and stated that I had said that if arsenic was selling for 7 cents a pound there would be no need for protection.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. Just a moment.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I want to apologize for misquoting the Senator, if I did that.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me finish my sentence. I was about to compliment the Senator because he had come that near to quoting me accurately. It is the first time since this debate began. The Senator seems to assume that it is his duty always, after I have made an explanation, to rise and make statements of something that I have said that is entirely different from what I in reality said.

I was perfectly satisfied when he came that near the exact facts, but the Senator immediately followed it by stating that I had said this was all the basis upon which we fixed this duty. I had called attention to the fact that it was claimed and the evidence before the committee was that this product was being offered in New York—and, of course, that means duty paid and transportation paid—at 5 cents a pound, and that those who were producing it, therefore, thought they ought to have 3 cents a pound duty, which would make up the difference between 5 cents and 8 cents a pound, at which they stated they could sell it without any duty, but that the committee had awarded them 2 cents a pound. Those are the actual facts in the case.

I get somewhat tired of being misquoted continually by the Senator from New Mexico when I try to explain, and explain fairly, what actuated the committee in making any particular rate. I am ready now to have the Senator call for a quorum.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I am sorry I disturbed the serenity of the distinguished Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. No; the Senator has not done that in the slightest degree. I wish to remain serene throughout this discussion, even though the Senator from New Mexico persists in misquoting me whenever I attempt to explain a matter in the bill.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. On Saturday, I believe it was, I suggested to the Senator a remedy for bad humor and bad temper. The doctors recommend the use of lactic acid. I wanted to have that cheap enough so that the Senator from North Dakota would not be impoverished in obtaining an adequate supply. I desire to renew the recommendation to the distinguished Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. I would suggest that the Senator should look for a remedy that would prevent him from making misstatements of another Senator's remarks in the Senate. That would do a great deal more to prevent ill-temper than any remedy which he has suggested.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I call for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I ask to have the pending amendment stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

So the committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask unanimous consent at this time to have inserted in the RECORD a communication and a very short statement with regard to the proposed duty on potash. It is pertinent to this immediate discussion, and it will save my arguing the matter to have the communication and statement inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

JACKSONVILLE, FLA., May 6, 1922.

Senator DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: We are quite exercised over the proposed duty on potash and sulphate of ammonia which the tariff bill carries, and we are inclosing, for your information, a statement on the subject of the potash duty, which statement we are distributing pretty thoroughly throughout the State, and we are giving it just as much publicity as possible. I think these figures are quite conservative, and have no doubt but what this duty will cost the growers of Florida right at $3,000,000 during the five-year period. We have not mentioned in this statement the duty on sulphate of ammonia of $5 per ton because the figures on this would not look near so serious to the grower as in the case of potash, although we are opposed to any duty on sulphate of ammonia as well.

The grade of potash which is used largely in Florida, viz, sulphate of potash, is not produced to any extent to speak of in the United States, the production so far being largely in muriate and those grades which are used more largely in other sections. I will venture to say that 95 per cent of the potash used in Florida is in the form of sulphate.

I am sure that I am correct in the statement that the entire potash industry in America, including every dollar that has been or is invested in it, will not begin to equal the amount of this duty for the period of five years. It strikes us that this is not the time to be loading up the farmers and growers with charges to increase their production costs; if nothing can be done to decrease the farmer's present production cost, certainly the least we can do is to see that nothing is added to it in the way of a duty on such an essential article as potash.

We sincerely hope that you can see your way clear to energetically protest against and oppose both the proposed duty on potash, as well as sulphate of ammonia.

Yours very truly,

WILSON & TOOMER FERTILIZER CO.,
BAYLESS W. HAYNES, Vice President.

PROPOSED POTASH DUTY.

The American potash producers have been trying very hard to have an import duty placed on potash. The tariff bill, which has passed in the House of Representatives, has been introduced in the Senate and referred to the Finance Committee. As reported to the Senate by the Finance Committee the bill still carries this proposed duty on potash covering a period of five years, as follows:

The first and second year, 2½ cents per pound of pure potash, K_2O.
The third year, 2 cents per pound of pure potash, K_2O.
The fourth year, 1½ cents per pound of pure potash, K_2O.
The fifth year, 1 cent per pound of pure potash, K_2O.
Or in tons:
For the first two years, $50 per ton of pure potash, K_2O.
For the third year, $40 per ton of pure potash, K_2O.
For the fourth year, $30 per ton of pure potash, K_2O.
For the fifth year, $20 per ton of pure potash, K_2O.

It is more than likely that the producers of potash in Germany and France would not absorb this duty, and that the user of the potash would be the one to pay it. If this is the case, let us see what it would cost the growers of Florida.

There have been used in Florida during the past year around 300,000 tons of fertilizer. To be conservative we will waive the constant increase in our fertilizer consumption and reckon on 300,000 tons fertilizer being used each of the next five years.

Fertilizer varies in potash content from no potash at all to a high percentage, but an average of 5 per cent would be a fair estimate. Each ton (2,000 pounds) of fertilizer analyzing 5 per cent potash contains 100 pounds of pure potash, K_2O; in 300,000 tons, Florida's yearly requirements, according to above conservative estimate, there would be 15,000 tons of pure potash, K_2O.

The proposed duty on 15,000 tons of pure potash, K_2O, would be as follows:

First year, 15,000 tons at $50 per ton	$750,000
Second year, 15,000 tons at $50 per ton	750,000
Third year, 15,000 tons at $40 per ton	600,000
Fourth year, 15,000 tons at $30 per ton	450,000
Fifth year, 15,000 tons at $20 per ton	300,000
Total	2,850,000

In other words, on the above basis, this proposed duty will amount in dollars and cents, as far as Florida is concerned, for the period of five years, to $2,850,000. Whoever pays this duty is going to be saddled with a bill for the five-year period of $2,850,000. As to whether that bill is going to be paid by the Florida growers or be paid by the producers of potash, or somebody else, one can not know in advance, but according to history such duties are usually paid by the consumers, hence the Florida grower is facing an increased demand on his resources in the next five years of $2,850,000.

Are the growers of Florida willing to pay this amount for the protection and upbuilding of an American potash industry, or shall this industry stand on its own merits and ability to overcome obstacles?

It is a question of vital interest, and each grower of Florida should express himself to the Congressmen and Senators.

WILSON & TOOMER FERTILIZER CO.,
MAY 5, 1922. Jacksonville, Fla.

Mr. KING obtained the floor.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I merely wish to make a short statement regarding the last vote. Senators on this side of the Chamber had the parliamentary right to move to the committee amendment an amendment which would place the item involved in the amendment on the free list, where it now is, and I desire to announce that after we get through with the committee amendments and reach this paragraph, in due course, I shall then move to place arsenious acid and arsenic both on the free list, where they now are. I think there will be no further discussion regarding arsenic, and if the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] desires a vote on that item I think it may be had without a roll call.

Mr. KING. May I ask the Senator from New Mexico whether a vote has been taken upon both arsenious acid and arsenic?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. A record vote was taken upon arsenic acid, but I assume the vote on the other item will be just the same, and I suggest, in order that we may progress with the bill, that we may have a vote upon white arsenic without a roll call. I am very anxious to proceed with the disposition of the bill, and I therefore suggest that the item placing a duty of 2 cents a pound upon white arsenic be now voted upon. As I understand, the junior Senator from Utah desires to discuss the next item of the bill.

Mr. KING. I am not desirous of discussing it, but if we are going on to-night I desire to say a few words in regard to the matter. However, I should like to have a vote upon the other item referred to by the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. SMOOT. Let us vote, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Finance, which will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 2, line 25, after the words "arsenious acid or white arsenic," it is proposed to insert "2 cents per pound."

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I desire to say merely a word. I have been called from the Chamber for some time during the afternoon, and I am therefore not familiar with the discussion which has taken place with respect to arsenic acid. Much of what could be said respecting that item may with equal propriety be said concerning the item upon which a vote has now been demanded.

I merely wish to add, Mr. President, that the production of arsenic in the United States, if it does not now exceed the demands of the United States, indeed, of the world, very quickly may exceed the demands of the United States and the world. Everybody who is familiar with our metallurgical development and with the great smelters of the United States, especially those that are devoted to the production of sulphur ores, is aware of the fact that there are daily given off, as a by-product, large quantities of arsenic.

A few years ago, Mr. President, I had occasion to make some investigation in regard to this matter. In the valley in which I reside there were operated four large smelters. The capacity of those smelters was a great many thousand tons of ore daily. Most of the ores, or, at any rate, a very large proportion of the ores, were what were denominated sulphur ores. Sulphur formed a very large content of those ores. It was not only a by-product but it was a waste product. There were also as a part of the content of those ores large quantities of arsenic. In the smelting operations there passed through the huge stacks, several hundred feet high, hundreds, if not thousands, of tons daily of sulphur dioxide and sulphur trioxide, and some forms of antimony and arsenic and metallic substances, some forming compounds and some uncombined, which were carried by the winds and dispersed throughout the valley, and, indeed, carried into remote sections of the State. The deposition of those poisonous substances upon the vegetation proved injurious to animal life as well as to vegetable life. Sulphur dioxide was at first deemed innocuous to plant life, but when sulphur dioxide, by coming in contact with the atmosphere when it was damp, was converted into sulphur trioxide it became injurious to plant life. I have seen within a few hours fields of lucerne and of corn and of other products transformed from their verdant condition to a burnt condition.

In addition to the sulphur which was emitted and which could be converted into sulphuric acid—and the sulphuric acid interests have been protected here, although sulphuric acid is a waste product—in addition, I say, to these gases injurious to plant life and also to animal life and to human life, solid metallic substances, including arsenic, were deposited upon the plants and upon the trees and which, by being breathed by the people, affected the lives and health of the people.

Mr. President, when the injunction suit was brought it was alleged that the emission of these solids, including hundreds of tons of arsenic, was injurious to plant life and to animal life and to human life. The injunction, which was granted, interdicted the emission of these poisonous metallic substances, as well as the emission of the gaseous substances which were likewise injurious to vegetation and to plant life.

Two of the smelters shut down, declining to make such changes in their machinery as would prevent the emission of these poisonous solids, while the other two smelters, under a modification of the court's decree, made changes in their plants so that they were enabled to collect and did collect daily immense quantities of white arsenic and arsenic in various other forms. The problem was to find a market for it, and when the smelters resume operations, as they will—they are operating now, but not as they previously operated and as they will operate as soon as the mining industry revives—the problem then was and the problem now will be to find a market for the compounds of arsenic which are produced as a by-product and as a waste product.

Now, it is proposed to put a tariff upon a product that was a waste and is a waste. What is that being done for? What is back of it? Who are the beneficiaries? The same questions might be propounded, Mr. President, as to hundreds of items which are found in this bill. Who asked for this enormous increase in the rate on arsenious acid? Who came to the committee room and offered evidence justifying the infamous rate, the extorionate rate which we find in this bill?

Questions have been asked over and over again, Mr. President, as to the theory upon which this bill was drawn. I have listened with interest to the defenses which have been interposed by the chairman of the committee and by other members of the committee, hoping that there might be some justification for some of these schedules. I was not here to listen to the reasons assigned for the tariff upon arsenious acid. I state now, and I think I can state it without fear of successful contradiction, that there can be no justification for the tariff upon arsenious acid or upon any form of arsenical compounds. In most cases where you find copper ores you will find arsenic. It is a base metal. It is a metal or a mineral which in the smelting of ores oftentimes brings penalties. It is not desired, but it is there. Nature has placed the arsenic in connection with sulphur deposits, with sulphur ores, and many other ores. In order to carry on smelting operations you must have sulphur ores. The sulphur ores smelt themselves, and in the expulsion of the sulphur heat is developed for the reduction of the ores, so that while the sulphur is wasted and thrown off into the atmosphere it serves the purpose of fusing the ores or melting the ores and effectuating their reduction. So nature has placed there the sulphur, which produces heat, utilized and necessary in the reduction of the ore, and it has placed the arsenic there with the sulphur ores, and the arsenic is passed off as a waste product.

Mr. President, when you smelt, as is done in many of those large plants, from 1,100 to 2,500 tons of ore per day, and exceeding that quantity, the sulphur content being sometimes as much as 20 or 30 per cent and the arsenical content being as much as from 1 per cent upward, it is apparent that there will be tons of arsenic thrown off into the atmosphere every month, unless it shall be confined by bag houses and by other processes which modern chemistry is providing. Why place a tariff upon it?

The smelters, as everybody knows—I am speaking now of most of the smelters—have grown enormously wealthy. Take the American Smelting & Refining Co., one of the great smelting trusts in the United States. It has made millions—and I am not complaining—out of its smelting operations. A former distinguished Senator from the State of Colorado was interested in a great number of smelters, and the corporation which began as an infant has grown to immense proportions, and fortunes have been made in the smelting business in the United States.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator has just referred to the fact that sulphuric acid as well as arsenious acid is a by-product of the smelting operation in the case of sulphide ores, chiefly copper ores. I want to inquire—perhaps the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] will be able to tell me—whether the basket clause of this particular paragraph will include sulphuric acid—

> And all other acids and acid anhydrides not specially provided for, 25 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that sulphuric acid will be found in paragraph 1501, and it is on the free list. Therefore it is specifically provided for, and does not fall in the basket clause. I will say to the Senator that from the smelters in the State of Utah alone we could produce rivers of sulphuric acid if it could only be taken care of.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I want to say to the Senator that the situation is just exactly the same with reference to arsenic. We are exactly in the same situation. We can produce more sulphuric acid at Anaconda than the world can use, but it has to be disposed of in some way, simply because the freight rates will not permit its transportation. I think the statistics will show—I have been endeavoring to get them—that a very large percentage of the importations of white arsenic comes from the smelter at St. John, New Brunswick, and my belief about the matter is that they are used in those sections of the country where the freight rates will permit the introduction of the white arsenic from St. John and shut out the arsenic from our western smelters. I feel quite certain that that is why there are any importations at all. It is simply a question of freight rates.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that I doubt very much whether the importations from St. John amount to much. The great part of it, I think the Senator will find, comes from England and from Germany and from Belgium, and I think some little from France. That is my recollection, speaking off-hand now.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I put into the RECORD here the other day the imports from Germany during the year 1921. As I recall, there was no importation of arsenic. The tariff summary on page 18 contains this statement:

Imports of arsenic and arsenious acids from 1908 to 1918 have averaged 2,725,575 pounds, valued at $126,828, and have come chiefly from Germany, Canada, England, and Belgium. Later statistics follow.

And it appears here that in nine months of 1921 the quantity imported was 2,705,625 pounds, of the value of $216,276, and that the unit value was 8 cents per pound—more than in 1919 and 1920.

I repeat, Mr. President, that the production of arsenic in the smelters of the United States and elsewhere in the United States is greatly in excess of the needs of the United States, and we could export it. The reason why there are any imports, perhaps, is the one suggested by my friend from Montana, that the freight rates from the West may be so high as to prevent the shipment. I know, however, that the production of arsenic is so great in the smelters where bag houses have been installed that it can more than supply the needs of the United States. I can not understand the reason for this tariff.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah further yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. KING. I do.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Assuming that the bill is built on the basis of equalizing the difference in the cost of production in the United States and abroad, or at least that that is the principal element in fixing the rates carried by the bill, what evidence have we that arsenic can be produced at less cost in Germany than in Utah or Montana?

Mr. SMOOT. We have evidence that arsenic from Japan is being sold now, laid down in New York, at 5 cents a pound.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I understood that reference was made to one shipment, one sale.

Mr. SMOOT. No; the Senator said that perhaps it applied only to one sale. The Senator knows that to-day, with the smelting interest in Japan growing as it is, arsenic can be made there very cheaply.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. What information have we concerning the sale of the arsenic coming from Japan at 5 cents a pound?

Mr. SMOOT. The only evidence we had was that it was being sold from Japan at 5 cents a pound, delivered in New York.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Where is that evidence? Where can we get it?

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me, I want to say that the prices shown on April 24 in the United States were 6½ to 7 cents per pound. Those are the prices quoted in the price list of chemicals and drugs in the United States.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true, and that has been stated on the floor several times. That is the white arsenic. The price of the arsenic acid is about 3 cents a pound more than the price of the white arsenic. The acid is made from the white arsenic. I will say to the Senator from Montana that he will find that evidence given on page 5116 of the hearings.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the duty fixed by this bill on arsenious acid is 3 cents per pound.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. KING. The duty fixed on white arsenic is 2 cents per pound. I do not understand the reason for the distinction.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that they are different commodities.

Mr. KING. Oh, I understand that. There is a process of oxidation; that is all.

Mr. SMOOT. One is manufactured from the other, and it is a further manufactured process.

Mr. KING. I think the statement contained in the survey is substantially correct, that—

Arsenious acid, or white arsenic, the most important and the commonest form of arsenic in commerce, is an acid anhydride rather than a true acid. * * * Arsenious acid is a white insoluble powder with a slightly metallic taste. * * * Arsenic acid is chemically different and is obtained by oxidation of white arsenic.

It would appear that a further process is required in converting the arsenious acid into the arsenic acid; so that if there is any differential it ought to be in favor of the arsenic acid rather than in favor of the arsenious acid, because it requires an additional step in the development.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STERLING in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to his colleague?

Mr. KING. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to my colleague that that is exactly the way it is—3 cents on one, and 2 cents on the other. If my colleague will read the paragraph carefully, he will find it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, I think a little confusion arises from the way the bill is drafted. The House bill places the arsenic acid before the arsenious acid, and, of course, in the logical order it should follow it, because it is made from the arsenious acid; and as it is made from it, it is given a higher rate of duty than the article which immediately follows, from which it is made.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I hope I may be pardoned if I am covering ground which was covered while I was absent from the Chamber, but may I inquire of the Senator from North Dakota if there was any testimony before his committee in favor of a tariff either upon arsenious acid or white arsenic, except that found on page 1016, in the brief of A. S. Somers, representing the Association of Dry Color Manufacturers?

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, yes; there was considerably more testimony, and a good deal of evidence of a different character was presented to the committee on prices, uses, and so forth. We went over a good deal of that while the Senator was necessarily absent from the Chamber.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will get the appendix to the hearings on the chemical schedule, he will find there the testimony referred to.

Mr. KING. There may be some testimony in the appendix, but the only testimony that I can find in the hearings proper is the testimony with respect to Paris green, the statement being that—

Heretofore Paris green and arsenic, used largely in the manufacture of Paris green, were both on the free list. The proposed bill puts a duty on arsenic of 25 per cent, and a duty on Paris green of but 15 per cent. It does seem to us that it was not intended by your committee to make any such unjust discrimination against an article manufactured in this country and in favor of the raw material from which it is derived.

I repeat, Mr. President, I can not conceive of any justification for this duty. I repeat that there are produced in the United States to-day large quantities of arsenic which are wasted, and could be conserved if there were any profitable market for the same, and so long as it is a waste product and so long as it is being cast into the atmosphere to the injury of plant life, and particularly to the injury of animal life and human life, I protest against the policy of putting a tariff on it.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that this can not be justified in morals, in reason, or upon any hypothesis or theory which may be suggested by anybody, even the most greedy and selfish.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Does the Senator desire a quorum on this conference report I am bringing up?

Mr. KING. I withdraw the suggestion.

Mr. LODGE. The point has been made, Mr. President, and it can not be withdrawn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Assistant Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Broussard	Heflin	McCumber	Smoot
Bursum	Jones, N. Mex.	McKinley	Sterling
Calder	Jones, Wash.	McNary	Swanson
Capper	Kellogg	Newberry	Townsend
Fletcher	Kendrick	Oddie	Underwood
Gooding	Keyes	Overman	Walsh, Mont.
Hale	King	Sheppard	Warren
Harreld	Lenroot	Shortridge	Watson, Ga.
Harrison	Lodge	Simmons	Willis

Mr. LODGE. I desire to announce that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] is detained on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Thirty-six Senators having answered to their names, there is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of the absent Senators.

The Assistant Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. HARRIS, Mr. HITCHCOCK, Mr. MCKELLAR, Mr. NORBECK, Mr. SUTHERLAND, and Mr. WATSON of Indiana answered to their names when called.

Mr. FRANCE and Mr. RAWSON entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-four Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Sergeant at Arms will execute the order of the Senate.

Mr. BORAH, Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, Mr. POINDEXTER, Mr. PHIPPS, and Mr. NICHOLSON entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the order directing the Sergeant at Arms to request the attendance of absent Senators be vacated.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER FOR RECESS.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask unanimous consent at this time that when the Senate closes its session this calendar day it shall take a recess until to-morrow at 11 o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

CHAS. E. TOWNSEND,
THOMAS STERLING,
GEO. H. MOSES,
DAVID I. WALSH,
E. S. BROUSSARD,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

C. B. SLEMP,
MARTIN B. MADDEN,
T. U. SISSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Michigan if it is not a fact that some of the amendments which are reported in disagreement have been actually agreed to by the conferees, but have to be taken back to the House where the House may consider the amendments and upon which concurrence is expected?

Mr. TOWNSEND. A great many of them. There are only three or four amendments which are in real disagreement.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the Senator what was done with the item about post-office inspectors? As I recall, the Senate put on an amendment——

Mr. TOWNSEND. The Senate amendment provided for 100, and the conferees agreed on 50.

Mr. HARRISON. The number was cut to 50?

Mr. TOWNSEND. It was.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I move that the Senate further insist upon its amendments still in disagreement, ask for a further conference, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to, and the Vice President appointed Mr. TOWNSEND, Mr. STERLING, Mr. MOSES, Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts, and Mr. BROUSSARD conferees on the part of the Senate at the further conference.

THE TARIFF.

The Senate as in Committee of the Whole resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7456) to provide revenue, to regulate commerce with foreign countries, to encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I ask for a yea-and-nay vote on the last amendment of the committee, as to which there was a viva-voce vote.

Mr. McCUMBER. The amendment had been agreed to before the call for a quorum, and it had been so announced, but if we can have a record vote right now I ask unanimous consent to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to, and let us have the record vote and dispose of it.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I may say that we do not care to reconsider the vote by which it was agreed to, but a record vote on the next item, arsenious acid, is what we want.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is the one I mean.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. We voted on the other one.

Mr. McCUMBER. We also voted on this one, but it was not a record vote.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I did not understand it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Therefore, assuming that we have a quorum at this time and that Senators will remain and vote immediately upon the amendment, I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the last amendment was agreed to may be reconsidered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection it is so ordered.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state the inquiry.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senate has agreed that when it recesses this afternoon it will meet in the morning at 11 o'clock. In the event we have a record vote and it is disclosed that we have no quorum; will the Senate then stand in recess or must we adjourn?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate will stand in recess under the unanimous-consent agreement.

The pending amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 2, line 24, after the words "arsenious acid or white arsenic," insert the words "2 cents per pound."

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Assistant Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] is necessarily absent on official business. He is paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL]. If present, the Senator from Kansas would vote "yea" and the Senator from South Carolina would vote "nay."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (after having voted in the affirmative). Making the same announcement as before with reference to my pair and its transfer, I allow my vote to stand.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to announce the following pairs:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, May 8, 1922.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer.

Give ear, O Shepherd of mankind; show us at noonday the light of Thy countenance. We thank Thee that Thou hast not left us to the consequences of our weakness. With our frailties, failures, and fallings Thou dost love us still. To-day make goodness, unity, and harmony the expressions of wisdom; give understanding and godly strength to all and lift the burdens from burdened hearts. Guide, we beseech Thee, the destinies of our country and make happiness and industry natural and abundant. In Thy name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take up the bill H. R. 9981, making appropriations for the independent offices and bureaus, disagree to the Senate amendments and agree to the conference asked for.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to take up and disagree to the Senate amendments and agree to the conference asked for on the bill, of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. R. 9981. Making appropriations for the Executive and for sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes.

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, that report has been back several times, and although I voted to sustain the conference upon the last occasion, I am just wondering what position this bill now is in, the House having gone on record emphatically against these large increases in salary and the Senate insisting—whether a motion to adhere would be the proper motion at this time. I would like the views of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The action taken by the Senate was to instruct the conferees on the part of the Senate to still insist on their position and ask for a further conference. That is the only information I have with reference to the attitude of the Senate. Of course, there is not very much difference between us—only about $15,000. It strikes me that where there is so small a difference there ought to be some way of arriving at an agreement satisfactory to both Houses. There is great necessity for an early determination of the matter.

Mr. WALSH. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker. Is a motion to adhere now in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so, but the Chair thinks that a motion to insist would have precedence over a motion to adhere.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, my understanding is that there is no objection to the bill going to conference.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. WOOD of Indiana, Mr. WASON, and Mr. HARRISON.

CONTINUANCE OF CERTAIN GOVERNMENT PUBLICATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the conference report on Senate Joint Resolution 132, to provide for the continuance of certain Government publications. The majority members of the conferees are called away, but it is the unanimous report and it is very important that we should get action on it to-day.

Mr. WALSH. Are the papers here?

Mr. STEVENSON. The papers are at the desk.

The SPEAKER. By direction of the conference committee the gentleman from South Carolina calls up the conference report on Senate Joint Resolution 132.

The Clerk read the conference report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the resolution (S. J. Res. 132) to provide for the continuance of certain Government publications, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 2 and to the title of the bill, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 1: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the House amendment insert the following: "That hereafter the head of any executive department, independent office, or establishment of the Government is hereby authorized, with the approval of the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, to use from the appropriations available for printing and binding such sums as may be necessary for the printing of journals, magazines, periodicals, and similar publications as he shall certify in writing to be necessary in the transaction of the public business required by law of such department, office, or establishment: Provided, That there may be printed, in addition to those necessary for such public business, not to exceed 2,000 copies for free distribution by the department, office, or establishment issuing the same: Provided further, That the Public Printer shall print such additional copies thereof and of any other Government publication, not confidential in character, as may be required for sale to the public by the Superintendent of Documents at the cost of printing and binding, plus 10 per cent, without limit as to the number of copies to any one applicant who agrees not to resell or distribute the same for profit; but the printing of such additional copies required for sale by the Superintendent of Documents shall be subject to regulation by the Joint Committee on Printing and shall not interfere with the prompt execution of printing for the Government"; and the House agree to the same.

STATEMENT.

The Senate conferees accept the amendment of the House with a slight change requiring that such journals, magazines, and periodicals may be printed as shall be certified to be necessary "in the transaction of the public business." This change is in conformity with the general printing law relative to the printing of documents or other matter required for the executive departments.

The House conferees accepted an amendment which provides that the printing of "such additional copies as may be required for sale by the Superintendent of Documents" shall be subject to regulation by the Joint Committee on Printing, as it was thought that the printing of the 2,000 additional copies authorized to be printed for the executive departments might be construed as subject to regulation by the same committee.

The amendment of the House repealing previous legislation on this subject was accepted by the Senate conferees; also the amendment which amended the title to the bill.

W. F. STEVENSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from South Carolina a question. I notice the provision that the Public Printer shall print such additional copies as may be required for sale to the public by the Superintendent of Documents at the cost of printing and binding, plus 10 per cent, without limit as to the number of copies to any one applicant who agrees not to resell or distribute the same for profit. I wish to inquire whether the plus 10 per cent takes care of the overhead expense of printing these various Government documents.

Mr. STEVENSON. I will say that that is the law now—the 10 per cent is supposed to take care of it. There is no change in the law as far as that is concerned.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the 10 per cent as carried in the amendment take care of the overhead expense?

Mr. STEVENSON. That is what it is intended to do, and I am informed that it does that and a little more. But that was not a matter that was before the two Houses in conference.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am well aware of the matter that was in dispute between the two Houses as to the unlimited publications for the use of the department; but now you are leaving it to the Director of the Budget to control the amount of the publications that may be published by the various departments and bureaus.

Mr. STEVENSON. That is what is being done.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

BIRTHDAY OF MR. CANNON.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, yesterday was a wonderfully glorious day—the first perfect summer day. Nature was in her best clothes, the air was balmy, and the birds were singing their sweetest songs. [Applause.] It was as perfect a day as ever dawned on the earth, and it was proper it should be so, for on that day one of our colleagues, our best-beloved colleague, was pleasantly passing the eighty-sixth milestone of his life's journey.

The evening before there had been a most unusual and for the moment unhappy circumstance. This colleague of ours, by reason of a slight and temporary indisposition, was unable to attend a perfectly splendid dinner given in his honor by his friend and colleague, Mr. MADDEN. He would have blushed, modest man that he is, if he had been there and heard the glowing tributes paid him. To-day, again well and hearty, he is proceeding on toward his eighty-seventh milestone with the good wishes of everybody in America. [Applause.] We regret that when Mr. CANNON reaches the eighty-seventh milestone he will not be with us in person, but he will be with us in spirit, he will be with us in that splendid influence for courage, honesty, and loyalty which he has so long exerted in this body and in the country. We wish him well and all happiness and contentment as he passes on along the journey, which we hope will be as bright and glorious in the future as it is to-day. [Applause, the Members rising.]

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, ever since the gentleman from Massachusetts announced some weeks ago that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] was to retire, it has been a matter of regret to everyone that he purposes to leave the House in the bloom of his youth. [Applause.] Those who have served with him here have had full opportunity for observing him and his methods. I came in the Fifty-ninth Congress, which was the second Congress of which he was Speaker. The newspapers said that the minority at that time consisted of JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS and 136 innocent bystanders. [Laughter.] I have seen it grow into a majority, and then grow worse by going back to the minority place again.

The former Speaker [Mr. CANNON] has been often a source of desperation to the Democratic minority, but always, by reason of his courage, his character, and his intelligence, he has been and will continue to be an inspiration to all men everywhere. [Applause.]

Miss ROBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Miss ROBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, we read of Moses, that he was "an hundred and twenty years old when he went up to Mount Nebo. and gave up his care of Israel, but his eye was not dimmed nor his natural force abated." Since I have come here—and I am old, too old to care to speak it out in public; those of you who are curious can look in the directory and find out just how old—I am continually being told by people from home that I am getting younger. [Applause.] First they said that I looked five years younger, and then they said that I looked 10 years younger, and very pleasing it is to feel this comes from associations here. I want Members here to quit talking about Mr. CANNON being old. He is not old. He is young. He has helped to make me a great deal younger by his pleasant words and wholesome counsel. I am looking forward to coming back here. I hope to come back here for one term after this anyway. One of the greatest joys I can think of is that Mr. CANNON will be back here in Washington and coming in here to see whether we are all behaving. So let us not say so many good-byes, but tell him just to come back to see us all and see that we do behave. [Applause.]

E. J. HILL AND MARION L. OVERBY.

Mr. A. P. NELSON. Mr. Speaker, I call up from the Committee on Accounts House Resolution 334 (Rept. No. 989), which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 334.

Resolved, That there shall be paid out of the contingent funds of the House of Representatives to E. J. Hill the sum of $186.66 and to Marion L. Overby the sum of $120, being the amounts received by them per month as clerks to the late S. M. Brinson, a Representative in Congress.

Mr. A. P. NELSON. Mr. Speaker, this is the usual House resolution providing for the payment of one month's salary to the clerks of a Representative who has died.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

STELLA M. WEIGEL AND BUELAH S. GIVEN.

Mr. A. P. NELSON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the motion entered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES], with his consent, for reconsideration of House Resolution 320, and I move that the motion do lie on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin, with the consent of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES], calls up the motion to reconsider, which the gentleman from Texas entered on House Resolution 320, and moves to lay that motion on the table. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The motion was agreed to.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by having printed therein an address delivered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. TYSON] recently in Montgomery, Ala.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The address referred to is as follows:

SPEECH OF HON. JOHN R. TYSON, MEMBER OF CONGRESS, TO THE BARACA CLASS, CLAYTON STREET BAPTIST CHURCH, MONTGOMERY, ALA., SEPTEMBER 18, 1921.

Ladies and gentlemen, I am more than pleased to speak with the members of the Baraca Class of this church this morning.

Yours is a great organization—to be more accurate, a great fraternity, having for its aim the fraternizing of men for mutual helpfulness and the promotion and uplift of the citizenship of the community.

You are a band of brothers engaged in the noble work of helping each other to work out the problems of life for the mutual welfare and benefit of all.

You are undertaking to promote and create conditions productive of "blessing"—the synonym of Baraca, as used in the Old Testament Scriptures. To accomplish that result, organization is necessary. This is a day of organization. As men progress, they feel more keenly the need of the natural instincts of their being—that of getting together. It is an innate impelling force, an irresistible one. It is born in man. The savages had their tribes and their chiefs—leaders—a pseudo government.

As man became more intelligent, the more he appreciated the necessity of a system of government, and as civilization advanced, different forms of civil governments were established throughout the world. For centuries, carrying out the tribal idea, he was ruled by kings. It was not until democracy was established in this country that the world recognized that man is endowed by his Creator with inalienable rights such as life, liberty, and pursuit of happiness; that he had the right of self-determination; that people had the right to form a union, an organization, promotive of their general welfare, and to secure to themselves and their posterity the blessings of liberty.

It is under this democratic government that we are living to-day, and it is the duty of all men, thus united, to live up to the obligations imposed upon them as members of that union, just as it is incumbent upon the members of this class and of every Baraca Class to fulfill their obligations.

The member of your fraternity who is unwilling to promote the cause for which it was organized is unworthy and should be expelled. So the citizen of this great Republic, this great organization, this great Union, established for the protection of the lives, liberty, and property of the people, who violates the laws which he has enacted through his delegated representatives should be punished. Such a man is not a good citizen and really unworthy of being a member of the Union.

Under the government established by a free people, maintained under a constitution adopted by them as the supreme law of the land, this people have advanced until they have become the greatest nation of the world. They are the leaders in religion, education, finance, invention, banking, manufacturing, mining, statesmanship, and military strategy. All this has been accomplished as the result of an harmonious union, fraternal cooperation of the representatives of the numerous interests promoted, fostered, and protected by the laws of the country. This people have become the great people of the world by promotion of mutual helpfulness—a recognition by one man of the rights of the other—the subordination of the natural selfishness which exists in every man—the willingness to contribute to the welfare and blessings of our neighbor—a recognition of a mutual interdependence of one upon the other.

Man is so constituted that he can not live alone. He is a social being. He is more than that. He is a spiritual being. There are three entities or beings which he has from the day of his advent upon this earth recognized. Adam, the first man, felt the necessity of companionship and of the blessings of a kind Providence. The three entities necessary to man's existence are God, self, and the other man or woman. It is God that gives us our life and provides the necessaries for its existence. It is the other man or woman who contributes to our social life, happiness, and prosperity. In every relation of life there exists that dependency of man upon man. No matter how much wealth he may possess he is dependent upon the fellowship of his neighbor and the labor of his neighbor to make his wealth produce and upon his neighbor to produce the necessities for his existence and well being. This is also true of the laboring man. He is dependent upon employment by those who possess the means to compensate him for his services. There is, therefore, an interdependence between the two. Without the one the other can not exist, much less prosper. The general prosperity of the country depends, in a large measure, upon the recognition and conservation of the rights of each other. There should be no conflict between the two. And there will not be, if the rights of each are respected, one by the other. If the element of selfishness—self—is subordinated, as it should be, commensurate with the obligations of good citizenship and in the interest of promoting the prosperity and blessings of the people, there would be no conflict between labor and capital. If each would recognize the rights of the other and their mutual dependency upon the other, there would be no strifes and no unemployment. The resources of this country are ample to keep the wheels of industry constantly in motion, with resultant benefits that would bring about contentment and happiness among our people and eliminate that spirit of unrest which now exists as the result of the Great War. A recognition of the rights of man by man would speedily solve the problem of reconstruction which is now being worked out and which will be successfully worked out by the people of this Nation.

You need have no apprehension that this people, this people loyal to all that is good and right, will not be able to solve the many intricate problems that vex the world. The capitalist and the laboring man will eventually unite their efforts in restoring prosperous conditions, and our country's flag will float over a contented and happy people.

I have the utmost confidence that the Biblical injunction, "Let your moderation be known unto all men," will be obeyed, and that whatever differences may now exist between the employer and the employee will be met and handled in moderation, unaccompanied by acts of lawlessness or violence.

It behooves you Baracas, if you are faithful to your vows, that you stand for the enforcement of Apostle Paul's injunction and the golden rule.

I am confident you will find in the noble women of this community, who should be admitted as members of your fraternity, zealous associates in the great work you are doing.

If they are admitted to membership, their activities, earnestness, and devotion to the cause would be an inspiration to you.

APPLICATION OF RECLAMATION LAW TO IRRIGATION DISTRICTS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report upon the bill (H. R. 4382) to provide for the application of the reclamation law to irrigation districts.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska calls up the conference report, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the conference report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4382) to provide for the application of the reclamation law to irrigation districts, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the Senate amendment and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That the term 'first mortgage,' as used in section 12 of the Federal farm loan act, approved July 17, 1916, shall be construed to include mortgages on farm lands under United States reclamation projects, notwithstanding there may be against such lands a reserved or created lien in favor of the United States for construction or other charges as provided in the act of June 17, 1902, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto, known as the reclamation law: Provided, That such lands are otherwise eligible for loans under the Federal farm loan act: And provided further, That the amount and date of maturity of such lien shall be given due consideration in fixing the value of such lands for loan purposes."

And the Senate agree to the same.

M. P. KINKAID,
N. J. SINNOTT,
CARL HAYDEN,
Managers on the part of the House.

CHAS. L. MCNARY,
W. L. JONES,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4382) to provide for the application of the reclamation law to irrigation districts submit the following written statement explaining the effect of the action agreed on:

Said action clarifies the purpose of the Senate amendment, and the language agreed upon is that of H. R. 11074, a bill to authorize Federal farm loans on lands under United States reclamation projects, as reported to the House by the Committee on Banking and Currency.

M. P. KINKAID,
N. J. SINNOTT,
CARL HAYDEN,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the point of order upon the conference report, I would like to have the Senate amendment read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, after line 21, insert:

SEC. 4. The lien reserved to the Government of the United States, however created, for payment to it of construction charges and charges for operation and maintenance, and all penalties required to be paid under the reclamation act approved June 17, 1902, and acts amendatory thereof or supplementary thereto shall not be construed to be a lien or incumbrance as contemplated by this act wherein loans under this act shall be secured by first mortgages on farm lands, to the end that the provisions of said Federal loan act shall extend to lands within all Government reclamation projects without regard to Government liens for payment of said charges, and the provisions of said Federal farm loan act are hereby extended to apply to lands within all Government reclamation projects.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Speaker, the amendment adopted and reported by the conferees is in conformity with the principal purpose of the original bill as it passed the House, which was to enable water users under reclamation projects to secure long-time mortgage loans of Federal farm-land banks upon the same footing as farms not under reclamation projects. The amendment agreed upon by the conferees will effect this purpose more directly, especially for reclamation projects which have not adopted the irrigation district system—which many have not done—than is permitted by the provisions of the original bill as it passed the House. As the bill passed the House in order for water users under any project to avail themselves of the right to secure mortgage loans of Federal farm land banks it is necessary for the particular project to adopt the irrigation district system.

Mr. Speaker, the bill as it passed the House amends the original reclamation law. On the other hand, the amendment reported by the conferees and now under consideration amends the Federal farm loan act. This amendment is copied from a bill, H. R. 11074, introduced by the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency. And while passing I may state that a similar bill was introduced by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY], who is chairman of the Senate Committee on Irrigation. The Committee on Banking and Currency made a favorable report on the Hayden bill on the 4th of this month. Contained in this report is a copy of a letter written by Hon. A. F. Lever, farm loan commissioner, addressed to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN], as chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency. That report will be copied in this place in my remarks.

[House Report No. 977, Sixty-seventh Congress, second session.]

FEDERAL FARM LOANS ON LANDS UNDER UNITED STATES RECLAMATION PROJECTS.

Mr. MCFADDEN, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, submitted the following report, to accompany H. R. 11074:

The Committee on Banking and Currency, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 11074) to authorize Federal farm loans on lands under United States reclamation projects, having considered the same, report it back to the House with the recommendation that the bill do pass without amendment.

This legislation is designed to enable the Federal land banks to make loans on lands within United States reclamation projects in the same manner as such loans are now made on lands within drainage districts, road districts, or other form of organization where there is an annual charge against the land by reason of some improvement.

Lands under Federal reclamation projects when sold are disposed of subject to the construction charges due to the United States, and when a price is quoted on such lands it means the price with such charges assumed by the purchaser. The lien created under the reclamation law is a lien that exists by virtue of a statute. In this respect the lien is similar to a lien due for bonded indebtedness which is only to be in force upon the happening of certain things which bring the statute into operation. The Federal land banks in making farm loans now take into consideration the existence of such statutory liens, and your committee is of the opinion that similar discretion may safely be granted to them in making loans on United States reclamation projects.

The Federal Farm Loan Board has submitted the following favorable report on the bill:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
FEDERAL FARM LOAN BUREAU,
Washington, April 4, 1922.

Hon. L. T. MCFADDEN,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN MCFADDEN: In the absence of Commissioner Lobdell, permit me to acknowledge receipt of your letter of March 31, inclosing copy of House bill 11074, introduced by Representative HAYDEN, to authorize Federal farm loans on lands under United States reclamation projects. This bill is very similar to one introduced by Senator MCNARY on March 16, 1922, and having the identical purpose. I take the liberty of quoting for your information the comments of Commissioner Lobdell upon this bill as expressed in a letter to Senator MCNARY under date of March 20, 1922. He says:

"I am to-day in receipt of yours of the 18th instant, inclosing copy of H. R. 4382 as intended to be proposed by Senator BORAH.

"I think that the Federal Farm Loan Board would be willing to authorize the Federal land banks to give consideration to applications for loans on lands under reclamation projects if this bill were enacted, though, as I assume you know, each of the land banks operating in irrigated territory maintains its own engineering department, and would, of course, exercise the privilege of examining and rejecting any project, notwithstanding it were a Government one, where, in the judgment of its engineer, water supply or construction were insufficient or proper provision had not been made for drainage.

"The last proviso of the bill is very essential, and without it loaning in these districts would not be at all undertaken."

Very truly yours,

A. F. LEVER,
Acting Farm Loan Commissioner.

Mr. Speaker, with the report of the conferees adopted and the act approved, the Federal farm loan banks will be permitted to make loans to owners of farm units under reclamation projects, whether the projects shall have adopted the irrigation system or not.

Mr. Speaker, I now yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN].

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I voted in favor of the passage of the Federal farm loan act, which became a law on July 17, 1916. The enactment of that great statute marked a new epoch in American agricultural history. That law made the farmers of our country a preferred class of borrowers by enabling them to obtain money at a rate of interest but little in advance of the rate paid by the National Government. The constitutionality of the act was called into question, and, pending its judicial interpretation, the Federal Farm Loan Board was unable to properly function. On February 28, 1921, the litigation was finally disposed of by a decision of the Supreme Court, confirming the constitutionality of the act in all particulars, so that the Federal farm loan system is now firmly fixed as a part of the financial system of the United States.

The fifth annual report of the Federal Farm Loan Board shows that there were in existence on October 21, 1921, 4,108 national farm loan associations, and that 142,522 borrowers had obtained loans to the extent of $407,702,571 by giving mortgages on lands and improvements having an appraised valuation of $1,121,976,338. The average loan made was for $2,888, and the average value of the 25,627,732 acres mortgaged was $35.58.

In the State of Arizona only 10 local farm loan associations had been chartered up to that time, consisting of 324 borrowers. The total loans applied for were $1,146,950, of which $964,400 had been granted. The value of the 36,569 acres of land and improvements mortgaged was $2,505,097, and the appraised value per acre was $60.27, or about $25 per acre greater than the general average throughout the United States. The average loan made was also larger, being for $3,063. Sixty-five per cent of the money borrowed was used to pay off existing mortgages or other debts.

I have mentioned the conditions in Arizona because they are typical of a situation that has existed in many of the Western States, where Federal farm loans have been denied to landowners under United States reclamation projects. Within these projects there are 32,385 irrigated farms, comprising 1,162,000 acres, which produced crops in 1920 having a value of $66,171,000. These lands represent the best and safest opportunity for loans in the entire West, and to-day we are seeking to enable the Federal land banks to enter this field by extending the benefits of the Federal farm loan act to such lands.

At the time the Federal farm loan act was under consideration by Congress I endeavored to make certain that the lands within Federal reclamation projects would come within the terms of the proposed law. I conferred with members of the committee having the legislation in charge and was assured that such would be the case. In order to demonstrate the clear intention of Congress with regard to this matter, I shall quote from a letter addressed to me in September, 1916, by Hon. Ralph W. Moss, of Indiana, who had been a member of the committee to investigate rural credit conditions in European countries, and was also a member of the Joint Committee on Rural Credit, which had in charge the drafting of the Federal farm loan act:

Hon. CARL HAYDEN,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. HAYDEN: I have your favor making inquiry as to the scope of the rural credit law and its application to include farmers who own farms under our various reclamation projects. I recall very distinctly your interest in this phase of the law during the time we were drafting its terms. I then assured you that we were choosing the language of the proposed statute so as to make it apply to such cases as you have in mind, viz, where settlers hold title to lands but against which holding the Government has a lien for assessments representing water rights or privileges. I still affirm that any fair interpretation of the statute will verify my statement as to the purpose of its framers. This question was presented very forcibly by you and by other Representatives of our Western States.

I was vitally interested in this particular question, because we have in Indiana very extensive drainage districts where the State advances the money to make the improvements and is given a first lien against the lands to secure the repayment of the money so advanced. The State sells bonds and then collects semiannually from the farmers interested, when other taxes are collected, installments to apply on retiring bonds. These payments extend over a period of 10 to 20 years. We have in our drainage districts practically analogous cases to your western irrigation projects. I feel perfectly confident that in all instances where the title vests in the farmer and no other mortgage has been placed against the land the owner can mortgage his land for any one of the purposes recognized in the law.

In this connection, I beg to call your attention to the precise language in the rural credits law as compared with that of the Federal reserve law. I am aware that there has been a decision rendered to the effect that national banks may not loan on lands within irrigation projects until all assessments are fully paid. The Federal reserve law permits national banks to loan on "improved and unencumbered" farm lands. The term "unencumbered" has been held to mean lands without legal assessments, such as unpaid irrigation assessments. Section 12 of the rural credits law uses the term "first mortgage"; we did not pin our faith to the vague term "unencumbered." A mortgage is a mortgage; it is not taxes or legal assessments which constitute a lien against land; but in order that no misapprehension can arise, in the same section the law declares: "Every borrower shall by express covenant in his mortgage undertake to pay when due all taxes, liens, judgments, or assessments which may lawfully be assessed against the land mortgaged." This section in the law carefully differentiates between liens and assessments made under forms of law and that form of security for debt which we denominate a "mortgage," and expressly declares that the land may carry such liens and assessments in addition to the mortgage encumbrance.

I trust that I have made clear the intent of the law. I also trust that you will feel that my assurance given to you while the law was under discussion, that its benefits would be open to such of your constituents as may own lands within Government irrigation projects with unpaid assessments but who hold the title to their land, is fully warranted by the language quoted.

In conclusion, permit me to say that I appreciate the interest you manifested in the drafting of this great law, and assure you that it has been a pleasure to have been associated with you in this great labor.

Very truly yours,

RALPH W. MOSS,
Member Congress, Fifth District Indiana.

Unfortunately, the Federal Farm Loan Board as originally constituted was composed of gentlemen who were totally unfamiliar with western irrigation agriculture, and under mistaken legal advice they declined to carry out the intent of the law. A precedent was set by refusing to make loans on lands within Federal irrigation projects for the alleged reason that the first lien of the Government for reclamation construction charges made it impossible for the farmer to give a first mortgage.

This ruling remained in force on all the Federal reclamation projects until last year, when an exception was made in the case of the Salt River reclamation project in Arizona. At my suggestion, representations were made to the Federal Farm Loan Board that the Salt River project had a different status than any other Federal reclamation project, because under a contract with the Secretary of the Interior made in 1917 the control of the project has been transferred to the Salt River Valley Water Users' Association. Under the terms of this agreement the association, and not the individual water users, is liable for the entire sum due to the Government. I therefore urged that the practical effect of this contract was to place the lands under this project in the same position as lands under an irrigation district where Federal farm loans could be obtained. The Federal Farm Loan Board finally adopted this view and authorized the loans to be made on lands under that particular project.

I am advised that during the past six months applications for loans aggregating $1,897,000 have been made by landowners under the Salt River reclamation project. Many of these applications are still under investigation, but loans amounting to $733,000 have been allowed by the Federal land bank, and 87 borrowers, whose loans amount to $528,000, have actually received the money. On this basis the average loan would be about $6,000.

An exception was made, however, in cases where landowners had obtained title under the reclamation law with a reservation in the patent of a first lien to the United States for reclamation charges. By reason of this exception loans have been denied to 65 applicants residing on farm units under the Salt River project who had applied for loans aggregating $200,000. The enactment of this bill will permit these applications to be promptly considered and will also enable the owners of about 20,000 acres of land in farm units under the Salt River project to make application for loans if they so desire.

Under the Yuma reclamation project applications are pending for loans amounting to $118,500 which can be acted upon immediately upon the approval of this bill by the President. In addition to the pending applications the owners of the 65,000 acres of land under the project may also apply for farm loans, and the Federal farm loan act will likewise be made applicable to the 40,000 acres which will ultimately be placed in cultivation on the Yuma-Mesa.

I have pointed out the practical effect of this legislation, both generally on the United States reclamation projects in the West and particularly with respect to Arizona, where I am personally familiar with local conditions. I have always contended that the construction lien on Federal reclamation projects could not, in its practical effect, be determined to be in any way different from the statutory lien for any other improvement, such as that occasioned by the creation of a road-bond district or a drainage district or even for State and county taxes. In each case the lien is not enforced except upon the occurrence of a delinquency in payment.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SNELL. Is it not a fact that in a great many of these projects the claim of the Government is upon the full value of the land itself?

Mr. HAYDEN. I doubt if there is a project operated by the United States Reclamation Service where the value of the land is not at least twice as much as the construction charge and much more than that. There is hardly an irrigated acre of land in any project that is not worth $200, and the charge is in no case much more than $100 an acre.

Mr. SNELL. The value of the land is the value coming to it as the result of irrigation or reclamation?

Mr. HAYDEN. Exactly so. It is just the same as establishing a drainage district in the East to get water off the land. When the charge for drainage is fixed it is assumed, and it is usually true and more than true, that the value of the land is increased to a greater extent than the charge. So when an individual buys irrigated land the construction charge is taken into consideration with the understanding that the purchaser assumes the future payments. The current or market price of land within a reclamation project is quoted with the understanding that the cost of reclamation is counted in and counted out again by reason of the increase in the value of the land as a consequence of its having been brought under irrigation.

Mr. SNELL. Is not this an entirely different proposition than a general tax proposition for school and road purposes?

Mr. HAYDEN. In practical effect the cases are parallel.

Mr. SNELL. You might own a hundred acres of land and there is no claim and I own a hundred acres next to it and there is a claim for the full amount of the reclamation project. That makes an entirely different proposition.

Mr. HAYDEN. The final clause in this amendment reads:

That the amount and date of maturity of such lien shall be given due consideration in fixing the value of such land for loan purposes.

In other words, the Federal Farm Loan Board will give the same consideration to the reclamation lien as it will to the existence of a tax lien for roads, schools, and other public improvements.

Mr. SNELL. Is it not an entirely different proposition than a local bond issue?

Mr. HAYDEN. There is no practical difference at all. The reclamation construction charge is payable in 20 annual installments just the same as the annual charge for interest and sinking fund on a road bond issue running for an equal term of years.

Mr. SNELL. It seems to me different when a man had never paid anything and we go and loan him money when he had not put any money into it.

Mr. HAYDEN. The farmers on a Government reclamation project could not obtain a loan from the Federal land bank unless their lands were improved to such an extent that the land could be sold for more than the construction charge. Even then they may only secure loans to the extent of one-half of the excess value, as fixed after a careful appraisal.

Mr. SINNOTT. If the gentleman will permit, the Senate amendment we had in conference was approved by the Committee on Banking and Currency of the House.

Mr. HAYDEN. The way that the terms of this legislation were evolved can be briefly stated. The Federal Farm Loan Board had various legislative proposals under consideration which would enable them to make these loans. The board wanted to make loans on lands within Government reclamation projects because they realized that this is the cream of the farm-loan business in the West. A redraft of the proposed law was finally prepared by Hon. Lysander Cassidy, attorney for the Federal Land Bank of Berkeley, Calif., and sent to the Federal Farm Loan Board. Mr. Cassidy is an able lawyer, thoroughly familiar with conditions on the United States reclamation projects. I was given a copy of his proposal, and with a few minor changes introduced it as a bill, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency. My bill was referred by the chairman of that committee to the Federal Farm Loan Board and favorably reported upon. After a hearing before the Committee on Banking and Currency the bill was favorably reported to the House, and your conferees have adopted the identical language of that measure in this amendment which we are seeking to have approved by the House to-day.

Mr. CARTER. I want to see if I understand this proposition. Originally a Federal farm loan could not be had on irrigated land because the United States had the first lien. Is that true?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes. That is true.

Mr. CARTER. What the gentleman from Arizona proposes to do is not in any wise to interfere with the first lien of the Government, but to provide for a loan to be made on whatever equity the settler may have in the land exclusive of the reclamation charge?

Mr. HAYDEN. My good friend from Oklahoma has stated the case precisely.

Mr. CARTER. Then when the Farm Loan Board undertakes to make the loans it will consider and deduct from the amount of the loan to be made that part of the charges which the Reclamation Service has fixed?

Mr. HAYDEN. It is specifically provided in that part of the bill which I have just read, that the Federal Farm Loan Board shall give due consideration to the amount and date of maturity of the reclamation charge in determining the value of the land for loan purposes.

Mr. CARTER. Then it in no way invalidates the security of the Government either on its reclamation charges or the money loaned by the Federal land bank?

Mr. HAYDEN. Absolutely not. Each lien stands just the same as ever.

Mr. STEAGALL. And as a matter of fact, is not this true, that no attention is given to lands of this character except they are put upon the same eligibility as other lands for loans?

Mr. HAYDEN. There is no question about that. Furthermore, if the Federal Farm Loan Board insisted that it must have a first lien as against the world, loans could not be made anywhere in the United States in case there was a road or a school bond issue or any incumbrance against the land for an improvement.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman from Arizona yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield to my friend from Texas.

Mr. BLACK. Does the gentleman mean to say that a tax levied to collect interest and sinking fund on a road bond is a lien on land?

Mr. HAYDEN If the tax is not paid——

Mr. BLACK. It is subject to levy, of course. The Government has a right to levy in order to collect its tax.

Mr. CARTER. And has a right to the land.

Mr. BLACK. Does not the gentleman believe that if the Federal farm loan system goes into the money-loaning business on these reclamation projects it absolutely goes outside its functions?

Mr. HAYDEN. Certainly not. Upon the contrary it will be performing its legitimate functions by serving a large number of worthy farmers who are justly entitled to this assistance.

Mr. SINNOTT. They are making these loans upon irrigation projects where the Government lien does not rest, and it is rather analagous to the ordinary drainage districts in the different States where the farm loan bank to-day is making loans?

Mr. HAYDEN. The gentleman from Oregon is correct. As I have stated before, irrigated lands should be treated the same as drained lands.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, will it be possible for the Federal Farm Loan Board to make a first mortgage loan before a reclamation project has been constructed?

Mr. HAYDEN. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that a farm loan bank would be very foolish to make a loan on land that was valueless because of the lack of water.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. When will they have the authority to make it under this proposed amendment? After the improvement has been put in?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes; whenever the appraised value of the land is great enough to justify a loan, and not before.

Mr. SINNOTT. The land would have no value in the first instance cited by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HAYDEN. This legislation has been well considered not only by the Members of Congress from the West who are familiar with irrigation agriculture but also by the Members of the Committee on Banking and Currency who unanimously, after a hearing, favorably reported to the House the bill that I introduced. The text of that bill has been transferred to this measure without change and has the indorsement of the Federal Farm Loan Board, which is charged with the administration of the law. The same inspection and appraisal will be made of the lands under the Government reclamation projects as of all other lands where loans are sought. The same careful and conservative management will be exercised and the purchasers of Federal farm loan bonds will be as fully protected. In view of all these precautions, the House should not hesitate to adopt this conference report so that this bill may promptly become a law.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I think we will all understand this matter better if we will consider for a moment the operations under the reclamation law. Nearly all reclamation projects cover two classes of land—public lands and private lands. Under the law and the later practice, the owner of the private lands before the project is undertaken must agree to sell all the land he owns over and above a farm unit, which may be 40 acres, may be 80 acres, may be 160 acres, depending on the project. He agrees to sell it at a given price. That is in order to prevent the owner of considerable areas charging the incoming settler and irrigator an excessive price. As to the public lands, they are entered under the homestead law. The cost of the reclamation of the project runs all the way from $35 an acre on some of the early projects to something over $100 an acre on the later projects. The reclamation settler has had his difficulties in meeting the Federal charges, increased by the fact that, owing to that Federal charge as a first lien, his credit has not always been very good. If he be a purchaser of privately owned land under the project, in the majority of cases he paid or pays a very considerable interest charge on the portion of that cost that he is not able to pay at the time of the purchase.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question there?

Mr. MONDELL. In just a moment.

As to the settler on the public land, he is compelled to make very considerable improvements. Sometimes their value frequently runs into several thousands of dollars, but owing to the Government first lien it is often difficult for him to secure loans except at a rather high rate, the high rate of the region, accentuated by the fact of the first lien by the Government. He needs as badly as any farmer does, even to a greater degree than the average settler, the opportunity to make a farm loan, but he has been unable to do that heretofore because of the provision of the farm loan act that provides that the farm loan credit must be the first mortgage, and the Government first lien for reclamation stood in the way. Now, this bill as amended provides that where under the provisions of the farm loan act a loan could otherwise be made in view of all the circumstances, a loan may be made notwithstanding the Government first lien for the construction charge. It will enable the man who purchased his land from an individual and who is paying a high interest charge to secure the loan at a lower rate of interest. It will enable the settler who is upon the public land and who has gone into debt for his improvements to secure a loan to carry those improvements. The result of it will be, as I see it, not only to relieve the settler tremendously but to make it easier for him to meet the Government obligations, because it enables him to carry his other obligations at a lower rate of interest than he now pays. This is just what we attempted to do in the first instance through another committee than the committee that reported this bill. In my opinion it will relieve the settlers greatly and aid in the collection of the sums due the Government.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman will give me three minutes more.

Mr. KINKAID. I yield three minutes more to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. SNELL. As I understand from your argument, these same debtors are paying a higher rate of interest because their credit is poor?

Mr. MONDELL. Their credit is poor only in this way: No matter what a man's character or reputation may be, if there is a first mortgage on his real estate he is not in the best possible position anywhere to secure further credit.

There is no reason why, having adopted a policy intended to aid the farmer by enabling him to secure a loan at a low rate, a lower rate than the ordinary rate in the irrigation country—there is no reason why that opportunity should not be afforded to the farmer on the reclamation projects. There is, from the standpoint of the Government itself, the argument in favor of doing this, because it makes it easier for the man who owes the Government for the construction charge on his land to meet that payment by relieving him of a part of the interest charge he is now paying on other indebtedness.

Mr. SNELL. Then you would advocate giving the poorer creditors Government money. That is the purpose and intent of this bill. That is your statement in regard to this bill.

Mr. MONDELL. There is nothing to be drawn from what I have said that justifies any such conclusion or opinion. Some of these lands are worth from $100 to $500 an acre. They have a reclamation charge against them of from $50 or $60 to $70 an acre. Many of these lands afford the very best security to the farm loan banks.

Mr. SNELL. Did you not make that statement that I called to your attention in the earlier part of your remarks, that these were generally poorer creditors who had to pay a higher rate of interest? I understood you to make it.

Mr. MONDELL. No. The gentleman from New York is a business man.

Mr. SNELL. Yes; and I try to exercise my business judgment right here.

Mr. MONDELL. The interest charge is in some districts too high for anybody to pay and prosper farming. No man's credit is as good as it would be otherwise when all of his real estate is subject to a first mortgage lien by the Government, and that is true whether it be in Montana or in Arizona or in New York State.

Mr. SNELL. But if that land is worth $500 an acre and you say he owes only $50, I should say he is of a good class of creditor and could borrow money at a cheap rate on the valuation of his land. I am against the letting out of the Government credit at this time.

Mr. MONDELL. Then if that is true we ought to have had no farm loan act. The farm loan act was intended to relieve the farmer from the high interest charge that he was otherwise required to pay.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. This will also furnish another excuse to the poor farmer who is struggling along and holding out his hands in supplication to Uncle Sam—another excuse why he can not pay his construction and reclamation charges, because he has a mortgage and must pay the interest on that.

Mr. MONDELL. I have attempted to prove that it will deprive him of some of the argument that he now has. He is now paying on his local indebtedness a higher rate than he will be compelled to pay if this bill passes.

Mr. WALSH. Surely.

Mr. MONDELL. And to the extent that he is relieved it is easier for him to meet the Government obligation, and by the same token he is deprived to that extent of the argument that he can not meet the Government obligation.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman think that these men will take a first mortgage under the provisions of this act from the farm-loan bank and pay off in one payment all the construction and reclamation charges, and then have this first mortgage run against the project?

Mr. MONDELL. No. I do not think that is what they would do.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, they will not.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not know of any reason why they should.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Do they do that now?

Mr. KINKAID. It should be expressly stated that the right of the Government to collect first will not in any way be impaired by any mortgage given or any lien otherwise incurred, even under the bill as it passed the House. Under the amendment reported here by the conferees, which is now an issue, the Government's first lien is left intact so long as the irrigation district system is not adopted.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KINKAID. I shall yield in a moment. Where the district system is adopted, collection will be made in the form of taxes, and this tax lien will be paramount in favor of the Government to any other lien, including a Federal farm loan mortgage lien.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINKAID. Yes.

Mr. HICKS. Is there any record in the past of the Government ever having collected any of these loans that have been made?

Mr. KINKAID. They have not been authorized by law, but the farm loan banks recommend this legislation to enable them to make the loans.

Mr. HICKS. What percentage has been collected?

Mr. KINKAID. The Federal farm land banks have not been making such loans.

Mr. HICKS. Under the reclamation projects some money must have been advanced.

Mr. WALSH. Construction charges must have been advanced.

Mr. KINKAID. Construction charges have been paid, certainly. The Government has been repaid. About $12,000,000 has already been paid to the Government on construction charges.

Mr. SNELL. This will be a third lien on the land, will it not? The first is the tax lien and the second is the reclamation lien, and this will be the third lien?

Mr. KINKAID. The tax and reclamation lien represent the same liability to the Government.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, and I desire to be informed how much time remains.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has used 20 minutes. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAYDEN. I make the same request, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arizona makes the same request. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for four minutes.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, in my judgment one of the most helpful and constructive laws that was ever enacted for the benefit of the farming interests of the United States was the farm loan act. Under that act more than $500,000,000 has already been loaned to the farmers in the several States on long terms and easy methods of payment and at a low rate of interest. Those loans are made possible by reason of the farm loan system being able to find a ready market for its bonds. The secret of the ability of the system to market these bonds readily is due to three things: First, the Farm Loan Board has been careful and conservative in its management; second, there has been a careful, painstaking system of inspection of the security tendered; and, third, the loans are all made as a first lien upon the land. The latter is one of the most important considerations.

Mr. HAYDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. HAYDEN. The gentleman means a first mortgage; it is not a lien in contradistinction to a tax lien.

Mr. BLACK. That is, of course, understood. The loan of the farm land banks would not take precedence over a tax lien. But we all understand that this reclamation lien on the part of the Government is not a tax lien; it is a real, actual, existing first lien, and, in my judgment, when you open the door of the farm loan system to loans secured by second liens you are opening the way to make it possible to undermine the confidence of the investing public in the farm loan bonds. I do not believe there is a Member on the floor of the House that has the interests of the farmer more at heart than I have. I do not believe there is a man who would more readily aid the western farmers in their reclamation projects along proper lines than I would, but I am not willing to take the responsibility of casting my vote in favor of a measure that, if used as a precedent and followed up along other lines of admitting loans on second liens, might seriously affect the ability to find a ready market for farm loan bonds.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Why can not the farmer procure a loan and pay the reclamation project out of that loan so that his first mortgage would be a real first lien, with the reclamation project paid?

Mr. BLACK. That would be practical in many cases, I have no doubt.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. They can do that now.

Mr. BLACK. They can do that now under the law. Take it in the State of Texas. Many loans are made in the farm loan system to pay off existing first liens, and the lien of the farm loan bank immediately becomes the first mortgage. Under the present farm loan act a farmer in one of the reclamation districts could borrow money and apply the proceeds to extinguishing the reclamation lien, and the lien of the farm loan bank would become then the first mortgage; but that is not what is desired. The thing this bill will do is to continue this reclamation lien, which is a first lien, without any impairment, and then let the farm loan banks take the second lien. I entertain a very serious doubt about the wisdom of doing that, and therefore I shall feel compelled to vote against this conference report.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL].

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I am in hearty accord with all the gentleman from Texas says as to the importance of protecting the farm loan system against any inroads that could be made on these securities and bonds which the land banks offer for sale to the public. But the mortgages contemplated by the amendment now under consideration will have around them every safeguard that exists with regard to loans now authorized by the Federal farm loan act. We will have the same members of the Federal Farm Loan Board, the same directors of the land banks, all of whom have so far shown themselves to be conservative and competent, the same system of inspection that we now have, and the same limits as to the extent of the value of lands upon which the loans may be allowed. The law now provides that no loan shall be made for more than 50 per cent of the value of the lands and 20 per cent of the value of all improvements. This provision will remain in full force and effect.

This amendment specifically provides that any fixed charges upon the land in favor of the Government for improvement for reclamation work shall be deducted from the amount which would otherwise be authorized to be loaned under the farm loan act. So that the land banks will not have any greater risk on any acre of land on which they may make a loan than they have now on land upon which loans have been made. Before any banks may loan a dollar on any land they must ascertain the value; they can only loan 50 per cent of that value in any case, and in calculating the 50 per cent they must include the amount owed to the Government for reclamation work, so that when you get through you have no greater reason for doubting the security than you have under the law as it is to-day. Here is what it does: The law as it stands now discriminates against farmers who have lands on which reclamation work has been done. The only purpose of this amendment is to remove the discrimination and put farmers who own land of this character upon the same basis as other farmers of the country and give them the same rights, making their land available for credit to the same extent and to the same proportionate value. The only thing is that the Government shall have the right to collect its claim for reclamation. There is no impairment of the security of the land banks to the extent of loans made by them. If it is safe to loan 50 per cent of the value of land, I do not see how it weakens one's security to loan a less amount and some one else loan the balance.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. Does the gentleman from Alabama think the reclamation loan is not a real first lien?

Mr. STEAGALL. Not at all. It is a first lien and it is so recognized. But this amendment specifically provides that when the farm loan banks determine the value of the land, and determine the amount which represents 50 per cent of its value, the extent to which it may loan money under the provisions of the farm loan act, they then deduct the amount due for reclamation work and loan the balance to make 50 per cent of the value. They take no more risk than they do on all other loans. The farm loan act fixed 50 per cent of the value of land and 20 per cent of permanent improvements as the value limit for loans. The amendment before us does not change this at all. It only provides that a portion of the 50 per cent of the value of lands may be advanced by the Government for reclamation work, for which the Government may take first lien upon the land. But the security of the land banks for the amounts loaned by them is the same as now provided. This is true, conceding that the system is administered in the same way and as wisely as it has been administered heretofore. If it is administered with the same care and caution as at present, the only thing that this amendment will do is to remove the discrimination that exists now against farmers who own land on which this reclamation work has been done.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman recall any other instance where the farm loan system makes loans where there is a first lien?

Mr. STEAGALL. No; that is what this act is designed to correct. The original farm loan act provides that the Government shall loan only to the value of 50 per cent of the land, and shall take a first mortgage. That is a good general rule, and it works all right in a general way and no hardship results, but there are this character of farmers in the country—I have not seen the figures; the gentleman from Arizona has them and will furnish them. They embrace a large class who have these lands where improvement has been made by the Government upon liberal terms, and this simply provides that these farmers shall be placed upon the same basis as all others.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER. I am in sympathy with the bill, but what is the difference in the terms for the repayment of the reclamation dues and amounts that may be borrowed under the Federal farm loan act? In other words, has the farmer a longer time now in which to repay the amounts due as reclamation charges than he would have should he borrow and repay all outstanding claims from the Federal Farm Loan Board, and is the rate of interest on the reclamation charges different from that established by the Farm Loan Board?

Mr. STEAGALL. I am unable to give the gentleman all the provisions of law with reference to the funds expended by the Government, but I think he states the facts substantially as they are.

Mr. OLIVER. My recollection is that there is no interest charge on the reclamation dues, and for that reason it would be unjust to require the farmer to borrow an amount on which he is now paying no interest. Is that correct?

Mr. KINKAID. That is correct.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KINKAID. I yield two more minutes to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. WALSH. We have now had three different explanations.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Alabama yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman made the statement that this does not remove any of the limitations of safety now carried in the present law.

Mr. STEAGALL. None whatever, except this——

Mr. SNELL. Oh, you do except first mortgages, and that is the vital principle of the whole thing. If that does not remove the element of safety, then I do not know of any way of doing it.

Mr. STEAGALL. If the gentleman will follow what I have said he will see that when a loan is made on land, as provided for in this amendment, the Government will not have one dollar more risk than it takes on loans under the law as it exists now. Only 50 per cent of the value of the land would still be loaned. It does not matter that part of this would be advanced by the Government for reclamation work.

Mr. SNELL. Would savings banks remove that element of safety which the gentleman advocates removing on Government loans here, or would any banking institution remove it?

Mr. STEAGALL. The gentleman seems not to have followed the purpose of the farm loan act. It is to limit the amount that may be loaned to 50 per cent of the value of the land. Only 50 per cent of the value of the land could be loaned under the amendment. Part of it would be advanced by the Government and the balance by the land banks. The security of the banks would be the same as at present.

Mr. SNELL. Why did we put that in if it was not a safety regulation? The gentleman admits that this removes that one safety regulation.

Mr. STEAGALL. Oh, no; it does not remove it; on the contrary, it maintains it.

Mr. SNELL. Very well, then, I shall agree with the gentleman if we do not relieve that first mortgage.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Speaker, I now yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I wanted to ask the gentleman from Nebraska which explanation of this so-called amendment we are to take. We have the gentleman's version and the version of the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], and now the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL] comes forth with an explanation to say that all these other charges are to be deducted, and that, therefore, this does not make any difference in the security which the Government has.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Speaker, I do not know what seeming conflict it is in the statements made by the two gentlemen which the gentleman from Massachusetts, with his keen and ready discernment, has in mind, but I deem it not unlikely it is due to some misunderstanding. But, as I understand the gentleman from Arizona and the gentleman from Alabama, I regard both explanations as sound and in harmony with each other.

Mr. WALSH. And they are correct?

Mr. KINKAID. They are both correct, in my judgment.

Mr. WALSH. That is a marvelous piece of legislation. Here we have two contrary explanations, both of them correct, and each used as an argument for the passage of the bill.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I am quite sure that the gentleman from Nebraska said that the lien for the reclamation project will remain as it has been.

Mr. KINKAID. Yes; with all the strength and all the integrity——

Mr. CHINDBLOM. And with the priority?

Mr. KINKAID. Fundamental integrity that it has now.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. And with the same priority?

Mr. KINKAID. The same priority.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Does the gentleman from Arizona agree to that?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes; I fully agree to that.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. That the lien for the reclamation project will have the same priority as it has now?

Mr. HAYDEN. Certainly.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. After we have made a first mortgage a prior priority?

Mr. HAYDEN. The Federal Farm Loan Board can only make loans on the unencumbered value of the land, taking out of the total value the amount of the reclamation lien. For instance, on the Salt River project the reclamation charge is $64 an acre. There is not an acre of that land that is not worth $200. If that is the market price of it, if the land can be sold for that price at any time under the hammer of an auctioneer, would not the Federal farm loan bank be perfectly safe in making a loan of $50 or $75 an acre on such land? Would not that be a conservative loan? Under such circumstances how could the Federal Farm Loan Board lose anything? The gentleman must remember that the Federal farm loan act provides that the Federal Farm Loan Board may pay taxes and other charges against the land if the borrower does not pay the same. We have the same situation here with respect to the reclamation charge.

Mr. WALSH. What sort of a comedy are we going to have and how many acts will there be to it if the farm loan bank should be required to foreclose its mortgage?

Mr. HAYDEN. The Federal land banks would go about it in the same manner as they now proceed when it is necessary to foreclose a mortgage.

Mr. WALSH. They would have the right to foreclose first, but as a matter of fact they would collect second?

Mr. HAYDEN. No; they would collect the loan by selling the land, and the purchaser would assume the reclamation charge.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the ayes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. SNELL) there were—ayes 57, noes 12.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. It is clear there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 243, nays 18, not voting 169, as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT—POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SLEMP. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report on the Post Office appropriation bill for printing under the rules.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9859) making appropriations for the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Ordered printed under the rule.

PERMISSION TO SIT DURING THE SESSIONS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the District of Columbia Committee may sit this afternoon during the session of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chairs hears none.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House on the matter of procedure.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to address the House on a matter of procedure. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I feel that in a way I owe an apology to the House. I have endeavored to serve the House by giving notice in advance as far as it could be done and as accurately as it could be done, relative to the order of business. The program as outlined for this week included the consideration of District business and conference reports to-day, taking up the so-called "scrapping bill" to-morrow, and the pay bill the latter of the week. Since that program was made it has developed that it is not convenient for those who are in charge of these matters to take up District business or more than one conference report to-day, and owing to my desire—a desire shared, I am sure, by all Members—to accommodate the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] in the matter of the scrapping bill, and to bring that bill up if possible when he is able to be here, it was not deemed wise to bring up the scrapping bill to-day, and instead the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] will present a rule under which we will consider the pay bill. I know that there are some gentlemen who are somewhat discommoded by this change in the program and I regret it. I would not have thought of making it if it were not for conditions which make it absolutely necessary. Now, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] having arrived [applause], I yield the floor.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, under the circumstances I submit a privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas submits a privileged report, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 331 (Rept. No. 990).

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 10972, a bill to readjust the pay and allowances of the commissioned and enlisted personnel of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, and Coast and Geodetic Survey, and Public Health Service.

The consideration of this bill thus made in order shall not displace business provided for on special days.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, this brings before the House for consideration what is known as the pay bill, reorganizing and reclassifying the pay of the naval, military, and related organizations mentioned in the resolution. On the 1st of July this year, if this bill does not become a law, the pay of all of these organizations will revert back to the law of 1908, which under present conditions of living would make it practically impossible for the Army and Navy and the Marine Corps, and the other activities connected with them, to exist at all. It is said that this bill grading and reorganizing pay will make a general reduction in the pay of the forces referred to below what they are under the present Budget expenses. I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I would rather not discuss the merits of the bill because of a lack of definite technical information.

Mr. GARNER. I do not expect to ask the gentleman about the merits of the bill. I would like to ask the gentleman, however, when we may expect to consider the river and harbor bill?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I have no information to give the gentleman from Texas on that subject.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman from Wyoming was just saying that this bill was taken up to-day unexpectedly on account of District business not being ready, and I was wondering if the river and harbor bill could not be taken up to-day instead of this, inasmuch as some were not satisfied with the taking up of this bill.

Mr. WALSH. Has the gentleman some peculiar and recent information in regard to the rivers?

Mr. GARNER. I have a general interest in the development of rivers and harbors in this country. Not one dollar goes to the district that I represent, but I do believe in the character of the legislation, and I had hoped that the gentleman would take up the bill.

Mr. MONDELL. What does the gentleman have reference to?

Mr. GARNER. To the river and harbor bill.

Mr. MONDELL. It is anticipated that it will be taken up just as soon as it is possible to dispose of the various matters of legislation now before us, and I hope next week.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman made the statement week before last that it would likely come up this week, and it is now liable to go over for another week, and I thought that possibly we could get from the gentleman from Kansas a statement, if not from the gentleman from Wyoming, as to when it would come up.

Mr. MONDELL. We have gone along steadily with the business before the House.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the remainder of my time, and I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT].

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS].

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, the papers this morning carry quite an extensive report made by the Director of the Budget, acting for the President, as to the alleged savings and economies made by the Bureau of the Budget and the administration during the present fiscal year. I understand that report was prepared and many copies of it placed in the hands of newspapers at least five or six days ago, with the understanding that it be released for publication this morning.

The director states in the report that he is submitting it in response to a resolution introduced in this House, and only for that purpose, but the very fact that he placed the report in the hands of the newspapers five or six days ago and gave no notice or intimation to the Members of the House as to what was contained in it until to-day, when they read it in the newspapers, shows that, true to form, he was more anxious to make the report to the newspapers and to the public than he was to give the alleged information to Congress.

I have not had opportunity to make a very thorough examination of the report, necessarily in view of the few hours I have had in which to analyze it, but such analysis as I have made shows that the facts and figures stated therein are plainly misleading.

It will be recalled that in January the President of the United States, accepting the figures of the Director of the Budget, announced to the country that $136,000,000 had been saved during the first six months of the present fiscal year.

Mr. MADDEN. Did he not say $112,000,000 for the year?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. He did so state in a previous statement, but he declared in January that it amounted to $136,000,000.

On February 9 I introduced a resolution asking the President to give some details of those savings, because his statement was most general and ambiguous in its terms. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations promptly sent that resolution to the President, with the request that he comply and give the information, if it was not incompatible with the public interests. I have understood that the Director of the Budget immediately sent out calls to the various departments and bureaus of the Government and that his immense force of accountants has been very busily engaged for the last three months in the effort to show just where those savings exist. Naturally one would have supposed that the Director of the Budget, having prepared the figures for the President, would have had upon the records of his bureau the figures which would have enabled him to furnish the information to the Congress and the country within 24 hours or less. But not until to-day, exactly three months from the time that resolution was introduced, do we have the report of the Director of the Budget.

Now, what does he say with reference to those alleged savings? He makes this statement by way of apology, I may say, for the statement issued by the President and which was broadcasted all over the country in January:

> It should be understood that this sum of $135,942,975.01 represents reductions, some of which are real savings and some of which can not be considered as savings. Part of these reductions are simply postponed expenditures.

That is practically an admission of the charge that was made at the time that the sums claimed did not represent savings but represented postponement of payments by the Government until the next fiscal year. Whatever he may mean by this juggling of words, it is a plain confession and admission of the charge made that there was no real saving effected, as was stated at that time. The Director of the Budget states that—

> The reduction in ordinary expenditures for the operation of the routine of government generally subject to Executive control in 1922, as compared with 1921, will be, therefore, in the neighborhood of $907,500,000.

It must be noted in this statement that he takes credit for a reduction of $712,594,513.32 in Army expenses. He further takes credit for $192,041,835.58 by way of a reduction of naval expenditures. And he takes further credit of $56,795,268.26 reduction in expenses of the Shipping Board, when we all know that that reduction was brought about by the completion of the immense ship-construction program which was inaugurated during the war. These three items alone amount to $961,431,617.16, showing by his own figures that the actual expenditures for the operation of the routine business of the Government has been increased rather than reduced.

Everyone knows that in 1921 the Army consisted of over 500,000 men and that we had a very large Navy as a hang over of the war. It is ridiculous to say that the administration is entitled to take credit for its reduction to something like a peace basis. It is equally absurd for the Director of the Budget to take credit as a saving for the reduction of the great force of clerks which was required during the war. In addition to this there were large war hang overs in 1921, which, as a matter of course were dispensed with in 1922, and the cost of the necessary supplies for the Government has been greatly reduced, as we all know. And this fact further justifies the charge of gross and inexcusable extravagance on the part of the administration in the ordinary civil activities of the Government, which, as I have shown, the report of the Director of the Budget shows on its face has been very substantially increased rather than reduced. Why, as a matter of fact, the report shows that there has been an actual increase of expenditures in the President's own office in 1922 over the expenditures made in 1921.

It has been said that figures will not lie, but everyone knows that they may be juggled with, and even a casual examination of the immense array of figures by the very large accounting force of the Bureau of the Budget—and which it took that bureau three months to compile—shows that the figures have been manipulated in an effort to mislead the public into the belief that some economy has been effected by this administration. In this connection it should not be forgotten that the appropriations for the year 1921 were made by a Republican Congress, because the Republicans had a majority in both the House and the Senate at that time.

Savings by the administration can only consist, as I have had occasion heretofore to say, of funds which have been saved from appropriations theretofore made by Congress to carry on the Government during the fiscal year for which they were made.

Congress fixes the amount which in its judgment will be sufficient to carry on the routine operations of the Government for the fiscal year for which the funds are appropriated, and that is the sum which a Republican Congress fixed when it made the appropriations for 1922; and yet instead of there being savings from those sums this Congress has had submitted to it three different estimates for deficiency appropriations, one, as you will recall, in August, one in November, and one in March of this year, and all in this fiscal year. The total estimates of those three bills amounted to $477,664,637.62. Congress actually appropriated by way of deficiencies $292,733,916.74 to meet the deficiencies incurred in the executive departments of this Government during the fiscal year 1922, and of which less than five millions, as I now recall, was for prior fiscal years.

If there had been any such savings as are claimed by the Director of the Budget, the query naturally arises as to why it was necessary to make these large deficiency appropriations by way of supplement to the amount originally appropriated by Congress for this fiscal year. Why could not the savings have been used to meet them? You and I know they would have been so applied if they had actually existed. To say otherwise is to accuse the administration of an utter lack of business acumen. Even with these supplemental appropriations the Secretary of the Treasury, in a letter dated April 14 and forwarded to the Finance Committee of the Senate, stated that he would only be able to avoid a deficit on June 30 of this year by postponing until the next fiscal year payment of some $200,000,000 by way of governmental obligations, and the fact that he had postponed those obligations would probably result in a surplus on June 30 of about $47,000,000.

But, my friends, that surplus if it shall exist does not show economy or a saving on the part of the administration, because we are carrying into next year, according to the express statement of the Secretary of the Treasury, $200,000,000 of obligations that properly ought to be taken care of during the pending fiscal year.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there for a question?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. In a moment if I have time. My time is very limited. I have not the time that I wanted and expected to have.

The administration banks heavily on the credulity of the American people, for a reduction of taxes is the only test as to whether or not there has been a reduction in expenditures. The plain fact is there has been no reduction of taxes by this Congress except that carried in the revenue bill on the big trusts and the multimillionaires of this country. [Applause.] The vast body of the taxpayers have had no relief, and I submit, whatever may be the opinion of the administration and of the Director of the Budget as to the credulity of the American people, they are not going to believe and no one can convince them of the fact that there have been any savings during this fiscal year by this administration when they are confronted with their tax statement which shows that there has been no reduction in the amount of money that must be taken from their pockets in order to meet the ordinary running expenses of the Government.

I have said this much in reply to the statement of the Director of the Budget. As I stated at the outset, I have had no opportunity to thoroughly examine that report carefully, but even a casual examination will show that the claims which he makes of reducing 1921 expenses are based on the reduction which was made in the Army and Navy by this Congress and by the reduction in the expenses of the Shipping Board, brought about by the completion of its construction program. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from South Carolina is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I am in favor of the pending rule because I believe that the bill which it makes in order will effect a reduction in the expenses of the military services this year, and I want to urge upon the House that there is a necessity for such reduction of expenditures, notwithstanding the fact that the newspapers of this morning might lead you to believe otherwise.

The fact is that on July 19, 1921, the Director of the Budget Bureau issued a statement claiming a saving, as my friend from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] stated, of $112,000,000. Of this alleged saving, the largest single item was the saving claimed for the Treasury Department of $30,000,000. A few days thereafter I learned that on the same day this absurd claim was published, to wit, July 19, 1921, the representative of the Budget Bureau in the Treasury Department wrote a letter to the subordinate chiefs stating that an analysis of the statement of savings furnished by them in response to Budget Circular No. 1 showed there had been an actual saving of only $2,000,000, and to offset this they had requested deficiencies of more than $50,000,000, and demanded that they make some further evidence of saving in their departments. Notwithstanding the fact that the Director of the Budget Bureau knew this, that there was no saving of $30,000,000 in the Treasury Department, as claimed by him, as is proved by the letter of his own representative, time after time he has reiterated the statement, and now, six months later, he includes in a statement of estimated savings this same $30,000,000. The Budget representative in the Treasury in effect advised the chiefs of bureaus that they could not fool him; that he knew that at best they were saving only $2,000,000, but the director of the bureau goes ahead and attempts to fool the people with the statement that they are saving $30,000,000.

I wish the Associated Press, in carrying its statement this morning, could have carried this statement to the public. I wish they could carry another statement showing what this statement of alleged savings contained. I read on the front page of this paper, in the report of the usually correct Associated Press, the statement that "only such parts of these reductions as are real savings, and not postponed expenditures, are included in the general estimate of savings," and that conclusion is fairly justified from the statement of the Director of the Budget Bureau which is in printed form this morning.

Let us look at the statement of the savings in reserve? The largest single item in the Interior Department is $15,000,000 for pensions. Was that a saving? Do you not know that pensions are fixed by law, and that the reason the department estimated the $15,000,000 would not be expended is that the Bureau of Pensions is behind in its investigation of Spanish-American War cases? You know that payments in those cases will date back to the time when the applications were filed. The persons entitled to pensions are specified by law. The bureau is behind with its work and estimated $15,000,000 would not be spent before July 1. Later they caught up to some extent and withdrew about half of this. If they catch up, all will be spent. And they claim there is saved under the compensation for the World War veterans $35,000,000. Does he mean that he is going to take from the veterans of the World War the compensation they are entitled to? You know that he does not; that it is merely a juggling of figures, and that money is certain to be spent. If they catch up with their work it will be spent before July 1. If they do not, it will be spent after July 1.

I hold in my hand a report of the Commissioner of Pensions, which says for the year 1920 their estimate was $279,000,000 and the expenditures were only $259,000,000. In other words, before General Dawes was ever heard of they saved $20,000,000. When he exerts what he calls executive pressure he saves only $15,000,000, and finally reduces it to $9,000,000. We would save more if we never heard of him. [Laughter.]

Now, as to the Department of State. There is an alleged saving of a little over a million dollars. The largest single item is $750,000 payment to Colombia under the treaty of 1909. In other words, back in 1909, $750,000 was appropriated. Colombia refused to accept it. Director Dawes says it is saved this year. If it was a saving this year, it has been a saving every year for the past 12 years, and we have saved $9,000,000 out of this $750,000 fund.

District of Columbia. Now, this statement of General Dawes would be a joke book if it were not serious in its effort to mislead the public. There is a saving of $100,000 for what? War emergency improvements. One hundred thousand dollars was appropriated for the District of Columbia to repair streets around the Army and Navy buildings constructed during the war. The Treasury could not pay out a dollar of it after the end of the war. It was not spent during the war under the Democratic administration; they didn't spend a dollar of it, and it remains on the books. General Dawes says he has saved it this year when there could not have been a dollar of it paid out of the Treasury on any voucher. Who did he save it from?

Legislative. You do not know it, but he says that he saved $25,000 out of the salaries of Members of Congress. Who did not get theirs? [Laughter.] The only way it could be saved was when some Member of Congress died. Did he kill them? And yet he claims that he saved that amount. I said it was a joke book. [Laughter.]

Recently the Director evidently demanded additional figures. The departments were spending the money they had promised to save. So the War Department came across with an additional saving in rivers and harbors appropriations of $12,000,000. Now, these funds remain available until spent, and to claim this amount as a saving requires colossal nerve.

In the Treasury Department there is a permanent appropriation to repay importers where there is an excess of deposits. Each year the department estimates how much will be spent during the year. To please General Dawes, I assume, they told him they would spend $1,700,000 less than they first estimated. Of course, the law requires them to make these repayments, and they will be made, there being no limit to the amount available, and the reduction in the guess as to how much will be spent will not make the amount greater or less.

He says that $7,500 was saved out of an appropriation for the widow of Senator Proctor, of Vermont. Away back in 1908 when Senator Proctor died this money was appropriated for his widow. She declined to accept it, and the good lady has long since gone to her reward. It remained upon the books to her credit, but nobody else could get it, and General Dawes says he saved it this year. Who was trying to get it? [Laughter.]

Post Office. There is an alleged saving in the appropriation for extra clerks and for transportation of mails. Under the Republican administration you have destroyed the business of the country, and the post-office business was reduced, and if you did not reduce the expenditures for carrying on the reduced business of the post office you ought to be kicked out before the general election this fall.

Here is the Shipping Board saving. Think of the Shipping Board saving anything. [Laughter.] If any gentleman wants to be amused, just read this Shipping Board saving. It is figured out as a saving of 1922, $96,407,509. How does he arrive at it? Listen to this: "A recent analysis of the department shows cash loss in operation for the fiscal year 1921, $148,000,000. The operating losses for the current year are estimated at $52,000,000, which is the actual operation for eight months, and a close estimate for the remaining four months, and the saving is therefore estimated at the sum of $96,000,000." In other words, if they continue to run at a loss, they save money. Think of the business man who says, I have only lost $52,000,000 this year as against $148,000,000 last year, and I have therefore saved $96,000,000. That is saving money in a way that only the Bureau of the Budget can do it. It shows that the Bureau of the Budget has been transformed from a bureau for the collection of information to a bureau for the distribution of bunk. [Laughter and applause.]

Pay of the Army. When I introduced an amendment fixing the Army at 150,000 men they said it could not be reduced to this figure before October 1, and they fixed the appropriation for the larger Army up until October 1. But we gave the boys the right to apply for a discharge, and they did apply for discharges; they got out in a hurry, long before October 1, and they could not spend the money because the boys were out of the Army. Against the protest of the Republican House organization and against the written protest of the President we saved this $2,000,000, and then it is claimed the saving should be credited up to General Dawes and the President.

Vocational Board. We appropriated money for the Vocational Board based on the appropriation of the States. The National Government could not spend a dollar more than the State spends, and because some States have not put up their funds there is an amount unexpended in this fund which no official of the General Government has any discretion in saving. I wish the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER] would read the list of alleged savings that are made in the Indian Bureau. It looks like an advertisement of the Piggly Wiggly stores. [Laughter.] And item after item includes funds that remain available during the next year and will be spent. Why, we are going to save $19,000,000 in the Treasury Department in the Supervising Architect's office. On what? On public buildings. Back in 1913 we passed a public building bill, and because they can not get anybody to take the contracts for some buildings for the amount of money then appropriated, on account of the increased cost, it remains on the books. Therefore we have saved $19,000,000 because we can not get anybody to take the contract until we enact legislation increasing the limit of cost.

Then there is the Panama Canal. Why, my friends, he has a saving in here of $19,674 in the original appropriation for digging a canal from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean, appropriated when the proposition was first urged for digging a canal from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean. He says it is saved because it was not spent this year. How could it be spent? In what way could he dig a canal from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean for $19,000? The money could be spent for no other purpose. For years it has been on the books, and if it is on the books, then he has saved it this year.

Then we have censorship for foreign mails in the Panama Canal Zone, where we have saved $53,205 this year. Evidently he has not heard that the espionage act is no more, and we could not spend it. Because it was not spent and could not be spent, the Director of the Budget says he saved $53,000. And the worst of it all is he seems to have induced the President to believe it, and he has given circulation to these absurd claims of savings.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I am sorry that I can not. There is $100,000 saved in enlarging the Capitol Grounds. Do you remember in the distant past that appropriation was made for enlarging the Capitol Grounds? It has been on the books, and it stays there. Therefore, it is saved out of the current appropriations this year. I wish my friend from Kentucky, Ben Johnson, were here, because it would bring back memories of the past to him. The trouble with this statement is that it goes throughout the country and some people are misled by it. They are misled into believing that there is a saving of $112,000,000, now increased to $135,000,000, when there is not any saving, and, as a matter of fact, it is only a saving on paper. It is nothing but a political saving; it will never relieve the taxpayer.

The President announced to the country that we will this year reduce our expenditures $1,600,000,000 below the expenditure for the last fiscal year. Well, the expenditures for the last fiscal year which were authorized by a Republican Congress were the largest ever authorized in time of peace in the history of the country. If now, four years after the war, there was not a tremendous reduction in expenditures there would be little hope for the preservation of the Government.

My regret is that the President in issuing this statement did not call attention to the fact that for the year 1916, the last year prior to our entering the war when we were engaged in measures of preparedness, our expenditures did not amount to more than $1,115,000,000, and that the estimate he now makes as to expenditures this year is $3,922,372,030 or $2,807,881,326 more than was spent under the Democratic administration for the last fiscal year prior to the war.

I regret that he did not call attention to the fact that while the Budget Bureau claims these bogus savings of $136,000,000, the fact is that the same departments have to date secured from the Congress deficiencies or supplemental appropriations amounting to $374,691,040.65.

The Secretary of the Treasury does not keep up with this political game. He issued a statement that we are facing a deficit, and then along comes General Dawes, who says that we have saved a billion and a half dollars. The President, if he has any confidence in him at all, ought to urge the Congress to declare a dividend to the taxpayers of America, and we would all be entitled to a share. I favored the Bureau of the Budget. There was real work for the Director of the Budget to do, but the Bureau of the Budget has never functioned as Congress intended it should. The bureau submitted estimates for an amount larger than the appropriations for the current year and before the subcommittees of the Committee on Appropriations no one appeared to defend his estimates. The director contented himself with these baseless claims of savings. It is nothing but bunk—political bunk. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I am not going to get into any controversy with the two BYRNSES. They are very clever fellows. I like them. I work with them harmoniously every day. They have been straining at a gnat here trying to discredit the report made by the Director of the Budget on the savings made out of the 1922 appropriations. In January last the director said that they had made a saving of $112,000,000, and that that would be reflected in the expenditures during the fiscal year of 1922. Somebody raised the question about the veracity of the statement. A resolution was introduced asking for particulars. The particulars have come. They are embodied in the report which the gentlemen have been trying to analyze. They indicate not only $112,000,000 of saving out of the 1922 appropriations, but that sum has been increased to $136,000,000.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The statement was made in January. It was $112,000,000 in July.

Mr. MADDEN. Well, whatever time it was, it indicates that the sum has been increased to $136,000,000. I do not think anyone will deny the accuracy of the statement when they come to analyze it.

But I rose particularly to explain the indefinite statement made by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] respecting the deficiencies. We have made appropriations aggregating $293,000,000 in deficiency bills, as he says. Very little of this sum can be properly termed a "deficiency." What was it for? One hundred and fifty-eight million dollars was for additional supplemental expenses of the Veterans' Bureau, caused by the greater number of wounded and sick men who have to be cared for. Would that be classed as an extravagance? I do not think anyone would so call it. Then we have $50,000,000 of the $293,000,000 appropriated to refund illegally collected income taxes in the years 1917, 1918, 1919, 1920, and 1921. Then there is $48,500,000 for losses by the Shipping Board, a bankrupt institution which we inherited. We have a large amount in judgments and audited claims, going up into the millions, to meet the obligations of the war, running through 1916, 1917, 1918, 1919, and 1920, obligations that were created here and abroad during the war. The only amount in all of the $293,000,000 that can be attributable to the activities of the present administration in all of the departments and activities of the Government is $20,000,000, of which $8,000,000 is for carrying out new laws and treaties arising after the last regular appropriations had become laws and $12,000,000 which is made up largely of items which may be properly classified as deficiencies. I challenge anyone to deny that. That is all I care to say. I wanted to make plain the reason for the $293,000,000. Most of it is not ours. It is largely due to the administration that preceded us. The following statement is a concise analysis of the $293,000,000:

ANALYSIS OF DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION ACTS.

Total of appropriations made in deficiency acts during fiscal year 1922	$293,079,463.09
Postal deficiencies payable from the revenues of Postal Service	6,842,431.14
	286,237,031.95
Veterans' Bureau, medical and hospital services and vocational training	158,993,112.00
Refunding taxes erroneously collected, income and profits taxes	50,523,000.00
Shipping Board, operating losses	48,500,000.00
Judgments of courts and claims allowed by General Accounting Office	8,335,343.26
To carry out new laws and treaties arising after the regular appropriations had become laws	7,840,426.39
All other items, the bulk of which consists of sums which may be properly classified as "deficiencies"	12,045,150.30
	286,237,031.95

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, the point I was making was that if there has been such a great saving there should have been no need for making a deficiency appropriation.

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, but the deficiencies were created before we came into power. They began in 1916–17–18–19–20. We had nothing to do with the creation of these deficiencies, but we had to pay them.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the genial gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] seems to be a little hard to please this morning. He sought certain information. It has been furnished him. It has been furnished him with a wealth of detail and great particularity. The Director of the Budget has gone into the matter much more thoroughly than it was necessary for him to do to answer the very proper inquiry of the gentleman from Tennessee, and yet the gentleman is not happy about it. Of course, he admits, what everyone must, that the sums which the director sets down as savings have been saved. Those sums have not been expended. He insists, however, that as to certain of the sums mentioned the Director of the Budget is not entitled to credit because of the fact that the money was not spent.

While there may be some little ground for difference of opinion as to a few odd dimes of the $132,000,000 of savings, the fact remains that the money was not expended, and when you do not expend money you save it; that is just another way of putting it. The gentleman from Tennessee also complains because the Director of the Budget is claiming credit for economies which were the result, as he says, of the action of the Congress and not of any action of the Director of the Budget. Well, I would not want to disagree with the gentleman from Tennessee in regard to that matter. I am myself inclined to claim credit for the Congress for savings or for the economies that are accomplished. [Applause.] I am, in fact, just a little inclined to agree with him that some of those economies resulted quite as directly from the action of the Congress as from the acts of the vigorous and efficient Director of the Budget. But the important thing is that the gentleman from Tennessee wanted to know if, and when and where, and how savings have been accomplished. He has been furnished with the information. He does not question the fact of the savings, but he quibbles a little in regard to the detail of the savings as to who is entitled to credit for them. [Applause.] Well, we will not quarrel over the matter of credit. We may even admit that a few dollars of the sums included in the one hundred and thirty-two million of savings reported might have been saved without the Budget and the energetic Budget Director. The fact remains, however, unchallenged by the criticisms that have been made, that vast sums have been saved by the Budget under effective management.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] and the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] having made an unsuccessful attack upon the report of the Chief of the Bureau of the Budget, as made public this morning by the President of the United States, and that attack having been assailed, properly, by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] and the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], I move the previous question on the pending resolution. [Laughter.]

The question was taken and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

READJUSTMENT OF PAY OF THE ARMY, NAVY, ETC.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10972), and, pending that, I desire to see if we can not agree upon some time for general debate. I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] how much time he would like to have on that side.

Mr. OLIVER. I should think, in view of the importance of the bill, that perhaps it may be helpful to the Members to have the bill fully discussed, because I do not think the House has had time to read the hearings, and a discussion of the bill may be of service, especially where questions are asked and answered; so that it occurs to me that we should have four hours; that is, two hours for those in favor and two hours for those against the bill.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. McKENZIE. I will.

Mr. MONDELL. I am of the opinion that debate under the five-minute rule on this bill should be quite liberal. The questions are numerous and important and some of them are rather highly technical, and considerable time will be required under the five-minute rule. That being true, I had hoped that we could conclude general debate to-day and take up the bill under the five-minute rule to-morrow. There remains about three hours before the ordinary adjournment time.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, I will say in reply to the gentleman from Wyoming that I have requests from one or two Members for time, who, I take it, do not expect to speak on the bill, and I feel that we ought to concede time to them, and I feel that we ought to have, say, five hours' general debate on this bill. It is, as the gentleman has said, a very important bill, and it is one that ought to be discussed very thoroughly, not only under the five-minute rule, which I hope will be very liberal, but under general debate.

Mr. OLIVER. That will be entirely agreeable to me.

Mr. MONDELL. How much time does the gentleman anticipate will be utilized for other than the discussion of the bill?

Mr. McKENZIE. Perhaps about 40 minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not think we should deny full opportunity to discuss the bill. There should be as much general debate as necessary for the discussion of the measure, but I had rather hoped that there would not be a long general debate on it.

Mr. OLIVER. I will say to the gentleman from Wyoming that it was generally understood that this bill would not be taken up before to-morrow. Some Members, I think, perhaps have deferred reading the report or studying the bill until this evening or to-night. The very fact that some Members felt that it would not be taken up this evening caused them to defer examining the record, and it seems to me they should have some longer time, because those Members, after they hear debate and read the record, may then desire time, and if we have some time left over to-morrow it could then be well utilized, because the men can inform themselves on the record by that time.

Mr. McKENZIE. Five hours will be satisfactory?

Mr. OLIVER. That will be satisfactory to me.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time for general debate be limited to five hours, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Alabama and one-half by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the time for general debate be limited to five hours, half of that time to be controlled by himself and half by the gentleman from Alabama. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 10972, with Mr. TOWNER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill H. R. 10972, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10972) to readjust the pay and allowances of the commissioned and enlisted personnel of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, Coast and Geodetic Survey, and Public Health Service.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, the bill ought to be read, and I object.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That, beginning July 1, 1922, for the purpose of computing the annual pay of the commissioned officers of the Regular Army and Marine Corps below the grade of brigadier general, of the Navy below the grade of rear admiral, of the Coast Guard, of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, and of the Public Health Service below the grade of surgeon general, pay periods are prescribed, and the base pay for each is fixed as follows:

The first period, $1,500; the second period, $2,000; the third period, $2,400; the fourth period, $3,000; the fifth period, $3,500; and the sixth period, $4,000.

The pay of the sixth period shall be paid to colonels of the Army, captains of the Navy, and officers of corresponding grade who have completed 26 years' service, or whose first appointment in the permanent service was in a grade above that corresponding to captain in the Army, or who were appointed to the Regular Army under the provisions of the first sentence of section 24, act of June 3, 1916, as amended by the act of June 4, 1920; to officers of the Staff Corps of the Navy advanced by selection under existing laws to the rank or pay of captain; to lieutenant colonels of the Army, commanders of the Navy, and officers of corresponding grade, and lieutenant commanders of the line and Engineer Corps of the Coast Guard who have completed 30 years' service; and to the Chief of Chaplains of the Army.

The pay of the fifth period shall be paid to colonels of the Army, captains of the Navy, and officers of corresponding grade who are not entitled to the pay of the sixth period; to lieutenant colonels of the Army, commanders of the Navy, and officers of corresponding grade who have completed 20 years' service, or whose first appointment in the permanent service was in a grade above that corresponding to captain in the Army, or who were appointed to the Regular Army under the provisions of the first sentence of said section 24; to officers of the Staff Corps of the Navy advanced by selection under existing laws to the rank or pay of commander; and to majors of the Army, lieutenant commanders of the Navy, and officers of corresponding grade who have completed 23 years' service: Provided, That lieutenant commanders of the Staff Corps of the Navy who were appointed between the dates of March 4, 1913, and June 7, 1916, in a grade above that of ensign, shall receive the pay of this pay period after completing 20 years' service.

The pay of the fourth period shall be paid to lieutenant colonels of the Army, commanders of the Navy, and officers of corresponding grade who are not entitled to the pay of the fifth or sixth period; to majors of the Army, lieutenant commanders of the Navy, and officers of corresponding grade who have completed 14 years' service, or whose first appointment in the permanent service was in a grade above that corresponding to second lieutenant in the Army, or who were appointed to the Regular Army under the provisions of the first sentence of said section 24; to captains of the Army, lieutenants of the Navy, and officers of corresponding grade who have completed 17 years' service; and to lieutenants of the Staff Corps of the Navy, and lieutenants and lieutenants (junior grade) of the line and Engineer Corps of the Coast Guard whose total commissioned service equals that of lieutenant commanders of the line of the Navy drawing the pay of this period.

The pay of the third period shall be paid to majors of the Army, lieutenant commanders of the Navy, and officers of corresponding grade who are not entitled to the pay of the fourth, fifth, or sixth period; to captains of the Army, lieutenants of the Navy, and officers of corresponding grade who have completed seven years' service, or whose first appointment in the permanent service was in a grade above that corresponding to second lieutenant in the Army, or whose present rank dates from July 1, 1920, or earlier; to first lieutenants of the Army, lieutenants (junior grade) of the Navy, and officers of corresponding grade who have completed 10 years' service; and to lieutenants (junior grade) of the line and Engineer Corps of the Coast Guard whose total commissioned service equals that of lieutenants of the line of the Navy drawing the pay of this period.

The pay of the second period shall be paid to captains of the Army, lieutenants of the Navy, and officers of corresponding grade who are not entitled to the pay of the third or fourth period; to first lieutenants of the Army, lieutenants (junior grade) of the Navy, and officers of corresponding grade who have completed three years' service, or whose first appointment in the permanent service was in a grade above that corresponding to second lieutenant in the Army; and to second lieutenants of the Army, ensigns of the Navy, and officers of corresponding grade who have completed five years' service.

The pay of the first period shall be paid to all other officers whose pay is provided for in this section.

During the existence of a state of war, formally recognized by Congress, officers of grades corresponding to those of colonel, lieutenant colonel, major, captain, and first lieutenant of the Army, holding either permanent or temporary commissions as such, shall receive the pay of the sixth, fifth, fourth, third, and second periods, respectively, unless entitled under the foregoing provisions of this section to the pay of a higher period.

Every officer paid under the provisions of this section shall receive an increase of 5 per cent of the base pay of his period for each three years of service up to 30 years: Provided, That the base pay plus pay for length of service of no officer below the grade of colonel of the Army, captain of the Navy, or corresponding grade, shall exceed $5,750.

For officers hereafter appointed no service shall be counted for purposes of pay except active commissioned service under a Federal appointment and commissioned service in the National Guard when called out by order of the President. For officers now in the service all service which is now counted in computing longevity pay, and service as a contract surgeon serving full time, shall be included in the computation.

The provisions of this act shall apply equally to those persons serving not as commissioned officers in the Army or in the other services mentioned in the title of this act but whose pay under existing law is an amount equivalent to that of a commissioned officer of one of the above grades, those receiving the pay of colonel, lieutenant colonel, major, captain, first lieutenant, and second lieutenant, being classified as in the sixth, fifth, fourth, third, second, and first periods, respectively. Pay clerks of the Marine Corps shall receive the pay of second lieutenants of the Army of the same length of service. Contract surgeons serving full time shall have the pay and allowances for subsistence and rental authorized for officers serving in their second pay period. Commissioned warrant officers on the active list with creditable records shall, after six years' commissioned service, receive the pay of the second period, and after 12 years' commissioned service receive the pay of the third period: Provided, That a commissioned warrant officer promoted from the grade of warrant officer shall suffer no reduction of pay by reason of such promotion. Army field clerks and field clerks, Quartermaster Corps, shall have the allowances for subsistence and rental authorized for officers receiving the pay of the first period.

SEC. 2. That every commissioned officer while on field or sea duty shall receive an increase of 5 per cent of his base pay. Field duty shall be defined for the purposes of this act as service in mobilization, concentration, instruction, or maneuver camps, service in campaign, in simulated campaign or on the march, and service under similar conditions. Such field service in each case shall be announced in orders published by the President. Sea duty shall be sea service as defined in section 1571, Revised Statutes.

SEC. 3. That when officers of the National Guard or of the reserve forces of any of the services mentioned in the title of this act are authorized by law to receive Federal pay, those serving in grades corresponding to those of colonel, lieutenant colonel, major, captain, first lieutenant, and second lieutenant of the Army shall receive the pay of the sixth, fifth, fourth, third, second, and first periods, respectively. In computing the increase of pay for each period of three years' service, such officers shall be credited with full time for all periods during which they have held commissions as officers of any of the services mentioned in the title of this act, or in the National Guard, or in the Organized Militia prior to July 1, 1916, or in the Naval Militia, or in the National Naval Volunteers, or in the Naval Reserve Force, or Marine Corps Reserve Force, when confirmed in grade and qualified for all general service, with full time for all periods during which they have performed active duty under reserve commissions, and with one-half time for all other periods during which they have held reserve commissions.

SEC. 4. That the term "dependent" as used in the succeeding sections of this act shall include at all times and in all places a lawful wife and unmarried children under 21 years of age. It shall also include the mother of the officer provided she is in fact dependent on him for her chief support.

SEC. 5. That each commissioned officer on the active list, or on active duty below the grade of brigadier general or its equivalent, in any of the services mentioned in the title of this act, shall be entitled at all times, in addition to his pay, to a money allowance for subsistence, the value of one allowance to be determined by the President for each fiscal year in accordance with a certificate furnished by the Secretary of Labor showing the comparative retail cost of food in the United States for the previous calendar year as compared with the calendar year 1922. The value of one allowance is hereby fixed at 60 cents per day for the fiscal year 1923, and this value shall be the maximum and shall be used by the President as the standard in fixing the same or lower values for subsequent years. To each officer of any of the said services receiving the base pay of the first period the amount of this allowance shall be equal to one subsistence allowance, to each officer receiving the base pay of the second, third, or sixth period the amount of this allowance shall be equal to two subsistence allowances, and to each officer receiving the base pay of the fourth or fifth period the amount of this allowance shall be equal to three subsistence allowances: Provided, That an officer with no dependents shall receive one subsistence allowance in lieu of the above allowances.

SEC. 6. That each commissioned officer on the active list or on active duty below the grade of brigadier general or its equivalent, in any of the services mentioned in the title of this act, if public quarters are not available, shall be entitled at all times, in addition to his pay, to a money allowance for rental of quarters, the amount of such allowance to be determined by the rate for one room fixed by the President for each fiscal year in accordance with a certificate furnished by the Secretary of Labor showing the comparative cost of rents in the United States for the preceding calendar year as compared with the calendar year 1922. Such rate for one room is hereby fixed at $20 per month for the fiscal year 1923, and this rate shall be the maximum and shall be used by the President as the standard in fixing the same or lower rates for subsequent years. To each officer receiving the base pay of the first period the amount of this allowance shall be equal to that for two rooms, to each officer receiving the base pay of the second period the amount of this allowance shall be equal to that for three rooms, to each officer receiving the base pay of the third period the amount of this allowance shall be equal to that for four rooms, to each officer receiving the base pay of the fourth period the amount of this allowance shall be equal to that for five rooms, and to each officer receiving the base pay of the fifth or sixth period the amount of this allowance shall be equal to that for six rooms. The rental allowance shall accrue while the officer is on field or sea duty, temporary duty away from his permanent station, in hospital, on leave of absence, or on sick leave, regardless of any shelter that may be furnished him for his personal use, if his dependent or dependents are not occupying public quarters during such period. In lieu of the above allowances an officer with no dependents receiving the base pay of the first or second period shall receive the allowance for two rooms, that such an officer receiving the base pay of the third or fourth period shall receive the allowance for three rooms, and that such an officer receiving the base pay of the fifth or sixth period shall receive the allowance for four rooms, but no rental allowance shall be made to any officer without dependents by reason of his employment on field or sea duty.

SEC. 7. That when the total of base pay, pay for length of service and allowances for subsistence and rental of quarters, authorized in this act for any officer below the grade of brigadier general or its equivalent, shall exceed $7,200 a year, the amount of the allowances to which such officer is entitled shall be reduced by the amount of the excess above $7,200: Provided, That this section shall not apply to the captain commandant of the Coast Guard nor to the Director of the Coast and Geodetic Survey.

SEC. 8. That commencing July 1, 1922, the annual base pay of a brigadier general of the Army and of the Marine Corps, rear admiral (lower half) of the Navy, commodore of the Navy, and Surgeon General of the Public Health Service shall be $6,000; and the annual base pay of a major general of the Army and of the Marine Corps, and rear admiral (upper half) of the Navy shall be $8,000. Every such officer shall be entitled to the same money allowance for subsistence as is authorized in section 5 of this act for officers receiving the pay of the sixth period and to the same money allowance for rental of quarters as is authorized in section 6 of this act for officers receiving the pay of the sixth period: Provided, That when the total of base pay, subsistence, and rental allowances exceeds $7,500 for officers serving in the grade of brigadier general of the Army and of the Marine Corps, rear admiral (lower half) of the Navy, commodore of the Navy, and Surgeon General of the Public Health Service, and $9,700 for those serving in the grade of major general of the Army and of the Marine Corps, and rear admiral (upper half) of the Navy, the amount of the allowances to which such officer is entitled shall be reduced by the amount of the excess above $7,500 or $9,700, respectively. Rear admirals of the Navy serving in higher grades shall be entitled, while so serving, to pay the allowances of a rear admiral (upper half) and to a personal money allowance per year as follows: When serving in the grade of vice admiral, $500; when serving in the grade of admiral or as Chief of Naval Operations, $2,200.

SEC. 9. That commencing July 1, 1922, the monthly base pay of warrant officers and enlisted men of the Army and Marine Corps shall be as follows: Warrant officers of the Army and Marine Corps, $148; warrant officers, Army Mine Planter Service, master, $185; first mate, $141; second mate, $109; engineer, $175; assistant engineer, $120; enlisted men of the first grade, $126; enlisted men of the second grade, $84; enlisted men of the third grade, $72; enlisted men of the fourth grade, $54; enlisted men of the fifth grade, $42; enlisted men of the sixth grade, $30; enlisted men of the seventh grade, $21; and the pay for specialists' ratings shall be as follows: First class, $30; second class, $25; third class, $20; fourth class, $15; fifth class, $6; sixth class, $3. Existing laws authorizing continuous-service pay for each five years of service are hereby repealed, effective June 30, 1922. Commencing July 1, 1922, warrant officers of the Army and Marine Corps, including warrant officers of the Army Mine Planter Service and enlisted men of the Army and Marine Corps, shall receive, as a permanent addition to their pay, an increase of 5 per cent of their base pay for each four years of service in any of the services mentioned in the title of this act not to exceed 25 per cent. On and after July 1, 1922, an enlistment allowance equal to $50, multiplied by the number of years served in the enlistment period from which he has last been discharged, shall be paid to every honorably discharged enlisted man of the first three grades who reenlists within a period of three months from the date of his discharge, and an enlistment allowance of $25, multiplied by the number of years served in the enlistment period from which he has last been discharged, shall be paid to every honorably discharged enlisted man of the other grades who reenlists within a period of three months from the date of his discharge. Nothing contained herein shall operate to reduce the pay now being received by any transferred member of the Fleet Marine Corps Reserve. On and after July 1, 1922, retired enlisted men of the Army and Marine Corps shall have their retired pay computed as now authorized by law on the basis of pay provided in this act.

SEC. 10. That on and after July 1, 1922, the monthly base pay of warrant officers of the Navy and Coast Guard shall be as follows: During the first 6 years of service—at sea, $153; on shsore, $135; during the second 6 years of service—at sea, $168; on shore, $147; after 12 years' service—at sea, $189; on shore, $168. On and after July 1, 1922, for purposes of pay, enlisted men of the Navy and Coast Guard shall be distributed in seven grades, with monthly base rates of pay as follows: First grade, $126; second grade, $84; third grade, $72; fourth grade, $60; fifth grade, $54; sixth grade, $36; seventh grade, $21. Chief petty officers under acting appointment shall be included in the first grade at a monthly base pay of $99. Mates shall receive the pay of enlisted men of the first grade of the Navy. Nothing contained herein shall operate to reduce the pay now being received by any transferred member of the Fleet Naval Reserve. In lieu of all permanent additions to pay now authorized for enlisted men of the Navy and Coast Guard they shall hereafter receive as a permanent addition to their pay an increase of 10 per centum on the base pay of their rating upon completion of the first four years of enlisted service, and an additional increase of 5 per centum for each four years' service thereafter, the total not to exceed 25 per cent. All transient additions to pay of enlisted men of the Navy and Coast Guard are hereby repealed, except as provided for in section 21 of this act.

The rates of pay of the insular force of the Navy shall be one-half the rates of pay prescribed for enlisted men of the Navy in corresponding ratings. Existing laws authorizing a reenlistment gratuity to enlisted men of the Navy and Coast Guard are hereby repealed, and hereafter an enlistment allowance equal to $50 multiplied by the number of years served in the enlistment period from which he has last been discharged, but not to exceed $200, shall be paid to every honorably discharged enlisted man of the first three grades who reenlists within a period of three months from the date of his discharge; and an enlistment allowance of $25 multiplied by the number of years served in the enlistment period from which he has last been discharged, but not to exceed $100, shall be paid to every honorably discharged enlisted man of the other grades who reenlists within a period of three months from the date of his discharge. On and after July 1, 1922, retired enlisted men of the Navy and Coast Guard shall have their retired pay computed as now authorized by law on the basis of pay provided by this act.

SEC. 11. That warrant officers of the Army, including those of the Army Mine Planter Service, of the Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard, shall be entitled at all times to the same money allowance for subsistence as is authorized in section 5 of this act for officers receiving the pay of the first period, and to the same money allowance for rental of quarters as is authorized in section 6 of this act for officers receiving the pay of the first period. To each enlisted man not furnished quarters or rations in kind there shall be granted, under such regulations as the President may prescribe, an allowance for quarters and subsistence, the value of which shall depend on the conditions under which the duty of the man is being performed, and shall not exceed $4 per day. These regulations shall be uniform for all the services mentioned in the title of this act. Subsistence for pilots shall be paid in accordance with existing regulations, and rations for enlisted men may be commuted as now authorized by law.

SEC. 12. That hereafter officers of any of the services mentioned in the title of this act when traveling under competent orders without troops shall receive a mileage allowance at the rate of 8 cents per mile, distance to be computed by the shortest usually traveled route and existing laws providing for the issue of transportation requests to officers of the Army traveling under competent orders, and for deduction to be made from mileage accounts when transportation is furnished by the United States, are hereby made applicable to all the services mentioned in the title of this act, but in cases when orders are given for travel to be performed repeatedly between two or more places in the same vicinity, as determined by the head of the executive department concerned, he may, in his discretion, direct that actual and necessary expenses only be allowed. Actual expenses only shall be paid for travel under orders outside the limits of the United States in North America. Unless otherwise expressly provided by law, no officer of the services mentioned in the title of this act shall be allowed or paid any sum in excess of expenses actually incurred for subsistence while traveling on duty away from his designated post of duty, nor any sum for such expenses actually incurred in excess of $7 per day. The heads of the executive departments concerned are authorized to prescribe per diem rates of allowance, not exceeding $6, in lieu of subsistence to officers traveling on official business and away from their designated posts of duty.

In lieu of the transportation in kind authorized by section 12 of an act entitled "An act to increase the efficiency of the commissioned and enlisted personnel of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, Coast and Geodetic Survey, and Public Health Service," approved May 18, 1920, to be furnished by the United States for dependents, the President may authorize the payment in money of amounts equal to such commercial transportation costs when such travel shall have been completed. Dependent children shall be such as are defined in section 4 of this act.

SEC. 13. That, commencing July 1, 1922, the annual pay of female nurses of the Army and Navy shall be as follows: During the first three years of service, $840; from the beginning of the fourth year of service until the completion of the sixth year of service, $1,080; from the beginning of the seventh year of service until the completion of the ninth year of service, $1,380; from the beginning of the tenth year of service, $1,560. Superintendents of the Nurse Corps shall receive a money allowance at the rate of $2,500 a year, assistant superintendents, directors, and assistant directors at the rate of $1,500 a year, and chief nurses at the rate of $600 a year, in addition to their pay as nurses. Nurses shall be entitled to the same allowance for subsistence as is authorized in section 5 of this act for officers receiving the pay of the first period, and to the same allowance for rental of quarters as is authorized in section 6 of this act for officers receiving the pay of the first period.

SEC. 14. That officers of the National Guard receiving Federal pay, except for armory drill, and reserve officers of any of the services mentioned in the title of this act while on active duty shall receive the allowances herein prescribed for officers of the regular services in sections 5 and 6 of this act. Hereafter, in addition to the pay authorized in section 109, act of June 3, 1916, as amended by the act of June 4, 1920, field officers and lieutenants of the National Guard commanding organizations less than a brigade, and having administrative functions, shall receive $240 per year for the faithful performance of the administrative duties connected therewith; and warrant officers of the National Guard shall receive not more than four-thirtieths of the monthly base pay of their grade for satisfactory performance of their appropriate duties, under such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe.

On and after July 1, 1922, the armory drill pay for enlisted men of the National Guard of the sixth grade shall be $1.15, and for those of the seventh grade shall be $1, in lieu of that authorized in section 110, act of June 3, 1916, as amended by the act of June 4, 1920; and the pay of enlisted men of the National Guard of the sixth and seventh grades shall be $1.15 and $1 per day, respectively, whenever they are participating in exercises provided for by sections 94, 97, and 99 of the national defense act, approved June 3, 1916.

SEC. 15. That existing laws authorizing increase of pay for foreign service and commutation of quarters, heat, and light are hereby repealed.

SEC. 16. That nothing contained in this act shall operate to reduce the pay of any officer on the active list below the pay to which he is entitled by reason of his grade and length of service on June 30, 1922, not including additional pay authorized by the act entitled "An act to increase the efficiency of the commissioned and enlisted personnel of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps, Coast Guard, Coast and Geodetic Survey, and Public Health Service," approved May 18, 1920; and nothing contained in this act shall operate to reduce the total of the pay and allowances which any enlisted man of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, or Coast Guard is now receiving during his current enlistment and while he holds his present grade or rating.

The provisions of this section shall apply in like manner to each person not commissioned whose pay is based by law on that of a commissioned officer.

SEC. 17. That on and after July 1, 1922, retired officers and warrant officers shall have their retired pay, or equivalent pay, computed as now authorized by law on the basis of pay provided in this act: Provided, That nothing contained in this act shall operate to reduce the present pay of officers, warrant officers, and enlisted men now on the retired list or officers or warrant officers in an equivalent status of any of the services mentioned in the title of this act. Active duty performed after June 30, 1922, by an officer on the retired list or its equivalent shall not entitle such officer to promotion. Hereafter retired officers of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps below the grade of brigadier general or commodore and retired warrant officers and enlisted men of those services, shall, when on active duty, receive full pay and allowances.

SEC. 18. That under such regulations as the President may prescribe, enlisted men of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard may receive additional compensation not less than $1 or more than $5 per month, for special qualification in the use of the arm or arms which they may be required to use. All laws and parts of laws authorizing extra pay for qualification in the use of arms or instruments, or for holding rated positions, except as otherwise specifically provided herein, are hereby repealed, to take effect June 30, 1922.

SEC. 19. That cadets at the Military Academy and cadets and cadet engineers of the Coast Guard shall hereafter receive the same pay and allowances as are now or may hereafter be provided by law for midshipmen in the Navy.

SEC. 20. That all officers, warrant officers, and enlisted men of all branches of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard, when detailed to duty involving flying, shall receive the same increase of their pay and the same allowance for traveling expenses as are now authorized for the performance of like duties in the Army. Exclusive of the Army Air Service, and student aviators and qualified aircraft pilots of the Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard, the number of officers of any of the services mentioned in the title of this act detailed to duty involving flying shall not at any one time exceed one-half of 1 per cent of the total authorized commissioned strength of such service. Regulations in execution of the provisions of this section shall be made by the President and shall be uniform for all the services concerned.

SEC. 21. That nothing in this act shall operate to change in any way existing laws, or regulations made in pursuance of law, governing pay and allowances of the General of the Armies, the Philippine Scouts, Marine Band, Naval Academy Band, Indian scouts, or flying cadets; nor the allowances in kind for rations, quarters, heat, and light for enlisted men; nor allowances in kind for quarters, heat, and light for officers and warrant officers; nor allowances for private mounts for officers; nor transportation in kind for officers and warrant officers and enlisted men and their dependents; nor transportation and packing allowances for baggage or household effects of officers and warrant officers and enlisted men; nor additional pay for aids; nor exert pay to enlisted men serving as stenographic reporters, or employed as cooks or messmen, or mail clerks, or assistant mail clerks, or engaged in submarine diving or service on submarines; nor money allowances granted to enlisted men on account of awards of medals or decorations expressly authorized by Congress.

SEC. 22. That all laws and parts of laws which are inconsistent herewith or in conflict with the provisions hereof are hereby repealed.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, this is a rather important measure, and if the gentleman from Illinois expects to explain somewhat its provisions it seems as though we ought to have more Members here. I would like to ask the gentleman if he is going to make a full explanation of the measure now or just a preliminary statement?

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I intended to make a general statement in connection with the provisions of the bill, but I dislike very much, I will say, to have Members of the House discommoded by calling them over here to hear any explanation I might make, even in connection with as important a matter as the pending bill.

Mr. WASON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKENZIE. I will.

Mr. WASON. Does not the gentleman think Members of the House ought to be fully informed about that, and is not the gentleman well aware he is the one man who can inform those of us who have not been following the hearings and know very little about military affairs?

Mr. McKENZIE. I will say to my friend from New Hampshire that I think the membership of the House should be fully informed on this important bill, but I am not so certain that the "gentleman from Illinois" is the man that can give them the information they desire. But he will do the best he can.

Mr. WASON. I will take chances on the gentleman from Illinois being able to inform us, and while I am not in the habit of asking for a quorum, I think it is not only due to this committee but to the man in charge of the bill and to the membership of the House that we hear the speech of the gentleman from Illinois. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Hampshire makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Forty-one Members are present; not a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll.

Thereupon the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TOWNER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having under consideration the bill H. R. 10972, finding itself without a quorum, he had caused the roll to be called, that 239 Members had answered to their names, and that he presented therewith a list of the absentees for insertion in the Journal and RECORD.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may have permission to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, inasmuch as the pending bill (H. R. 10972) to readjust the pay of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, Coast and Geodetic Survey, and Public Health Service is in many respects technical, and since the diversity of interests involved require that its elements shall bear a definite interrelation in order that their whole shall function harmoniously, I desire to request my colleagues to permit me first to make a brief explanation of the same without interruption, after which I will be glad to answer such questions as my colleagues may wish to ask and which I am prepared to answer.

Mr. Chairman, the act of May 18, 1920, which provided for certain increases of pay in the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, Coast and Geodetic Survey, and the Public Health Service, provided also for the appointment of a joint committee of the two Houses of Congress to take up this matter and to propose to the Congress a general revision and readjustment of the pay schedules of all said services, the joint committee to be composed of five Senators and five Members of the House. The Speaker of the House, in compliance with the law heretofore mentioned, appointed as members of the joint committee on the part of the House Representatives TILSON, of Connecticut; KRAUS, of Indiana; OLIVER, of Alabama; BYRNES, of South Carolina; and McKENZIE, of Illinois. For myself I wish to say that having some idea of the prodigious task confronting such a committee, it was with great reluctance that I acceded to the request of the Speaker to act as one member of the committee, and I think I am safe in saying that all of my colleagues shared in such reluctance in undertaking the work. I may say here that those apprehensions as to the magnitude of the task have been fully borne out by experience.

However, having accepted the appointment as members of the joint committee, we took up the task with our Senate colleagues, with the Hon. JAMES W. WADSWORTH, of New York, acting as chairman of the joint committee.

The joint committee was organized on August 22, 1921, and after securing the cooperation of the heads of the executive departments concerned proceeded to conduct public hearings relating to the pay and allowances of the officers and enlisted men of the several services. All the services concerned were heard through scores of witnesses. In addition, a large amount of statistical data and written evidence was presented to the committee. The inquiry of the committee was broad in scope and included many details.

In addition, your special committee has held additional public hearings and has called for and received from the departments concerned statistical information of an exhaustive character.

The testimony presented abundantly established the fact that living costs are about 100 per cent greater than in 1908, when the last permanent pay schedule was established, and about 75 per cent greater than in 1913, before the war. While the act approved May 18, 1920, gave a certain amount of relief (approximately 20 per cent increase), it absorbed only about one-third of this increased cost of living in the case of officers, leaving about two-thirds to be borne by the individual. Actually the purchasing power of the present pay is much less than that of 1908.

It should be borne in mind that the relief afforded by the act of May 18, 1920, is temporary. That act, in most of its provisions, expires by limitation on June 30, 1922. Should the Congress fail to legislate on the subject, the pay of the great majority of the personnel affected will revert automatically to the 1908 schedules, with disastrous results to the services, in the opinion of the committee.

It was clearly demonstrated to your committee that officers and noncommissioned officers and petty officers experience great difficulty in maintaining themselves and their families under present conditions. Further, your committee can not foresee a future lowering of living costs to a point where the salaries established in 1908 would be adequate.

To let this legislation expire by limitation on June 30 next without some measure of relief to take its place would not only be unjust to the men of the several services but would undoubtedly destroy to a large extent the splendid organizations of both commissioned and enlisted personnel, and this would be particularly true as affecting the enlisted personnel of the Navy.

It soon became apparent to the committee that there were three courses of action open to us. First we could fold our hands and do nothing and permit the act of May 18, 1920, to expire by limitation on the 30th of June, 1922, and by such action bring about a reversion of all the services to the schedule of pay provided in the act of May 11, 1908, and subsequent acts.

Second, we could have taken an easy course by recommending a further extension of the so-called bonus law of May 18, 1920, with all the unsatisfactory provisions contained therein, and put off until another day the effort necessary to bring about a complete revision and readjustment of the pay of the different services. It would have been an easy matter to shift the responsibility to the shoulders of other men by simply advancing the plea that the time is not opportune for such a general revision and that the latter should wait until everything had more nearly approached a normal status.

The third course open to the committee was manfully to take up the task, which I am sure that the legislative action of the Congress intended we should do, and make an honest effort to devise a pay system for all of the services mentioned which would have in it the elements of fairness to the officers and men in all grades and at the same time be just to the Government. I am glad to say that after mature deliberation the members of the committee decided to pursue the course last mentioned; and after many months of earnest toil, aided by the most efficient officers in all of the services, the majority of the committee presents a bill for the consideration of the House which we feel contains many constructive reforms, and which not only provides adequate pay for all the officers and enlisted men but will result in great saving to the Government in the ensuing years.

We were animated in our work by the knowledge that the present committee is perhaps the first one of the character ever created by Congress and given special jurisdiction and power to undertake the revision, adjustment, and equalizing of the pay schedules of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, Coast and Geodetic Survey, and the Public Health Service, and it had presented to it an opportunity to do a great constructive service for the country. It is our hope that you will find upon examination that our report is worthy of your support.

You are all aware of the fact that the pay of the different services has been regulated heretofore by a number of the standing committees of the House; for instance, the pay of the Army by the Committee on Military Affairs, that of the Navy by the Committee on Naval Affairs, and so forth. Such a system has naturally resulted in many different grades of pay for the performance of similar duties in the several branches of the service. The committee, after full deliberation, decided to undertake the task of a complete revision, readjustment, and equalizing of the pay schedules of the several services over which it had jurisdiction, which would result in a reduction from the present current cost, with such readjustment that the services would offer an attractive career for young men of character and ability and that the personnel of all the services should be placed on a parity as regards pay and allowances.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKENZIE. Not just at present, but I will be glad to do so after proceeding a little further.

It was further determined—and I want you to keep this in mind—that length of service should be a controlling factor in determining rates of pay, and that a flexible element should be introduced into the compensation of an officer, which would increase or decrease, within limits, as the cost of living increased or decreased.

The committee having decided that any pay bill prepared should contain the foregoing basic principles, we proceeded to have prepared such a bill for our consideration, and finally agreed upon the pending measure.

The bill under discussion accomplishes the following:

(a) A reduction in total cost below that of the 1923 Budget estimates, with readjustment of pay in such manner as to give especial aid where most required. It should be remembered that the Budget estimates are based upon the present temporary pay schedules and the present strength of the services.

(b) Adoption of a schedule which will reasonably compensate officers and enlisted men of the services for rank, responsibility, and length of service, and at the same time so arranged as to offer a promising career to young men entering in the lowest grades. In view of pending legislation to reduce the Military and Naval Establishments, it is important that any new pay schedule shall be so drawn as to provide reasonable remuneration to such personnel as shall remain. It becomes doubly essential, if these services are to become numerically smaller, that their personnel shall be maintained at a point of high efficiency.

(c) Establishes parity of pay in all of the services concerned.

(d) Introduces an element of pay which shall, within a fixed maximum, vary automatically with the cost of living.

(e) To do away with petty allowances and multiplicity of accounts, and thus to simplify and cheapen administration.

The draft of the bill is believed to embody all these basic principles.

It effects a large immediate saving below the 1923 Budget estimates for the six services concerned. It effects a further annual saving, most of which will be accomplished within two or three years by the expiration of certain saving clauses which have been included in the bill to recognize the moral obligation of the Government not to reduce the pay of any officer now in the service below the rate established in 1908, and in the case of enlisted men a legal obligation not to reduce their pay during the unexpired portion of their current enlistment. With the expiration of these saving clauses, the plan here proposed will bring the pay of the Army to within less than 1 per cent more than what it would amount to under the permanent schedules to which it will revert if no further legislation be enacted. A comparison of costs in round numbers is shown, as follows:

Budget, 1923	$157,000,000
Proposed pay, exclusive of saving clauses	143,000,000
Pay if no legislation is enacted	142,000,000

This difference of about a million dollars (which is less than 1 per cent of the total cost) will completely disappear if the cost of living falls 10 per cent by diminishing the amounts paid by the Government for the allowances which have already been authorized.

The pay schedules proposed in this bill are so worked out as to offer a reasonable career to young men of a desirable kind. The compensation is commensurate with the duties and responsibilities attached to rank, yet provides for increases due to increased experience and efficiency apart from rank, as is the case under existing law. It protects the Government in the case of abnormally rapid promotion and the individual in the case of abnormally slow promotion. It contains an elastic element of compensation in the form of allowances (subsistence and rental) which have heretofore been given on a basis of rank, but which have in this bill been readjusted on a basis of need as well as rank, in the interest of equity toward both the Government and the individual. It is provided in the bill that while their cost shall not be increased, their expense to the Government shall be proportionately reduced as the cost of living reduces. It accepts family life and its greater requirements as the normal condition of existence. It recognizes the abnormal living conditions inherent in military and naval service, frequent changes of station, and family separations. Finally, it automatically and satisfactorily protects the interests of National Guard and reserve officers brought temporarily into the active service of the United States.

The bill abolishes many inequalities between services whose duties are at all times comparable and in time of war are identical.

It does away with many minor items of expense which have grown up from piecemeal legislation. It renders difficult such special legislation in the future, since all the services concerned would hereafter be placed by it in a uniform pay basis. It facilitates their financial administration and, for clarity to this end, the assistance of the Comptroller General of the United States has been secured in its preparation. The need for new legislation of this character, the general principles embodied in this bill, and their application have received the repeated approval of the Secretaries of the Treasury, War, Navy, and Commerce. The details have been worked out by your committee with the assistance of the representatives of the various services. The legislation proposed, as embodied in H. R. 10972, has the united general support of the services concerned. In the opinion of your committee the bill submitted embodies the most scientific pay schedule yet devised, while being simple, practical, and satisfying the requirements of a necessary economy.

It is proper to state for the information of the House that in the consideration and preparation of this legislation, the committee had all estimates based on the Budget estimate for 1923 and on the numerical strength of the several services as now provided by law. However, in the application of the proposed pay schedules hereafter the number of officers or enlisted men in any service is wholly immaterial in so far as having any bearing on the principles contained in the legislation, for in the administration of the law it can be applied to a large or small force with equal justice.

It is also proper to state at this time that the committee, in the consideration and preparation of the proposed legislation, discovered that scores of laws and amendments thereto were in force affecting the pay and allowances of the officers and men in the several services, and that all officers and enlisted personnel had been placed in their respective grades and were receiving pay in accordance with the law governing the same. Your committee was therefore compelled to accept the situation as we found it in relation to grade and rank. To anyone having in mind criticism of the committee or the legislation proposed on the ground that certain officers in some of the services appear to be enjoying pay and grade not warranted, it may be replied that such criticism should not be directed against this committee, but should be charged to the action of the Congress in heretofore enacting the law.

I deem it well to state also that upon examination of the laws applicable to the several services heretofore mentioned we found that the law relating to the pay of the Coast Guard, Coast and Geodetic Survey, and the Public Health Service provided that the officers and enlisted men should have grade and pay similizing the various grades and pay of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps, and at this point I wish to insert a table showing the grades of all the services, which is as follows:

Corresponding rank and titles of the several services associated for pay purposes in H. R. 10972.

Service.	Rank and title.
Army	Second lieutenant.	First lieutenant.	Captain	Major	Lieutenant colonel.	Colonel	Brigadier general.	Major general.	Lieutenant general (none).	General of the Armies.
Marine Corps	do	do	do	do	do	do	do	do	None	None.
Navy	Ensign	Lieutenant (junior grade).	Lieutenant	Lieutenant commander.	Commander	Captain	Commodore or rear admiral (lower half).	Rear admiral (upper half).	Vice admiral.[1]	Admiral.[1]
Coast Guard	do	do	do	do	do	Captain commandant.	None	None	None	None.
Public Health Service.	None	Assistant surgeon.	Passed assistant surgeon.	Surgeon	Senior surgeon	Assistant surgeons general.	Surgeon General.	do	do	Do.
Coast and Geodetic Survey.[2]	Aid	Junior hydrographic and geodetic engineer.	Hydrographic and geodetic engineer.	Hydrographic and geodetic engineer.	Hydrographic and geodetic engineer.	Hydrographic and geodetic engineer.	None	do	do	Do.

[1] Vice admiral and admiral are grades which pertain under existing law to certain positions and are temporarily enjoyed by the incumbents of the latter.
[2] Coast and Geodetic Survey officers are commissioned with the above titles and in addition the words "with relative rank of (corresponding grade) in the Navy."

In discussing the schedules of pay proposed for the several services, inasmuch as by far the largest number of commissioned personnel is in the Army, I shall speak of the grades in the Army as the basis and refer to the personnel in the other services, as given in the foregoing table, as officers in corresponding grades.

The act of May 11, 1908, fixed the base pay of the grades in the Army and corresponding grades in other services as follows: Second lieutenant, $1,700; first lieutenant, $2,000; captain, $2,400; major, $3,000; lieutenant colonel, $3,500; colonel, $4,000; brigadier general, $6,000; and major general, $8,000. To this base pay was added an increase of 10 per cent for every five years' active service up to 40 per cent, which two items formed the base pay of the officer in the grade in which serving or commissioned. It is proper to state for the information of the House that such longevity pay was limited to a total of $1,000 by existing law. The act of May 18, 1920, known as the temporary pay bill, provided for additions to the pay of the officers in the Army and the corresponding grades in the other services as follows: Colonels and lieutenant colonels, $600; majors, $840; captains, $720; first lieutenants, $600; second lieutenants, $420. This temporary pay increase expires by limitation on the 30th of June, 1922.

The base pay proper of the bill now under consideration has but one change from the scale established by the act of 1908, that being a reduction in the base pay of officers in the grade of second lieutenant in the Army and Marine Corps and corresponding grades in the other services.

The first fundamental change proposed by the bill is in the establishing of the so-called pay periods. These are six in number and correspond to the six grades from second lieutenant to colonel, inclusive. The commissioned personnel are arranged in these various periods and the length of service fixed to be hereafter served in each period before passing to the next higher period for pay increase, regardless of whether the officer had been promoted or not. The committee, after full consideration, decided that this change in the plan of fixing the pay of officers instead of the present system, which is based solely on rank and grade, was wise in that it gave reasonable increase of pay to the officers in time of slow or no promotion and in that it protected the Government in times of rapid promotion, such as we have witnessed in the Army in the past two years following the enactment of the Army reorganization act.

I want to say in passing that our experience along that line is one of the things that has been working in my mind from the time that that law went into operation, and I hope that the Congress of the United States will see in its wisdom that this is the time and this is the opportunity, in the passage of this bill, to forever prevent again such an abuse, if it were an abuse—and it was so called by many—that occurred in these rapid promotions without experience.

I wish at this point to insert one example taken from the statement we had prepared in explanation of the provisions of the bill, and which seems to me to be sufficient to convince anyone of the wisdom of the proposed change. This illustration is taken from the record of the actual experience of that splendid Army officer, Gen. Hunter Liggett, and is as follows:

Maj. Gen. Hunter Liggett, now on the retired list, served 22 years in the grade of lieutenant, 5 years in the grade of captain, 7 years in the grade of major; so that he reached his lieutenant colonelcy after 34 years' commissioned service, during which time he never received a rate of pay above that prescribed for the grade of major. On the other hand, the junior major in the Army to-day served only 6 years as a commissioned officer before reaching the grade of major. General Liggett began to draw the pay of a major after 29 years of commissioned service; the junior major in the Army to-day began to draw that pay after 6 years of commissioned service. Under the method of paying officers by pay periods, General Liggett, whose service as a junior officer was performed during a period of very slow promotion in the Army, would have begun to draw the pay of a major after 22 years of commissioned service, after having drawn a captain's pay for many of the years that he actually drew the pay of a first lieutenant, and the junior major now in the Army, who is performing his service during a period of very rapid promotion in the Army, would not have begun to draw the pay of a major until after completing 14 years of commissioned service. In other words, General Liggett was penalized financially because he happened to perform his service during a period when promotion was very slow, even though during that period of service he was qualifying himself for the tremendous responsibilities which he later assumed as commander of an army in the field in the World War.

The pending bill provides that officers of certain grades and length of service shall be placed in the six pay periods extending over a period of 30 years, as follows:

First period: Second lieutenants with less than 5 years' service and first lieutenants with less than 3 years' service.

Second period: Second lieutenants with over 5 years' service; first lieutenants with over 3 and less than 10 years' service; captains with less than 7 years' service, and first lieutenants whose first appointment was above second lieutenant.

Third period: First lieutenants with over 10 years' service; captains with over 7 and less than 17 years' service; captains whose first appointment was above second lieutenant; captains ranking from July 1, 1920, or earlier, and majors with less than 14 years' service.

Fourth period: Captains with over 17 years' service; majors with over 14 and less than 23 years' service; majors whose first appointment was above second lieutenant; majors appointed under section 24, act of June 3, 1916, as amended by act of June 4, 1920, and lieutenant colonels with less than 20 years' service.

Fifth period: Majors with over 23 years' service; lieutenant colonels with over 20 and less than 30 years' service; lieutenant colonels whose first appointment was above captain; lieutenant colonels appointed under section 24, act June 3, 1916, as amended by act June 4, 1920, and colonels with less than 26 years' service.

Sixth period: Lieutenant colonels with over 30 years' service; colonels with over 26 years' service; colonels whose first appointment was above captain, and colonels appointed under section 24, act June 3, 1916, as amended by act June 4, 1920.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. McKENZIE. For a brief question.

Mr. MADDEN. Is there anything in this bill that will give to a colonel who served 30 years $750 more retired pay than he is getting now?

Mr. McKENZIE. That is a far-fetched question at this point in my argument, but I will say to my colleague that that is possibly true. I have not gone over those figures. I have not computed them myself, but I have found them in the report of the minority, and it is possibly true. But even if it is true—and I do not want to divert now in order to discuss that at this point—but even if it were true, it only goes to a colonel who has given 30 years of his life to this Government, and only a few of the many officers of the Army ever reach that grade.

Mr. MADDEN. How would it apply to a major who gets $937.50 more retired pay than he is getting at present?

Mr. McKENZIE. If he serves 30 years in the grade of major; but he has to serve 30 years before he can reach that place. And I want to say to my colleague from Illinois, while he may not have heard the complaints, I have heard them from some of the old veterans of the Army who are now on the retired list and who were retired early in life. But this bill does another thing. It provides further on that question—and I am digressing now—it provides if that colonel had retired when he had only 10 years' service he would have been paid for the length of service.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKENZIE. I would like to finish this, and then I shall be glad to yield.

This grouping provides for the assimilation of pay for officers of all the services, but appointed under diverse provisions of existing law.

Under existing law the men in the Navy draw 10 per cent for sea duty, and the men in the Army and officers draw 10 per cent for foreign-service pay. We have cut that down 50 per cent. There are about 70 per cent of the officers in the Navy who spend their time at sea, and about 5 per cent of the officers in the Army might be said to have field service in peace times.

Pay is now made up of base pay and increases for longevity. While the existing method provides an increase of 10 per cent on the base pay for each five years of service up to 20 years, with a maximum increase of $1,000, the bill under discussion provides instead an increase of 5 per cent on the base pay for each 3 years of service up to 30 years. While this gives an ultimate greater increase to a small group of veteran officers it operates, on the other hand, to slow down the rate of longevity increases in that, for example, the proposed bill requires 24 years of service to qualify for the same perecentatge of increase that under the present law may be obtained by 20 years' service.

The foregoing represents the fixed and permanent pay of officers in the various services as provided in the pending bill. In addition to the pay thus set forth, officers serving on sea or field duty are to receive 5 per cent additional, which it is estimated would normally include about 70 per cent of Navy officers and about 5 per cent of Army officers. This cost is offset by the proposed withdrawal of the 10 per cent sea pay for the Navy and the foreign service pay for the Army.

Under this plan, Mr. Speaker, officers coming in from the emergency are credited with the constructive service for base pay to which their rank entitles them. The value to the Government of the experience developed by long service, as well as rank, is substantially recognized. It offers a definite career based on efficient service in place of the inequities and uncertainties of promotion.

While it operates to prevent officers of short service from being overpaid it insures to veterans of long service that they shall not be underpaid. Remuneration falls where most appropriate and in a way to meet the increased expenses incident to family obligations and to rank. While the pay is not great, it is so arranged as to attract young men of a desirable type and assure them that as they gain in experience and demonstrate capacity a modest living can be definitely anticipated. This pay is not so largely determined by rank as has been the case in the past. Rank and pay are not synonymous. It is not the shoulder straps that count but the length of service that the officer has given to his country that will increase his pay instead of rank. [Applause.] I hope that the spirit of Americanism in this Congress will rise up and say that that is one thing at least about this bill that is just and fair to all the men in these services. [Applause.] One exists for purposes of command and precedence; the other for the meeting of financial obligations. Nevertheless, the proposed pay schedule still is associated with rank, though not as completely as heretofore and not so dependent upon the variations and vicissitudes of promotion. After careful consideration of the principle of this plan the services concerned are agreed that its adoption will, in the long run, add to their efficiency.

The Secretaries of War, Navy, Treasury, and Commerce have officially expressed themselves to that effect in giving their whole-hearted indorsement to this bill as now submitted, not only in respect to the principles involved but to the details of their application.

It is true that under the proposed bill an officer of long service may receive higher pay than an officer of greater rank but shorter service. This situation, however, exists at present. It is a fact, for example, that there are veteran captains of long service who are now receiving less pay than majors of short service. The bill has been intentionally drawn to give greater recognition to the value of experience. If any individual inequities exist under its provisions, these are absolutely effaced by the passage of time, usually of no great length.

The bill automatically provides for the pay of officers appointed to higher grades in war and makes the enactment of any temporary legislation for this purpose unnecessary. It defines the service which may at once be computed for longevity pay and restricts it for the future to commissioned service only.

It credits National Guard service with full time for longevity purposes when called into the service of the Federal Government. It gives full time for actual service in the Reserve Corps and half-time credit for inactive duty in the Reserve Corps. I may say here that the National Guard and the Reserve Corps are both in whole-hearted support of all the provisions of this bill.

The second, and in my judgment equally important, change from the present pay system is the establishment of a flexible or variable allowance provided for in the proposed bill. This takes note of the fact an officer with dependents has a greater burden to bear than one without dependents, which fact, in the judgment of the committee, is a matter deserving the prompt consideration of the Congress in providing a means or system of pay and allowances which will not be a discrimination against the officer without dependents, but which will deal justly with the officer with dependents.

In connection with this subject I can not do better than to reiterate a portion of the explanation of the bill heretofore circulated by the committee, which is as follows:

The hearings before the special committee investigating the subject of readjustment of pay for the services demonstrated conclusively that something more than the 1908 pay schedule is absolutely necessary for the officers and enlisted men of the various grades and services. In fact, this testimony brought out the fact very conclusively that the amount received under the act of May 18, 1920, is barely sufficient to meet the cost of living at the present time. This testimony is based almost entirely on the requirements of officers, who are required, in addition to maintaining themselves, to maintain wives, children, or other dependents. If the officer alone is to be considered, the 1908 pay schedule is probably sufficient, especially if it is probable that the cost of living will gradually fall. One of the problems, therefore, to be solved in adjusting the pay schedule is to meet this necessity for providing for the requirements of the officers who maintain dependents. So far as the pay proper is concerned section 1 of this bill retains practically the same base pay as in the 1908 schedule and provides an increase for service that adds very little to the 1908 pay. The required increase over the 1908 schedule can be obtained, then, by giving to all officers allowances sufficient for the officer with dependents, or by giving to the officer with dependents the necessary allowances and withholding them from the officer without dependents. To adopt the first course would be an unjustifiable burden on the Public Treasury; to adopt the second course is economically sound and at the same time meets the requirements of all officers of the service.

It may here be stated that the dependents included in this bill are a wife, unmarried children under 21 years of age, and a mother if actually dependent on the officer for her chief support.

The two factors of allowances for subsistence and for shelter enter into this variable allowance, which changes below the maximum limits prescribed in the bill—according as the cost of its two factors may fluctuate. This variable allowance has a greater money value in the case of officers with dependents, who constitute the greater majority of officers in the service, and its effect is felt through every home in the service. Such a flexible allowance operates to protect the officer against penalization through rise in the cost of living and prevent his profiting if the cost of living falls. It stabilizes a modest living.

Neither the idea of a variable allowance nor that of recognition of dependency is new. Rations formed part of the pay of Army officers during nearly the first century of the Republic.

Dependency has been recognized in the difference in quarters erected at Army posts and in commutation of quarters, heat, and light for dependents while officers were in the field or at sea. It was observed in the enactment of the recent draft law, it enters into the pensions, family allowances, and war-risk insurance granted by the Government, it appears in the transportation of dependents at Government expense when changing station, and is also recognized by many great corporations in the handling of their employees. It is a principle peculiarly applicable to the living conditions imposed by military service.

The first suggestion of the committee was to base this variable allowance—which in fact is an element of base pay and I wish it so considered—on the number of dependents; but after thorough consideration, having in mind the difficulties in the way of administration on such a basis, the committee adopted the plan set forth in the bill and which in my judgment is much superior in every way. Section 5 of the bill covering this subject, in so far as the subsistence item is concerned, reads as follows:

SEC. 5. That each commissioned officer on the active list or on active duty below the grade of brigadier general or its equivalent, in any of the services mentioned in the title of this act, shall be entitled at all times, in addition to his pay, to a money allowance for subsistence, the value of one allowance to be determined by the President for each fiscal year in accordance with a certificate furnished by the Secretary of Labor showing the comparative retail cost of food in the United States for the previous calendar year as compared with the calendar year 1922. The value of one allowance is hereby fixed at 60 cents per day for the fiscal year 1923, and this value shall be the maximum and shall be used by the President as the standard in fixing the same or lower values for subsequent years. To each officer of any of the said services receiving the base pay of the first period the amount of this allowance shall be equal to one subsistence allowance, to each officer receiving the base pay of the second, third, or sixth period the amount of this allowance shall be equal to two subsistence allowances, and to each officer receiving the base pay of the fourth or fifth period the amount of this allowance shall be equal to three subsistence allowances: Provided, That an officer with no dependents shall receive one subsistence allowance in lieu of the above allowances.

The maximum value of one subsistence allowance is fixed at 60 cents. This maximum can and will be proportionately lowered by the President should the cost of living decrease and will tend to reduce the total amount of pay to that extent; but it does provide a flexible element in the base pay of an officer which can be regulated from year to year without action by the Congress. The granting of but one allowance to officers without dependents, and adding to the allowances in certain periods for officers having dependents, puts the element of humanity into the pay scale without exploiting the Government or discriminating against an officer without dependents.

Gentlemen, I hope you get that point. That has been one of the things on my mind ever since I have been on the Committee on Military Affairs that I never have been able to explain, why a major general without dependents would be entitled to $1,684 as commutation for heat, rooms, and light in the city of Washington, while a captain with a wife and three or four little children, perhaps, to support was given $800.50.

Gentlemen of the committee, that is one of the things we are trying to correct in this bill. We are trying to put some humanity in it. For the first time in the history of our Army and Navy we are insisting on inserting the human element, and insisting that the normal state of mankind is to have a family and a home, and it is unjust to say that a man who is without dependents is entitled to the same compensation with allowances as the man with dependents. The base pay is the same, and should be.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. What is the policy now with respect to our giving a regular amount? Is that change contemplated?

Mr. McKENZIE. That was true for nearly a century.

Mr. MADDEN. It is introducing a new element in the pay of officers.

Mr. McKENZIE. It is introducing an element that at one time was introduced by giving a ration.

Mr. MADDEN. That is in the pay.

Mr. McKENZIE. I will say to my colleague that I believe in putting the cards absolutely on the table in a matter of this kind. No attempt has been made to deceive anybody in connection with this legislation. I have insisted upon the maximums being put into this bill, and I will say that these variable amounts are called "variable" because we could not think of a better name; but it is pay, and it is an increase over the pay of 1908.

Mr. MADDEN. What would be the maximum for ration under the bill?

Mr. McKENZIE. Six hundred and fifty-seven dollars; that is, at the maximum of 60 cents. If that were reduced, of course——

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes.

Mr. TEMPLE. Is it not true that the base pay has been cut below the present standard, and the ration has been added, which is a flexible element, according to the cost?

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes. I have those figures all in my speech, gentlemen, that were suggested by my colleagues. I will not take the time to read them now.

The value of a single allowance being fixed for this year at 60 cents provides additional pay of $219 for the officer without dependents and also for all officers serving in the first pay period. To officers with dependents in the second pay period, $438; third pay period, $438; fourth pay period, $657; fifth pay period, $657; sixth pay period, $438.

It will be noted that the value of the above subsistence allowance is lowest at the extremes of the military career, when the family may, on the one hand, be presumed to have not yet been established, or, on the other, when the family group has begun to disintegrate by death or self-support. It is given, in a general way, according to actual need only.

I next wish to call to the attention of the House the fact that the commissioned personnel of the services under consideration are now entitled under the law to living quarters, which are furnished at regular posts, the same being of two classes, viz, quarters for married officers and bachelors' quarters, or quarters for unmarried officers. In the absence of quarters the officer is granted an allowance in commutation for quarters, heat, and light, provided in accordance with regulations prescribing different zones and variations of allowance therein on account of climatic conditions, the zone of Washington being about the average for the country. In order that all may be advised fully in connection with this particular subject, I desire to include at this point in my remarks a table setting out fully the allowance granted in all grades, and particularly to call attention to the fact that this allowance is based solely on grade, and the fact that an officer has or has not dependents is not taken into consideration; the major general without dependents, you will observe from the table, is granted the sum of $1,664.85—zone of Washington—while a captain with a wife and children is allowed but $800.50. The justice or otherwise of such an arrangement is one of the matters for consideration submitted in the pending bill:

The committee recommends the repeal of all existing laws governing the commutation for rooms, heat, and light, and in lieu thereof the adoption of section 6 of the pending bill, which makes a rental allowance part of the variable allowance and which reads as follows:

SEC. 6. That each commissioned officer on the active list or on active duty below the grade of brigadier general or its equivalent, in any of the services mentioned in the title of this act, if public quarters are not available, shall be entitled at all times, in addition to his pay, to a money allowance for rental of quarters, the amount of such allowance to be determined by the rate for one room fixed by the President for each fiscal year in accordance with a certificate furnished by the Secretary of Labor showing the comparative cost of rents in the United States for the preceding calendar year as compared with the calendar year 1922. Such rate for one room is hereby fixed at $20 per month for the fiscal year 1923, and this rate shall be the maximum and shall be used by the President as the standard in fixing the same or lower rates for subsequent years. To each officer receiving the base pay of the first period the amount of this allowance shall be equal to that for two rooms, to each officer receiving the base pay of the second period the amount of this allowance shall be equal to that for three rooms, to each officer receiving the base pay of the third period the amount of this allowance shall be equal to that for four rooms, to each officer receiving the base pay of the fourth period the amount of this allowance shall be equal to that for five rooms, and to each officer receiving the base pay of the fifth or sixth period the amount of this allowance shall be equal to that for six rooms. The rental allowance shall accrue while the officer is on field or sea duty, temporary duty away from his permanent station, in hospital, on leave of absence or on sick leave, regardless of any shelter that may be furnished him for his personal use, if his dependent or dependents are not occupying public quarters during such period. In lieu of the above allowances an officer with no dependents receiving the base pay of the first or second period shall receive the allowance for two rooms, such an officer receiving the base pay of the third or fourth period shall receive the allowance for three rooms, and such an officer receiving the base pay of the fifth or sixth period shall receive the allowance for four rooms, but no rental allowance shall be made to any officer without dependents by reason of his employment on field or sea duty.

Under the system of this bill a rental allowance is made at so much per month, $20 a room. The young officer, a second lieutenant, is allowed two rooms. That is $40. Then we raise it as the family increases. Then later on we cut that down and put it in one proposition, and instead of putting down what the cost is in San Antonio and then figuring out what it is in Washington, we make a flat proposition of $20 per room. That is subject to revision by the President. That is the maximum. It never can be higher than that, but it can be reduced as fixed by the President and may be reduced as rentals go down.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman will concede that when the allowance is made no President will ever reduce the maximum allowance.

Mr. McKENZIE. I have the utmost faith in the President carrying out the report of the Department of Labor. This is a law. It says this year the rental is $20 per room per month. Next year the Department of Labor will make a report. If it shows that rentals are down 10 per cent below what they are this year, the President of the United States will have no discretion. He must reduce it.

Mr. STAFFORD. In the history of the Government there has never been any reduction when an allowance has been fixed.

Mr. McKENZIE. You will notice that it is mandatory. The maximum is fixed in this bill.

Mr. MADDEN. What about the maximum in 1908?

Mr. McKENZIE. I have not time to figure that out. The gentleman speaks of a colonel?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. The base pay would be $4,000, plus 40 per cent, and then his allowance for room, whatever it is.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. In the hearings did it develop that any great commercial institutions in the United States based their pay of employees on length of service? Is there any institution that places its base pay on the number of dependents that any particular employee has?

Mr. McKENZIE. I could not say as to that latter proposition, but as to the first proposition, I think it is unquestionably true.

At this point I quote from the published comment on the bill in relation to this particular action:

Section 6 operates to give two, three, four, and five rental allowances to officers receiving pay in the first, second, third, and fourth periods, respectively, and six to those in the fifth and sixth periods. This distribution is based on the fact that two rental allowances is the minimum amount with which a young officer without a family can provide himself with quarters under average conditions, and they increase progressively up to and including the fifth period, thus conforming to the idea that the officer's family needs are increasing during these years and to the principle that an older officer requires somewhat better living conditions than a young one. If an officer remains without dependents throughout his career, only those increases based on the principle that the older officer requires somewhat more are allowed, and such an officer would receive in the first and second periods, the third and fourth periods, and the fifth and sixth periods two, three, and four allowances, respectively.

Recognizing the fact that the officer on field or sea duty must maintain his family during his absence, the rental allowances of such an officer accrue to him while on said duty, provided his family is not occupying public quarters, but the officer without any dependents will receive no rental allowances while on field or sea duty.

The above rental allowance of $20 per month per room has a monthly money value as follows:

First pay period, 2 allowances	$40
Second pay period, no dependents, 2 allowances	40
Second pay period, with dependents, 3 allowances	60
Third pay period, no dependents, 3 allowances	60
Third pay period, with dependents, 4 allowances	80
Fourth pay period, no dependents, 3 allowances	60
Fourth pay period, with dependents, 5 allowances	100
Fifth pay period, no dependents, 4 allowances	80
Fifth pay period, with dependents, 6 allowances	120
Sixth pay period, no dependents, 4 allowances	80
Sixth pay period, with dependents, 6 allowances	120

The above amounts would decrease as the cost of living may fall. The cost of shelter is notoriously high, and at present the average officer living in hired quarters is forced to pay for them far more than he receives from the Government therefor. The purpose of these allowances is to enable the officer to more nearly meet this additional expense. By paying a flat rate for heat and light, the accounting for the same, which at present varies not only with numerous zones but with the seasons, would be greatly simplified.

The bill places a limitation of $7,200 as the maximum total of pay proper and allowances for colonels of more than 30 years' service. General officers and flag officers receive no increase.

The foregoing explanations cover in general the more important provisions of the bill covering the commissioned personnel of all the services.

With respect to the enlisted personnel of the several services, I wish to say that the pending bill applies to them the same general principles as in the case of officers, namely, to establish a pay scale offering a career to a high class of men desiring to devote their lives to the service and enabling them to support their families in decency, and to give greater recognition to long service and efficiency. Material increases of pay have accordingly been given the higher grades of noncommissioned officers. While the rates of pay for the lower grades for short service have been reduced, these have been largely offset by increasing the rates of special pay offered to ambitious enlisted men who are willing and able to qualify themselves as technical specialists. The pay scale for enlisted men is specifically planned to be an incentive to promotion and endeavor; it does not encourage the indefinite remaining in the service of the unambitious and undesirable man willing to pass his military career in the grade of private.

The pending bill wipes out many special rates of pay and puts, as far as possible, the forces in the various services on the same level; and this is especially true in the case of first enlistments, where the pay in all the services is fixed at $21 per month. In the Navy pay scale there are, under existing law, over 7,000 different grades of pay, while under the pending bill they are reduced to 507, which will be a great saving administratively as well as primarily to the Government. To illustrate the administrative simplification accomplished by the bill, I want you to look at this list I hold in my hand and which is a stronger visual argument along that line than any I can make verbally, I am sure. I shall include at this point, as an extension of my remarks, the following from the printed comment on the bill heretofore furnished by the committee:

PAY OF WARRANT OFFICERS AND ENLISTED MEN OF THE ARMY AND MARINE CORPS.

The rates of pay established for enlisted men of the Army and Marine Corps by this section have been determined by a very careful consideration of the enlisted men's pay schedule. A thorough overhauling of this schedule was absolutely necessary for the Army and Marine Corps. The old schedule of 1908, which was very satisfactory at the time it was adopted, has been modified in such thoroughly unsatisfactory ways since 1908 that a complete new schedule was found to be necessary. In 1920 the War Department suggested a readjusted schedule for incorporation in the Army reorganization bill of June 4, 1920. This readjusted schedule, however, was not adopted by Congress in that bill. The old schedule was simply revised to conform to the new grades established in that act. On the other hand, the Navy Department had made a very long and exhaustive study of the enlisted pay schedule of the Navy, and that schedule was adopted by Congress as a temporary measure in the act of May 18, 1920. This Navy schedule, with some slight modifications, is incorporated in the present bill as a permanent schedule. It has been in operation in the Navy for nearly two years and has proven highly satisfactory. Its adoption for the Army and Marine Corps, modified only to correspond with the grades and specialist ratings in the Army and Marine Corps, was the logical thing to do for two reasons: First, because it is a satisfactory enlisted schedule; and, second, in order to bring about a parity in the pay schedule of the enlisted services, one of the objects to be attained in this consolidated pay bill.

The only material modification of the Navy 1920 schedule is in the rate for men of the seventh grade. This rate is $9 a month less than that fixed during the war, but it is $6 a month, or 40 per cent, more than the rate fixed in the 1908 schedule. This rate is reasonable for both the Government and the man. It is $21 a month for the man in addition to his food, his shelter, his clothing, his transportation, and his medical care, and he is in a position to increase this pay by demonstrated ability along either military or technical lines.

During his earlier career in the Army the enlisted man is really of very little value to the service. It takes him a considerable period of time to become adjusted to the new conditions of living; he must learn many things that he knew absolutely nothing about in civil life before he reaches a point where he is of any particular value to the Government. It therefore is reasonable and proper that he should start with a small rate of pay.

His promotion in the military service is determined by two general considerations—first, his military efficiency; and, second, his qualifications for special and technical work. On the basis of military qualifications the enlisted men of the Army are divided into seven grades which correspond to military rank; and on the basis of special and technical qualifications the men in the two lower grades who have no military rank are divided into six classes of specialists.

A man's increases in pay, therefore, after he enters the Army will proceed along either of two separate and distinct lines—one purely military in its character, the other technical in its character. The increases in pay along both of these lines must be adjusted so as to provide an incentive to the men to work, and the highest pay which they can obtain must be sufficient to attract good men to the service and hold them in it long enough to work up to these maximum rates of pay.

It should be noted that in establishing the pay schedule for enlisted men and warrant officers no particular attention was paid to the fact that the highest grade enlisted man and the warrant officer receive more pay than the junior second lieutenants. It is considered that the pay schedules for officers and enlisted men and warrant officers are based on very different principles, and the pay of a second lieutenant, who is just starting his career in the commissioned service, bears no relation to the pay of an enlisted man of the first grade and a warrant officer who are completing their careers in the enlisted service.

PAY OF WARRANT OFFICERS AND ENLISTED MEN OF NAVY AND COAST GUARD.

Pay of warrant officers: In fixing the pay of warrant officers of the Navy and Coast Guard it was necessary, in order to avoid increments of pay now allowed by law for periods of three years' service, to establish three rates of monthly base pay. Under present law the increases for these periods vary from $125 to $250. In addition to base pay the warrant officer is drawing a temporary monthly increase of $20, a ration allowance of $15, commutation of quarters on shore of $24, heat and light of about $9 (in the zone of Washington, D. C.). The provisions submitted give the warrant officer a base pay based on both length of service and character of duty, and sufficient, with his allowances later prescribed, to meet his proper needs.

Pay of enlisted men: In fixing the pay of enlisted men of the Navy and Coast Guard consideration has been given to the necessity for a large percentage of skilled men in the first five grades. Inasmuch as the rates of pay for these grades as fixed in the act of May 18, 1920, were the result of an exhaustive study by a special board in the Navy Department, it is believed that the conditions obtaining at that time have not changed enough to warrant any reduction in these rates. The effect of reducing the pay of these grades would undoubtedly result in losing the services of many thousands of trained men, with the alternative of replacing them by recruits who would require years of training at great expense to the Government. A reduction in pay of $12 per month each for the sixth and seventh grades is considered advisable, as the committee believes that the preferences in pay should be given to the older men of longer service who have adopted the Navy and Coast Guard as a career and who, by virtue of their age and longer service, are likely to be responsible for the support of dependents.

While the rates of pay herein prescribed are considerably less than the rates for corresponding occupations in civil life, it is believed that the pay, together with the subsistence furnished for the man himself and the prospect of eventual retirement, will be sufficient to retain a sufficient number of skilled men to operate the ships and stations of the Navy and Coast Guard.

The proviso (line 19, p. 14) for including chief petty officers under acting appointment in the first grade is in line with the present practice and, with the Navy at present strength, will save about $800,000 annually to the Government. Chief petty officers under permanent appointment can not be reduced except by sentence of a court-martial. When issued an acting appointment at reduced pay he is placed on probation and must serve for at least one year before being issued a permanent appointment. About one-fourth of the total number of chief petty officers should ordinarily be serving under acting appointments.

Naval Reserve Force: It is also recommended that the pay of members of the Naval Reserve Force be proportioned by law on the base pay herein prescribed. No attempt has been made to change the present pay of the Naval Reserve Force, as it is understood that this will be included in separate legislation which will completely reorganize this force. However, it is recommended that there be no reduction in the pay of members of the fleet reserve who have been transferred on the date of approval of this act. These men, numbering some 2,000, have been transferred in good faith in accordance with pre-war legislation contained in the naval appropriation bill approved August, 1916, and your committee considers that the Government is obligated not to reduce the compensation of this group of men.

Permanent additions to pay: It is recommended that all present permanent additions to pay of enlisted men of the Navy and Coast Guard be abolished, and that in lieu thereof longevity pay be substituted. These permanent additions are the result of old Executive orders. They consist of continuous-service pay and citizenship pay of varying amounts. A man of the sixth grade who reenlists received just as much increase as the man of the first grade. Under the proposed longevity the percentage increase will be on the base pay of the respective grades and will result in a net saving to the Government. An increase of 10 per cent is recommended after the first four years' service, and three successive increases of 5 per cent for succeeding four-year periods, limited to 25 per cent. This is slightly different from the longevity recommended for the Army and Marine Corps, but the total—25 per cent—is the same for all services, and the cost will be the same. The 10 per cent increase serves as an incentive to reenlistment and at the same time keeps the first increase at approximately the same amount as is now allowed.

Transient additions to pay: All transient additions to pay of enlisted men of the Navy and Coast Guard are abolished except in five classes, viz, cooks or messmen, divers, mail clerks, men holding medals or decorations, and gun pointers. At present the Navy and Coast Guard give transient additions to pay for 20 different classes of work; the reduction to five will result in a large saving to the Government.

Retired enlisted men: There are now 604 enlisted men on the retired list of the Navy and on the retired list of the Coast Guard. It is believed that, as these men were specifically exempted from the benefits of the temporary increase of May 18, 1920, there should be some provision for their relief in the bill. They are all men of 30 years or more active service, and have suffered from the decreased purchasing power of the dollar. In order to relieve cases of distress, it has been necessary at times for the Navy Department to order some of these men to appropriate active duty on shore, where they could receive active pay and allowances. This increase would result in an increased cost for the Navy of about $300,000 per annum, but would not affect the total net saving of $4,600,000 for 1923 or the eventual saving of $7,458,000 four years hence.

Insular force: The comptroller has decided that the insular force of the Navy, which is limited by law to 500 men for service in the Philippines, is entitled to the full pay of their corresponding grades of enlisted men in the Regular Navy. Inasmuch as it was not the intent of Congress or the Navy Department to increase the pay of this force, it is recommended that the pay of the insular force be fixed at one-half the pay for corresponding grades in the Regular Navy.

Reenlistment gratuities: The reenlistment gratuities of enlisted men of the Navy and Coast Guard have been greatly reduced, so that instead of paying four months' pay on reenlistment, a maximum of $200 is paid to men of the first three grades on reenlistment within three months after an honorable discharge and a maximum of $100 for men in other grades reenlisting under similar conditions. A saving of about $2,670,000 is effected by this provision.

The gratuity on reenlistment was originally authorized to take the place of the 30 days' annual leave on full pay allowed to Government employees. A majority of men in the Navy and Coast Guard now get this leave annually, whereas years ago they took a cruise of four years and then received the four months under full pay at the expiration of the cruise. However, it is a matter of economy to pay some gratuity as an inducement to reenlistment. The cost of recruiting, transporting, and training a raw recruit to fill the place of a trained man will be considerably more expensive to the Government than the payment of this gratuity.

SECTION 11. ALLOWANCES OF WARRANT OFFICERS AND ENLISTED MEN OF THE ARMY AND MARINE CORPS.

Warrant officers' allowances: Warrant officers of the Navy and Coast Guard are now granted (1) one commuted ration; (2) commutation for two rooms if on shore not occupying public quarters, or at sea, if he has dependents; (3) a temporary increase in pay of $240 per annum; and (4) commutation for heat and light equivalent to that allowed an ensign. Warrant officers of the Army have the allowance of a second lieutenant for quarters and no allowance for rations.

This bill gives the warrant officers of all services (1) a rental allowance for two rooms if on shore and not occupying public quarters, or at sea, if he has dependents, and (2) a subsistence allowance for himself at all times.

Enlisted men: To enlisted men not furnished quarters or rations in kind, there are now allowed varying amounts for subsistence, or for subsistence and room. In exceptional cases, where these men travel from place to place for short periods, incurring expenses for transient accommodations at hotels, meals, etc., an amount equal to $4 per day is allowed. In the great majority of cases these amounts are much smaller.

This bill establishes, under the direction of the President, uniform regulations for all services. There is no additional expense involved.

Pilots' subsistence: When civilian pilots are used they are subsisted in the officers' messes. Regulations now authorize an amount to be paid to the treasurer of the mess in which the pilot is subsisted for the period of his stay on board. In exceptional cases pilots may be on board for a considerable length of time.

This bill authorizes the continuance of the present method and involves no extra cost to the Government.

Rations commuted for enlisted men: Present law authorizes the issuance of rations in kind to every enlisted man, or the commutation thereof. It is desired to continue this authority so as to permit the commutation of rations to chief petty officers in organized messes, mess attendants assigned to officers' messes, and sick enlisted men subsisted on diet prepared in officers' messes.

This provision involves no additional expense to the Government, and simply continues present practice.

Subsistence and rental allowances to insular force: It is considered advisable to specifically prohibit the payments of any personal allowance for subsistence or for rental of quarters to members of the insular force, so that this question will not be referred to the comptroller general.

The present bill proposes that the method now authorized by existing law for quartering and messing enlisted men, which have been found by experience to be satisfactory, should not be changed; but it does provide that these methods shall be the same for all the services and that uniform regulations shall be published by the President to replace the existing regulations, which are different for each service.

Enlisted men of the National Guard: The present rate of pay for enlisted men of the National Guard is continued for armory drills and summer encampments. If drafted into the United States service, they receive the same pay as for corresponding grades in the Regular Army.

Travel allowances: The bill puts all the services on a parity in this respect, giving them all the same allowances as are now authorized in the Navy.

On the other hand, the bill provides that the special benefits which accrue to the Government for travel over land-grant railroads by the Army shall also accrue to the Government from similar travel by the other services.

I want you gentlemen to notice this pay table of the Navy. There is what it is now; this is what it will be under this law:

The Nurse Corps: The principles of recognition for long service and efficiency, already outlined for officers and enlisted men, are made to apply to the Nurse Corps. A more definite career is offered by the bill to this deserving class of women, upon whom falls the immediate care and ministration of the sick and wounded of the standing forces and many of our disabled veterans of the World War. While each of the six services has shown a saving below their present pay for officers and for enlisted men, the members of the female Nurse Corps have been given an increase. This is necessary in order to meet the wage scales in civil life for such service as they render, also to create such a definite career as will induce the best type of these trained women to remain in the service.

Retired officers: The bill applies the principle of recognition of length of service, already set forth, to retired officers. Officers retired after July 1, 1922, would receive retired pay on the basis of this bill.

Saving clauses: The bill recognizes the principle in equity of maintaining what amounts to an existing contract with the Government. Accordingly no enlisted man will have his pay reduced during his current enlistment, nor will an officer receive less pay than under the permanent pay scale of 1908, under the moral assurance of which he has entered and remained in the service. But officers and men hereafter entering the service would do so under the pay scale established by this bill and with full understanding of its present and future financial incentives and opportunities.

CONCLUSION.

In concluding this brief outline of what is a very elaborate, carefully thought out, and comprehensive common plan for the pay of all the six services, I desire to reiterate, Mr. Chairman, that it represents the best thought of the Joint Committee of the House and Senate, sitting over a period of many months and reaching its conclusions only after most careful inquiry and mature deliberation.

The very difficulties dependent on the diversities of the services concerned and which have been so successfully met and overcome have made it such a harmonious mechanism that interference with one point may disturb the balance of the whole. Amendment in respect to one service may very likely have an unexpected and undesired effect on others. Yet the plan as a whole is not intricate but only coordinate.

The plan itself offers a material saving in money. It readjusts the expenditure of funds in a way to promote efficiency. It assures a modest livelihood in a way to attract and retain a high class of officers and men. It maintains a career within the services irrespective of any reductions in personnel which may be made. It has been most carefully scrutinized by all the services concerned, and meets with their whole-hearted approval. It is at once simple, scientific, logical, and practical.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that a bill with such facts to commend it should pass.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKENZIE. I will.

Mr. MADDEN. As a matter of information I want to ask the gentleman what effect the bill will have as to compensation on these persons who were formerly clerks and now are in the finance division?

Mr. McKENZIE. It will make no change. I think I know to whom my colleague refers. They are men in the finance division under our good friend General Lord. They were men who had long years' services as clerks and through the efforts of some colleagues of mine—I was one who opposed it along with some others, I think my friend, Mr. GREENE of Vermont—it was legislated into the law that these men should be taken in as commissioned officers in the finance division, and it was provided that they should have longevity pay for the time they had been in service. If my colleague feels that that is unjust, this pay committee is not responsible. It is the law, and it applies to them, and it applies to old-time commissioned warrant officers in the Navy. They were commissioned in the Navy in 1920, and I think my good friend Mr. KRAUS, and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER], who served on the Committee on Naval Affairs, voted for it. They are entitled under the law to the consideration for the commissions they now hold.

Mr. MADDEN. I was asking what effect it had on their pay.

Mr. McKENZIE. It has no particular effect.

Mr. MADDEN. In comparison with men who have been in the service as long as they have without receiving——

Mr. McKENZIE. It leaves them in the pay period where they are. In other words, we have placed the men in the pay period where we found them. A major—we leave him in the same pay period representing the majors, No. 4; the captain in No. 3.

Mr. EVANS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKENZIE. I will.

Mr. EVANS. Did I understand the gentleman correctly to say that the base pay is fixed on the supposition that there has been an increase of 100 per cent in the cost of living since 1914?

Mr. McKENZIE. That is practically true; but we are not basing it entirely on the cost of living.

Mr. EVANS. I did not understand or get the thought the gentleman was endeavoring to convey when he said that it was based on 100 per cent increase in the cost of living.

Mr. McKENZIE. Since 1908; is not that pretty near right?

Mr. EVANS. In mentioning the amount of $142,000,000 or $143,000,000 as the probable appropriation under this bill, does the gentleman include in that the change that would be made on account of the dependents?

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes.

Mr. EVANS. In what way does the gentleman arrive at the number of officers with dependents?

Mr. McKENZIE. It is figured that about seventy-odd per cent of the officers in the Army have dependents. It is an estimate, of course.

Mr. EVANS. Does the gentleman expect the increase for the clerks to whom he refers to be along the same line and the same rate as the naval employees?

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes; they are commissioned officers.

Mr. EVANS. They get it by reason of the commission?

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes; they are officers in the Army.

Mr. TEMPLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKENZIE. Certainly.

Mr. TEMPLE. I am afraid the gentleman from Nebraska may have got a wrong impression. The gentleman from Illinois does not mean to say that the cost of living having increased 100 per cent you increase the pay 100 per cent?

Mr. McKENZIE. No; nor half of it.

Mr. KRAUS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKENZIE. I will.

Mr. KRAUS. The reason for my propounding this question is because I think my colleague from Nebraska misunderstood the statement of the gentleman from Illinois. Does the gentleman from Illinois desire to have the House understand that if this bill passes the cost of the Army for the fiscal year 1923, with 150,000 men and 13,000 officers, will be only about $1,000,000 more than if there was no legislation at all?

Mr. McKENZIE. That is the idea.

Mr. KRAUS. That is what the gentleman desires the House to understand?

Mr. McKENZIE. I am giving the figures to you that were made, and I presume the gentleman from Indiana has the same figures.

Mr. KRAUS. I think the gentleman wants to look over that again. Does the gentleman mean for the House to understand that for the fiscal year 1923, with an Army of 150,000 men and 13,000 officers, as contemplated in the Budget law, it will cost only $1,000,000 more under his bill than with no legislation at all?

Mr. McKENZIE. The gentleman wants to take into consideration that the enlisted personnel of 150,000 is reduced.

Mr. KRAUS. I am propounding this question in order to have a comparison. The gentleman will concede that we must have the same number of officers and men in order to make a comparison. The gentleman made a statement which would lead the House to believe that under the circumstances I have stated the cost under this bill would be approximately $1,000,000 more than no legislation.

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes. I made that statement on the strength of the estimates that I received. If they are not correct, I should be very glad to correct them, for I do not want to deceive anyone.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Is not the difference between the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Indiana based on the statement furnished—that the proposed pay, exclusive of the saving clauses, is $143,000,000, and the pay if no legislation is enacted, $142,000,000? That is the difference. The gentleman is referring to the statement exclusive of the saving clauses.

Mr. KRAUS. That is the reason I asked the gentleman to explain what he desires the House to understand, because I am confident that the gentleman from Nebraska had the misunderstanding which now the gentleman from South Carolina calls attention to as incorrect.

Mr. McKENZIE. It is stated in detail in my remarks. I just gave the totals, and the whole explanation the gentleman will find in my remarks. The saving clauses mean about $7,000,000. I want to call attention briefly now to a few things in the minority report which my colleagues filed. In the first place, they go on to make the statement that in 1916 we had about 12,000 officers in the Army in all of these services and that now we have something like 21,000; furthermore, that we have about 150,000 enlisted men in the National Guard, and that that costs $25,000,000; that we have 95,000 young men in school.

Those are all facts, and for one I say thank God for that situation. There is nothing to complain about in that. That legislation was not enacted simply to give a few men commissions in the Army and the Navy. That legislation was enacted in 1916 and in 1920 at the demand of the people of this country that we do a little something toward giving us a little preparedness more than we had in 1916. That was the object of that legislation, and of the reorganization act, and the act of 1916, and the acts affecting the Navy increasing this number of officers from 12,000 to 21,000, and all it means is that we have that much more preparedness in this country than we had at that time, and so far as this bill is concerned it has nothing to do with it, because the Congress of the United States can reduce that number of officers at any time it wants to, and there is a movement on foot now to reduce the number. This bill will apply to whatever number of officers remain with just the same effect as if we had 21,000. So that I can not see anything in that contention.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. So far as the sliding scale of pay of these officers is concerned that scale is only affected by the sliding scale of rations and the size of the family. Those are the only two elastic elements in the pay schedule.

Mr. McKENZIE. The size of the family is not mentioned. It would be whether they had dependents at all or not.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. And the amount of the rations. Those are the only two that affect the sliding scale.

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes. The longevity pay is changed from 10 per cent for 20 years to 5 per cent for 30 years.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. In response to the question of the gentleman from Indiana, the gentleman from Illinois stated with reference to the $142,000,000 and the $143,000,000, the difference between what our Army would cost during the fiscal year 1923, and without this bill, that that was exclusive of the saving clause. Will the gentleman tell what that saving clause amounts to, and how much that adds to the bill?

Mr. McKENZIE. I can not tell exactly, but I can say to my friend that it means about $7,000,000. All of the enlisted men in the Army in all of these services will draw the present pay to the end of their enlistment. In other words, the Government is going to keep its contract with those men during their period of enlistment. When their time expires, and they come in or other men come in, they come in at $21 a month, so that that expense will be added to the Government until their time expires. The officers who were advanced in these rapid promotions find themselves in pay periods above where they would naturally have been under this bill, but they will remain there stationary for a few years until they move into the next period, and then the bill will move along in its natural course. Those are what we call the saving clauses.

Mr. RANKIN. About what is the estimate it will cost?

Mr. McKENZIE. About $7,000,000.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman further yield?

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I am not entirely clear as to what effect this bill will have upon the pay of those officers who may be reduced under the new proposed Army bill. The gentleman says there are 21,000 officers, and the new bill proposes 11,000 officers. What will bcome of the pay of those officers removed or demoted?

Mr. McKENZIE. That applies only to the Army, and that would depend on the law that we pass at that time, providing for their retirement pay. I want to call attention to another thing in the minority report. Attention is there called to the fact that a major may possibly draw a maximum of $7,200 under this bill. That is true, and I am not making any denial of it. So far as I am concerned I am for him, but it requires a number of things to enable him to do it. In the first place he must have served 30 years in the Army before he got up to the grade of a lieutenant colonel. In the next place, he must have dependents, and in the third place he must be living away from any Army post where he has to rent quarters. Under those circumstances if a major has served 30 years and has not been able to get promotion, I feel that he is entitled by experience to that pay.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Would that depend upon the number of dependents?

Mr. McKENZIE. No.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Suppose he has one dependent, would it be the same?

Mr. McKENZIE. It would be the same if he had a wife or a child under 21 years of age. I have not the time to call attention to all of the things in this report, but you will find on page 4 the number of quotations from Mr. Weeks, from Mr. Denby, and others indicating that the original proposition which I submitted was not adopted, and that they criticized it when I did present it.

It was not my proposition any more than it was your proposition. It was simply I had two things in mind and other members of the committee had them in mind, and one of them was that the pay in this service should be based on length of service rather than on rank alone. The other was that an officer without dependents was not entitled to the same allowance and to commutation as the officer who had dependents, and with all the criticism that was made—Mr. Weeks criticized my proposition and suggestion at the time—there are at the present time only two men in all of my acquaintance who have given any attention to this bill who are not now enthusiastically for it. They are my two friends on the committee, the gentleman from Alabama and the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKENZIE. These other gentlemen have conceded this is wise and sound.

Mr. CRISP. I want to ask the gentleman, and I think his last statement answers the question, what is the attitude of the War and Navy Departments as to the bill now?

Mr. McKENZIE. I want to say to the gentleman from Georgia, my good friend, that they all approve it. General Lejeune, of the Marine Corps; Secretary Weeks, Mr. Denby, Mr. Clifford, Mr. Hoover, all these men that have to do with these services; you will find their letters in the hearings. I will have some in the morning that we did not have time to prepare for this discussion to-day, but will bring them here to-morrow, and you will find those letters in there. One man, Mr. Wainwright, Assistant Secretary of War, says that if they had had this law in force in 1920 it would have saved $25,000,000 in the Army alone.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. I would like to ask the gentleman if the position of Secretary Weeks, Mr. Hoover, and General Lejeune influenced the committee to any extent?

Mr. McKENZIE. They did not, I will say to my good friend from Mississippi. We had the bill finished, and after it was finished, realizing this criticism, I wrote each one of those gentlemen a personal letter asking what they thought about it now. It was weeks and weeks after they made this criticism.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Did the committee have any information from them officially or otherwise before they wrote the bill?

Mr. McKENZIE. We did not.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Not that the gentleman knows of?

Mr. McKENZIE. The fact of the matter is we did not care.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. That is the point I am trying to get.

Mr. McKENZIE. I want to say to my good friend from Mississippi, as one member of that committee I did not take orders from any man in the Army or Navy, and I was not deceived by any of them; I was not deceived for a minute of the position of any man. I have not been deceived in any way.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. May I ask the gentleman a strictly impersonal question?

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes, sir.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. To what extent does the gentleman discriminate against bachelor officers?

Mr. McKENZIE. Discriminate against bachelor officers? Well, I want to say to my good friend from Virginia, in my judgment, we have not discriminated against them at all. We treated them as they should be treated. In the first place they had not any children. We refused to give them money to support somebody else's children. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield for another question? Do the bachelors on the gentleman's committee support this bill or oppose it?

Mr. McKENZIE. I do not like to discuss my colleagues. They may be married, for all I know.

Mr. LOWREY. Will the gentleman yield for a question? If you do not discriminate against the bachelors I do not think you are doing justice, and I do not know whether I shall support the bill or not.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Referring to the question of allowances, does a man, a wife, and a bull dog pup get as much as a man, his wife, and a number of children?

Mr. McKENZIE. If the gentleman has any of that kind of neighbors——

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Not in Kansas, but some are at our hotel.

Mr. McKENZIE. As far as I am concerned, I have not dealt with that character of people. I am not opposed to bull dogs, however.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. What I meant is, does a man and his wife get as much pay as a man with a wife and family?

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes. The committee did not draw the limit on him. Now, the next criticism in this report is that the pending bill (H. R. 10972) discriminates against officers commissioned from civil life. Now, gentlemen, that is unkind—destructive criticism, in my judgment. As one of the men who happened to be on the Committee on Military Affairs writing the reorganization bill, and who had the honor to be one of the conferees for seven weeks combating with the Senate on that bill, I want to say in writing that law if I ever stood for anything in my life I stood for the 5,000 emergency officers that were put into the Army, and when it came to the writing of this bill I said we will leave these emergency officers in the place where we find them, enjoying grades of captain, or major, or lieutenant, or colonel, whatever it may be, whether they have had only three or four years' service, and we will concede that they had a sort of constructive service that was sufficient to put them into these periods, and we leave them there. We left them there. Now, what is the criticism of these gentlemen of the minority that we have not treated the emergency officers fairly? I will tell you what it is. Over here in the Judge Advocate General's Department they have appointed a number of colonels under the reorganization act.

We put them in there because they were lawyers, and we gave them four or six colonels in the reorganization bill, and under that law they are entitled to 26 years' service. We leave them there. We give them the pay of the period of the colonel in this bill. What are we asked now? We are asked in this criticism to not only do that for these men—God knows, I have no objection to them; I believe it was fair and right to these men to leave them where we found them under the law—but they ask us now to do what? I have a letter in my possession that was sent to me to-day from one of my old friends in the adjutant general's office in Illinois from one of these men, who undertakes to say that he practiced law for 16 years and then went into the Judge Advocate General's office, and he wants us to count now for longevity service the same length of time that the man had who was serving in the Infantry, for instance, down on the border or up in the frozen regions of Alaska; he wants not only to be put in the pay period where we found him, but give him longevity pay. You can do it if you want to, but I do not believe it is fair and right. I said so when we passed that reorganization bill. I fought it then and I will fight it now, rather than to say that those men who have been lawyers shall go in and count the same for two or three years' service as a man who spent 26 years in the Infantry or Cavalry or Artillery.

Mr. MILLER. Does service at the Naval Academy and service at the Military Academy count on the service?

Mr. McKENZIE. It does not count now. I will say to my good friend that we have not changed the law so far as longevity pay in this bill is concerned. Men from Annapolis and West Point do not get credit for this service. Prior to 1912 they did. We left them where we found them. We did not have power to write laws of that character.

But here is one of the things in this bill that you men who are thinking of the taxpayer back home want to think about, and that is that while we treat well all these men in the service—and we are criticized for that—and that we are overkind to them, gentlemen, I am not one of those who believe in our Government repudiating a contract. We have had a certain contract with these men, and if you will let us keep it they will pass out of the service later on. But this bill provides that hereafter men coming into the service as officers shall count only commissioned service. When we get down to that basis we will have everybody treated alike. Those men came in with that understanding and knowledge and therefore will have no complaint. That is another one of the criticisms.

There is another thing they criticize us for. I am surpised at my apparently good-natured friend from Alabama. Oh, I do like to play a game on the level. I like to fight in the open. I despise to play, in a great game like this, anything that would look like playing to the demagogue. This is a serious proposition, gentlemen of the committee. I wish more men were here that I could talk to them. It means a great deal for the future of our country. It means more than just because a colonel served 30 years he is to have a little more pay. It means something for these institutions of our country. But, ah, my friends, when the minority members come to the end of their report, what do they do? Why, they say a few kind things about the Marine Corps. They pretend to say a few kind things for the Coast Guard. They go on to state that the Marine Corps, with 8,000 officers, can handle an army of 150,000, while our present Army has 13,000 officers for 150,000 men. Is there anybody deceived by that sort of talk? Thirteen thousand officers for 150,000 men? You do not need half of them. There are not more than half of them used for that purpose, and we did not make them for that purpose when we passed the reorganization law and the national defense act.

We provided that we should have trained officers in this country, who should train the 150,000 men in the National Guard and who could go into the schools where these 95,000 are going to school and train them. But, oh, it was a chance that they could not let go by. My good friends, get away from these invidious comparisons. No man thinks more of the heroic record of the marines than I do. I know that they have written with their blood the glory of our country on many a field. I know that the Coast and Geodetic Survey has gone out over the seas of the world to chart the unseen rocks, so that the men who sail the seas and carry our flag may be safe. I know that the Coast Guard, while we are sitting in our comfortable homes, by our firesides, with our wives and children about us, are out yonder on the storm-tossed sea rescuing life from the stranded vessel. Ah, more than that, they are away yonder in the North Atlantic warning the ships of the oncoming icebergs. God bless their record. And now my good friend there would be for them; he would be for the Coast Guard with only 291 officers. My friend would be for the Marine Corps, heroic men, but they have only a few officers. He would be for them. But the old Navy, that institution of our country that carries the name of Lawrence and Perry and Farragut and all the men that have made the Navy of our country glorious, a Navy which has never been found wanting in the hour of trial, he would throw a little criticism at for having a few lieutenants drawing a little more pay than he thinks they ought to draw. And he utters a worse insinuation against the old Army men. It is not necessary to defend the Army. I have joined in denouncing it on this floor many a time for things which I think they have not done. I should do it now. But, in God's name, I have not forgotten the men whom we all worship, the men that you boys on this side love to think of—Lee, Stonewall Jackson, Johnson, and others—West Pointers—yes, West Pointers—and on our side Grant and Sherman and Sheridan. And there is not a field of glory in all the world where our old Stars and Stripes have ever been carried but that it was carried there by the men in the Army. [Applause.]

Cut down the number of officers, if you please, but for God's sake let the Representatives of this great land of ours be too big, too broad, too generous to ask the men of these various institutions, including the Public Health Service, to serve us in time of stress, when we must rely upon them, and then quibble and find fault and talk about a few of them getting a little too much money.

My friends, I want you to study this bill. It means nothing to me. Why, everybody in this House knows that I am descended from the closest race in the world, the Scotch. I know what poverty means. I have walked that road, too. I know what I believe to be my duty here. And in offering this bill I wish to say that I have no blood relation in any of these services, not one.

But I stand here and plead, not for relatives, not for anybody that can do me any good. There are not any of them that can do that. I have to depend on the people out in the thirteenth congressional district of Illinois, where we have not a navy yard or a fort. I have not a thing there that looks like militarism, but I am pleading here to-day for these men on whom we must rely, and am asking you, in God's name, not to let a little prejudice lead you into a great mistake, such as that of deciding that you do not want to give the wives and children of the officers in this service at least a decent living. I will try to explain these things further as we read the bill. Gentlemen, I thank you for your attention. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Does any gentleman desire recognition? Does the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] desire recognition?

Mr. OLIVER. No.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves that the committee do now rise. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TOWNER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill (H. R. 10972) to readjust the pay and allowances of the commissioned and enlisted personnel of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, Coast and Geodetic Survey, and Public Health Service, had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the pay bill and to insert such parts of the minority report as I desire.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks as indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. OLIVER. Under leave to extend my remarks, I beg to state that my reason for asking this leave was due to the fact that it was about 5 o'clock when the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE] concluded his speech, and the point of no quorum having been raised the House, on motion of Mr. MCKENZIE, concluded to rise for the purpose of considering a motion to adjourn. It had been my purpose to make a speech on the pending bill immediately following the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE], and when the House reconvenes on Tuesday I will ask recognition and will then discuss the matters which I consider pertinent to the bill. Under leave to extend I was granted permission to print all or portions of the minority report, and the same are hereinafter set out, excepting that Tables 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7, attached to the minority report, are omitted; but the attention of the Members of the House is especially invited to these tables in connection with their study of the bill and the minority views thereon. Some errors appearing in the figures included in the table on page 10 of the minority report have been corrected.

The whole subject of pay being somewhat technical and confusing, it will prove especially helpful to the Members of the House, if time can be found, to read the bill and both the majority and minority reports thereon and frame questions therefrom to members of the committee when discussing the bill; and I know that the members of the committee will welcome all questions asking for information and that full and frank answers will be given, according to the best knowledge and information that the members of the committee have.

The minority report, with certain omission of tables, is as follows:

Mr. KRAUS, from the Committee on Adjustment of Pay, etc., submitted the following minority report, to accompany H. R. 10972:

We regret to find ourselves in disagreement with the other three members of the special committee of five, appointed in accordance with House resolution 296, on the readjustment of the pay of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, Coast and Geodetic Survey, and the Public Health Service.

After careful study of the proposed bill, H. R. 10972, we feel that it is not only unwise at this time to pass permanent pay legislation for the several services but that the bill, as reported, is fundamentally unsound, unjust to the private soldier in the lower grades of the Army, to the apprentice seamen of the Navy, overgenerous to a large number of the officer personnel, especially in the higher grades, discriminatory against officers commissioned from civil life in its gracious dispensation of service gifts, and unwarranted in proposing substantial increases in the retirement pay of officers, including many now on the retired list.

We will later discuss the bill under the subheads just outlined.

We have no desire to unduly press our convictions on the Members of the House, but in the discharge of our responsibility, as members of the committee, we wish to submit for the consideration of the House some objections to the pending bill which we think are well founded.

Before discussing proposed changes of existing law which the pending bill, H. R. 10972, seeks to accomplish, we wish to invite attention to the very large increase in the number of commissioned officers now on the pay roll of the Government as compared with the number in the services on July 1, 1916. The total number of commissioned officers on July 1, 1916, was 8,819; we now have 21,588. This increase in the commissioned personnel is distributed in the following Army grades and in grades of the other services corresponding thereto, to wit: In 1916 we had 19 major generals, now 67; 39 brigadier generals, now 97; 310 colonels, now 975; 414 lieutenant colonels, now 1,377; 1,159 majors, now 4,256; 2,686 captains, now 8,641; 2,956 first lieutenants, now 4,547; 1,236 second lieutenants, now 1,628.

This shows an increase of 12,769 commissioned officers since 1916, involving an additional annual expense to the Federal Treasury in the matter of officer pay and allowances alone, based on the 1908 schedule, of more than $55,000,000.

The House is now on record as favoring substantial reductions in this large officer personnel, and the President has announced that he will soon recommend to Congress the coalition of some branches of the military services under a single head or department, which recommendation, if followed, will lead to reductions in officer personnel, especially in some of the staff corps, in addition to the reductions now contemplated by the House. In this connection it is well to recall that we are now rapidly organizing on an efficient basis a federalized National Guard, which now numbers approximately 8,000 officers and 150,000 enlisted men, and the National Guard, with its present strength, will necessitate an appropriation of about $25,000,000 or more for the fiscal year 1923. When it is also remembered that there are now about 95,000 young men undergoing military training for Army reserve officers in college Reserve Officers' Training Corps units, we respectfully submit that these facts would seem to justify a hope that we will, in the near future, adjust our military forces on a more limited and economical basis than at present.

We wish to ask now that the above facts be borne in mind in your consideration of some suggestions hereinafter set out as to increases proposed in retirement pay, and as to the advisability of providing by temporary rather than by permanent legislation for any present needed increase in the pay of the officer and enlisted personnel of the several services.

CHANGES IN EXISTING LAW PROPOSED BY SECTION 1 OF H. R. 10972.

Under existing law pay of officers, including all allowances, are based on grade, and length of service, as affecting such pay, serves but one purpose, namely, to give what is known as longevity pay. Longevity pay for all officers is now limited to 40 per cent of base pay, with a further limitation of $1,000 as to the longevity pay for colonels, lieutenant colonels, majors, and officers in corresponding grades of the other services. Thus the total base and longevity pay now of a colonel is $5,000; that of a lieutenant colonel $4,500; that of a major $4,000.

Section 1 of H. R. 10972 changes existing law by establishing six pay periods, the first corresponding to the grade of second lieutenant, the second to that of first lieutenant, the third to that of captain, the fourth to that of major, the fifth to that of lieutenant colonel, and the sixth to that of colonel, and hereafter makes length of service—not grade—the main controlling factor in determining the pay and allowances of officers. It further increases the longevity pay of all officers by giving them 50 per cent of base pay instead of 40 per cent as now provided. It further repeals the longevity pay limitation of $1,000 for colonel, lieutenant colonel, major, and officers of corresponding grades in other services, and hereafter fixes the maximum base and longevity pay for a colonel at $6,000 instead of $5,000, for a lieutenant colonel at $5,750 instead of $4,500, for a major at $5,250 instead of $4,000. As to lieutenant colonels and majors, not only is the present longevity grade limitation of $1,000 repealed, but lieutenant colonels with 30 years' service are advanced to the pay period of a colonel, and majors with 23 years' service are advanced to the pay period of a lieutenant colonel, thus increasing their base pay by $500, on which their longevity pay is to be computed.

With the allowances proposed in H. R. 10972 for a lieutenant colonel and major, it thus appears that a lieutenant colonel, advanced to a colonel's pay period by length of service, will receive the maximum compensation allowed a colonel, to wit, $7,200, and a major, advanced by length of service to the pay period of a lieutenant colonel, may also receive a colonel's maximum compensation of $7,200. The same results obtain in reference to officers in corresponding grades of the other services.

Likewise officers below the grade of major will, under the pending bill, by reason of length of service, be given a pay period higher than that corresponding to their commission grades, and their pay and allowances will exceed that of officers outranking them by one grade and in some instances by two grades.

To further illustrate, there are now more than 100 lieutenants in the Navy with less than two years' commissioned service or commissioned officers of the regular Navy who under the provisions of section 1 of the proposed bill, H. R. 10972, would receive annually in pay and allowances more than $6,500, and yet there are colonels in the Army who under the provisions of the same bill will draw less than $6,500. In other words, length of service will under the terms of the pending bill hereafter control the pay of officers to such an extent that many now in the service will draw as pay and allowances an amount not only equal to but oftentimes in excess of the pay and allowances of officers outranking them by one and not infrequently by two grades.

The extent and full purport of this last statement, as applied to the services concerned, will more clearly appear by an examination of table attached hereto as an exhibit and numbered 1, which table gives the number of officers in the several grades with their length of service.

These tables show a large number of officers now in the services who under the provisions of the pending bill will have sufficient length of service to advance them to the pay period next above the one corresponding to the grade in which they hold a commission, which will give them a base pay increase of $500, and their longevity pay will then be computed on this increased base pay. We submit that this change of existing law is very far-reaching and ill considered. It serves to give to length of service a value never contemplated. Heretofore, to the officer on active duty, it has only counted for longevity pay; now it is proposed that it shall count not only for longevity pay but shall serve to increase the base pay of officers by advancing them to the pay period of the next higher grade; and by raising the longevity percentage from 40 to 50 per cent and removing limitations on longevity increase of the higher ranks it will be seen that it will not only largely increase the pay of an officer while on active service but it will materially add to his retirement pay, as pointed out later.

Apropos to this proposed change of existing law, we beg to submit some thoughtful comments made to the joint committee. We quote, first, from a letter of Secretary Weeks to Congressman MCKENZIE, as follows:

"Your fundamental ideas seem to be a pay based upon length of service and number of dependents of the officer concerned. These are both ideas that are at variance with any plan of compensation that I know of, either in governmental or private employment, and common prudence would suggest that they be adopted only after full consideration of their effect not only directly upon the services concerned but collaterally upon other Government services.

"The principle of pay for service rendered, according to the position occupied in any organization, is a convention that represents the great consensus of opinion in the world to-day, and it is a question whether we could wisely make the basic pay dependent upon length of service. We approach entirely too near to that to-day in many of the Government services where promotion is lineal and when grade and pay depend largely upon the individual's health and strength rather than upon his ability and usefulness. Its adoption to a greater degree by the several services concerned might lead to its adoption elsewhere in the Government service. Briefly, these are some of the objections to the tentative plan."

Next, from a statement by Captain Williams, United States Navy, as follows:

"As soon as you begin the practical application of that idea the things that you tend to consider immaterial in the law loom up very large. You can not have, for military reasons, a senior, a man of higher position, drawing less pay than a junior."

Next, a question asked Secretary Denby by Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina:

"That is what I wanted to ask, whether you did have any idea how you would work it out to avoid having a subordinate receive higher compensation than a superior officer. I have been trying to discover how you would do it, and I know that it would demoralize any organization."

To which Secretary Denby replied:

"Not only that, but if you did it flatly without any qualification at all, if you simply said, 'A man serves 10 years and gets the 10 years' rate of pay whether he is a good or bad man,' you are taking away a good deal of the motive and ambition."

Mr. MCKENZIE, a member of the joint committee, recognizing the force of the criticisms directed at this change, suggested at that time the following proviso:

"But suppose you put in the law a proviso: 'Provided, however, That no officer should draw more pay than that prescribed for the grade in which he is serving.'"

(It will be noted, however, that Mr. MCKENZIE'S proviso does not appear in the bill as reported.)

The quoted comments certainly show serious misgivings by high officials and by members of the committee as to the wisdom of the proposed change of existing law.

THE BILL IS OVERGENEROUS TO MANY OF THE OFFICER PERSONNEL NOW IN THE SERVICE.

In support of this claim, we quote from section 1 of the pending bill, as follows:

"For officers hereafter appointed, no service shall be counted for the purpose of pay except effective commission service under Federal appointment. For officers now in the service, all service which is now counted in computing longevity pay shall be included in the computation."

Service now counted in computing longevity pay, and which under this provision is sought to be made available to officers now in the service to increase their base pay as well, is not limited to commission service, but includes for all graduates of the academies at West Point and Annapolis prior to July, 1916, the time spent at these academies in school, and a constructive or mere gift service, credited to many officers appointed from civil life prior to March 3, 1913, and also enlisted service.

After the passage of the bill, however, for officers hereafter commissioned, only commissioned service can be counted either for longevity pay or for the purpose of advancing an officer to another pay period higher than that corresponding to the grade in which he is commissioned. (What good reason, may we ask, can be assigned for discriminating in favor of officers now in the service against officers hereafter to be commissioned?)

In view of the rapid promotions received by so many now in the service and the certainty of slow promotion in the future, it would rather seem equitable to favor the incoming officer rather than the one now enjoying the high rank by reason of the unusual and rapid promotions incident to the war and the favorable officer legislation subsequent thereto.

The quoted provision not only gives to officers now holding commissions benefits above pointed out but it will serve to largely increase the longevity pay of these officers, to advance them to the highest pay period, and by increasing their base and longevity pay, with other than commissioned service, they will thus receive a large increase in retired pay as a further benefit to be enjoyed alone by them and to be denied officers hereafter commissioned, because only commissioned service hereafter can count for advancement, for longevity, or retirement pay.

It further appears that this provision, on account of many colonels, lieutenant colonels, and majors now having credit for service other than commissioned service, because of the repeal of the $1,000 limitation as to longevity pay and the increase of the longevity percentage from 40 to 50, would now, if retired, receive the following increase in retired pay, to wit:

For colonels with 30 years' service	$750.00
For lieutenant colonels with 30 years' service	937.50
For majors with 30 years' service	937.50

In further confirmation of the statement that the pending bill is most generous to many of the officers now holding high commissions, section 16 saves to all officers their present base and longevity pay, notwithstanding a large number of high commissions now held are alone due to very unusual and rapid promotions. Apropos of the rapid promotions received by many now in the service, we beg to quote a statement by Mr. MCKENZIE:

"I want to be very frank with you. You are aware of the fact that since we got into this great war with Germany there are hundreds and hundreds of young officers who have received very rapid promotion, and some of these older officers, in both the Army and Navy, that I see sitting around in the room, probably served 10 or 15 or 20 or 25 years before they reached the point where they were drawing the pay that some of these younger men are drawing after two or three years' service."

Yet we find in the fact of this statement by Representative MCKENZIE that the present bill seeks not only to save the base and longevity pay of even these officers who were thus rapidly promoted but also undertakes to increase their pay by giving, as will later appear, a ration allowance and an increased allowance for quarters. We should think not alone of the officers now in the service but some thought should be given to those who will be hereafter commissioned and who must wait, as some of the older officers have had to wait in the past, many years, as Mr. MCKENZIE states, to get the pay of many present officers who, by this bill, will have their high-grade pay saved to them.

Table No. 7, appended to the report, will show the pay and allowances of officers as proposed by H. R. 10972, exclusive of additional pay for aviation. The table is accurate, and clearly presents the whole subject of pay and allowances as proposed in the pending bill for the commissioned personnel.

THE BILL IS UNJUST TO THE PRIVATE SOLDIER AND SAILOR IN THE LOWER GRADES OF THE SERVICE.

If, as claimed, the pending bill shows a substantial saving under a Budget estimate for 1923, based on the bonus act of May 18, 1920 (which expires on June 30, 1922), it will be found on examination that any saving so shown in either the Army or Navy is almost altogether, if not wholly, due to a reduction in the pay of the private soldier in the lower grades of the Army and the apprentice seaman of the Navy, whose present pay, strange to say, the present bill proposes to reduce as follows:

"To the private soldier in the lower grades of the Army, from $30 to $21.

"To the apprentice seaman of the Navy, from $33 to $21.

It is interesting to read in this connection a statement made by Senator WADSWORTH, the chairman of the Joint Committee on the Readjustment of Pay, appearing on page 360 of the hearings, which we herewith quote:

"It is well to remember, if we are thinking about the condition of the Federal Treasury and the upkeep of the Army and Navy, that where the great cost is is in the lowest grades of both services.

"Two or three dollars decrease in the pay of privates in the Army and of apprentice seamen in the Navy amounts to something like two and a half million dollars."

Since the chairman of the joint committee has thus announced that two or three dollars decrease in the pay of the private soldier and sailor will result in a saving of two and a half millions, if he was correct, you can readily understand how, under the pending bill, H. R. 10972, the saving should mount into the millions when we recall that the pay of the private soldier in the Army has been reduced $9 instead of two or three, and for the apprentice seaman in the Navy $12 instead of two or three.

This will more clearly appear from an examination of Tables 2, 3, 4, and 5.

Table 2 was prepared and presented to the joint committee by officers of the War Department appointed to advise the joint committee; Table 3 by the same officers appointed to advise the special committee of the House; Table 4 by the Navy Department and submitted by letter of March 2, 1922; and Table 5 was prepared by representatives of the Navy appointed to advise the special committee of the House.

Some analyzing notes will be found at the foot of some of the tables, to which consideration is invited.

The pay of the enlisted personnel, with notes showing adaptation to Navy enlisted personnel, is shown by a table attached to this report and numbered "6."

THE PENDING BILL, H. R. 10972, DISCRIMINATES AGAINST OFFICERS COMMISSIONED FROM CIVIL LIFE.

A number of officers who served with signal ability during the war, many of them previously with the National Guard, were commissioned into the service under the June 4, 1920, act. Some of these officers are now colonels, and yet, under the provisions of the pending bill, there are many majors and many lieutenant colonels and officers in the corresponding grades of the other services who, while holding the grades of lieutenant colonels and majors, respectively, will draw more pay than these colonels commissioned under the June 4, 1920, act. The pending bill gives no credit to these officers for constructive service, nor does it give any credit to those who formerly served with the National Guard, but, strange to say, it gives to the officers of the federalized National Guard credit for service in the National Guard since June 3, 1916, and for service in the Organized Militia prior to July 1, 1916. What good reasons can be assigned for giving service credit to National Guard officers while serving with a National Guard organization and denying it to these same officers when commissioned in the Regular Army?

The pending bill, while denying any constructive service to officers commissioned from civil life under the June 4, 1920, act, proposes to give to many lieutenant commanders and lieutenants of the Staff Corps of the Navy, and to officers in other services, constructive service, varying from one to four years, and in some instances gives more, and this constructive service, so proposed to be given, will hereafter operate to advance these officers to pay periods higher than those corresponding to the grade in which they hold commissions. Though the pending bill, H. R. 10972, gives to officers commissioned from civil life under the act of June 4, 1920, no credit for constructive service, yet it is interesting to note in this connection that the tentative bill prepared by Representative MCKENZIE, and submitted to the joint committee, and which was really the basis of the pending bill, undertook to give constructive service to officers commissioned from civil life, regardless of the rank in which commissioned. The officers of the Army, Navy, and other allied services appointed by the department heads to confer with and assist the joint committee in its study of a pay bill, at first gave full approval to this constructive service, so recommended for civilian officers in the original McKenzie bill. This will fully appear from a quotation taken from the officers' comments on the McKenzie bill, set out in the hearings before the special committee of the House on H. R. 10972, beginning with the last paragraph on page 53 and continuing through the first paragraph on page 55 of said hearings. From the officers' comments, approving the constructive service proposed for civilian officers in the original McKenzie bill, we beg to quote the concluding paragraph, which is as follows:

"It is believed that the section as now written in its modified form (referring to the constructive service section) will tend to eliminate from the Army the dissatisfaction which has existed among various groups of officers on account of the arrangement of the initial promotion list."

Without intending to express an opinion as to the wisdom of giving constructive service to officers appointed from civil life under the June 4, 1920, act, as proposed in the original McKenzie bill, which is set out in the hearings before the House committee on page 40, we respectfully submit that if constructive service is to be given to other officers, as the pending bill proposes to do, then certainly no just grounds can be assigned for refusing to give constructive service to officers appointed from civil life, as was proposed in the original McKenzie bill.

This feature, as well as many others of the original McKenzie bill, while tentatively approved by the officers at first, was later rejected by them, and the pending bill now represents the views of the Regular officers of the Army, Navy, and other services who were designated to advise with the joint committee and who really prepared the pending bill, H. R. 10972. We confess our inability to explain why these officers first approved the McKenzie recommendation for constructive service only to later reject it.

As pertinent to the question just discussed, attention is invited to a statement before the joint committee by Col. N. D. Ely, of the Judge Advocate General's Department, United States Army, which appears on page 463 of the hearings.

THE PENDING BILL, H. R. 10972, PROVIDES FOR SUBSTANTIAL INCREASES IN THE RETIRED PAY OF OFFICERS.

In the discussion of this provision of the bill it will be recalled that we have heretofore pointed out that the $1,000 limitation on the longevity pay of colonels, lieutenant colonels, and majors, and officers of corresponding grades in the other services, is repealed by the pending bill, and the longevity percentage pay has been increased from 40 to 50 per cent, and further, that while length of service under existing law counts only for longevity pay, yet under the pending bill it will count for the further purpose of advancing the pay of an officer to the pay period corresponding to the grade next above the one in which he holds a commission.

Now, predicated on these changes, which the pending bill proposes in existing law, a colonel now on the retired list who has had 30 years' service prior to his retirement would be entitled to an increase in his retired pay of $750 per annum, the difference between three-fourths of $5,000, the maximum base and longevity pay of a colonel under existing law, and $6,000, the maximum base and longevity pay of a colonel with 30 years' service under the proposed bill. A lieutenant colonel and a major now on the retired list with 30 years' service would also be entitled by reason of the provisions of the pending bill to an increase in retired pay of $937.50.

An examination of Tables A, N, M, and P, hereto appended, will show that a large number of colonels and lieutenant colonels now in the service, if retired now, will, under the pending bill, have had sufficient length of service to increase the retired pay of colonels $750 and lieutenant colonels $937.50.

The pending bill provides substantial increase to all officers now on the retired list who were retired with normal length of grade service to their credit, and also substantial increase to officers now in the service who may be retired in future having to their credit normal length of service for the grades in which they hold commissions.

Many retired officers have been temporarily called into active service since the war under authority of a special act and advanced to higher grades, thus entitling them to increased retired pay. This special act was unwise, has been greatly abused, and the members of the joint committee were in full agreement that it should be repealed.

We refer to it for the purpose of emphasizing that while the pending bill recognizes that many retired officers have thus been advanced in grade, yet it proposes to grant to many of these a further increase in their retired pay.

SUMMARY AND COMMENTS ON PAY AND ALLOWANCES UNDER 1908 LAWS, MAY 18, 1920, ACT, AND H. R. 10972.

COMPENSATION OF OFFICERS.

The total compensation of officers is made up of two parts—one, pay proper, which includes base and longevity pay, and the other, allowance. Retired pay is computed on officers' pay (i. e., base and longevity), allowances not being taken into account. The pay proper under H. R. 10972 is built upon the base pay as established in the 1908 pay schedule, except that that of a second lieutenant is reduced from $1,700 to $1,500, and the longevity pay is changed from the existing 10 per cent increase for every five years' service up to 20 years to a 5 per cent increase for each three years' service up to and including 30 years, thus increasing the longevity percentage from 40 to 50 per cent. The existing limitation of $1,000 on the longevity pay of a colonel, lieutenant colonel, and major is repealed by H. R. 10972.

As before pointed out, H. R. 10972 further changes existing law, in that for the purpose of computing pay of officers all service which has heretofore been counted on longevity pay only can now be counted for the purpose of advancing an officer to a higher pay period than the one corresponding to his commission grade, coupled with the proviso that officers who hereafter enter the service can count for pay purposes commissioned service only.

Under the 1908 laws commutation for heat, light, and quarters were given officers not occupying public quarters, except that no commutation for heat, light, and quarters was given officers in the Navy on sea duty or officers in the Army on field duty. By act of April 16, 1918 (war measure), temporary commutation for heat, light, and quarters was given all officers on field or sea duty and while serving beyond the territorial jurisdiction of the United States. This temporary act of April 16 was continued in force by the May 18, 1920, bonus act to June 30, 1922.

We have prepared a table showing the money value of heat, light, and quarters under 1908 laws and value of subsistence and quarters as now proposed by H. R. 10972 as to officers with and without dependents; also maximum officers' pay (i. e., base and longevity) under the 1908 laws and as proposed under H. R. 10972; also total compensation (i. e., pay and all allowances) under 1908 laws and as proposed under H. R. 10972 as to officers without and with dependents.

Attention is specially invited to this table with its attached analyzing notes and comments thereon. The table is as follows:

Grade.	Allowances (maximum).			Maximum pay (base and longevity).		Total compensation, 1908 law.	Total compensation, proposed bill, no dependents.	Total compensation, proposed bill, dependents.

[1] Prior to Apr. 16, 1918, officers on sea or field duty could not receive commutation of quarters or heat and light. Increased pay for flying duty and for field or sea duty is in addition to limitations contained in notes 2, 3, and 4, i. e. there is no limitation under existing law or in proposed bill to prevent officers receiving extra pay for flying, sea, or field duty in addition to the maximum compensation authorized.

[2] Maximum compensation of major generals limited to $9,700.

[3] Maximum compensation of brigadier generals limited to $7,500.

[4] Maximum compensation of colonels limited to $7,200.

[5] Lieutenant colonel, 30 years' service, receives pay period of colonel, base pay $4,000.

[6] Major, with 23 years' service, receives pay period of lieutenant colonel, base pay $3,500.

[7] Captain, with 17 years' service, receives pay period of major, base pay $3,000.

[8] First lieutenant, with 10 years' service, receives pay period of captain, base pay $2,400.

[9] Second lieutenant, with 5 years' service, receives pay period of first lieutenant, base pay $2,000.

Under 1908 laws officers of Navy received 10 per cent increase in pay for sea duty beyond continental limits of United States, and officers of Army received 10 per cent for foreign duty. Under proposed bill officers receive 5 per cent increase on base pay for field or sea duty.

Notes 2, 3, and 4 above show limitations on the total compensation of the following officers, to wit: $9,700 for major generals; $7,500 for brigadier generals; $7,200 for all officers under brigadier generals. The limitations do not forbid extra pay for sea, field, or flying service being received in excess of limits fixed. The last column shows that the maximum compensation granted officers by H. R. 10972 will exceed the limitations fixed as to the following officers:

	Excess.
Major general	$178
Brigadier general	378
Colonel	678
Lieutenant colonel	647
Major	147

Attention is called to this excess compensation resulting from subsistence and rental allowances as proposed in H. R. 10972, for the reason that it suggests how easy hereafter it would be to increase the compensation of these officers by a simple removal of the limitation.

H. R. 10972 will illustrate how this can be done, without calling attention thereto, in that it now repeals by mere implication the $1,000 limitation on longevity pay of certain officers (yet this might not be noticed by even a most careful reading of the bill).

The limitation as now drawn does not apply to officers with the rank of colonel in two existing services, and when you who are now here are replaced by others the question may arise, Why this discrimination? The reasons now obtaining may not then exist, and the result is not difficult to guess—the limitation will go.

REASONS WHY TEMPORARY RATHER THAN PERMANENT LEGISLATION BEST FOR ANY NEEDED INCREASE IN PAY OF PERSONNEL THAT MAY BE SHOWN.

Confessedly, the May 18, 1920, act was too generous in the bonus given to many officers, and had Congress known at the time the act was passed of the rapid promotion that would follow within less than 60 days, presumably many officers who thus received unusual and rapid promotions, giving to them large increase in pay and allowances, under permanent law, would not have been so generously provided for.

In confirmation of this, it may be here noted that the May 18, 1920, act not only gave officers below the grade of brigadier general the following bonus:

Colonels and lieutenant colonels	$600
Majors	840
Captains	720
First lieutenants	600
Second lieutenants	420

But in addition to the amount so given it continued in force the temporary act of April 16, 1918, to June 30, 1922, thus giving commutation to Army officers on field duty and Navy officers on sea duty, and which in the absence of the extension of this April, 1918, temporary act these officers would not have had. When it is remembered that 70 per cent of naval officers are on sea duty and that the field duty of the Army has been largely extended it can readily be seen how liberal the May 18, 1920, act was.

The commutations, plus the bonus given temporarily to this large number of officers by the May 18, 1920, act, were as follows, to wit:

Colonels	$1,925.35
Lieutenant colonels	1,751.70
Majors	1,815.65
Captains	1,520.50
First lieutenants	1,223.80
Second lieutenants	861.30

With the full information that Congress now has, it will not be difficult to prepare a temporary bill providing for any needed increase in pay and allowances for the officer and enlisted personnel of the services that is fair and just, both to the personnel and to the Federal Treasury. Any bonus that Congress may now consider just and necessary would be given, not as was done in the May 18, 1920, act, indiscriminately to all officers holding commissions in certain grades, but the unusual and rapid promotions which have advanced young officers to high grades, with greatly increased pay, would very properly be considered and taken into account. Any needed increase to the enlisted personnel could likewise be properly and more wisely provided for hereafter than was done in the May 18, 1920, act.

The very fact that the high grades of the enlisted personnel in both Army and Navy, especially the Navy, are now oversupplied and top-heavy serves to emphasize the importance of providing for these grades by temporary rather than by permanent legislation, pending the fixing of a limitation on the number to be hereafter carried in Navy enlisted grades, as is now done in the Army and Marine Corps. A proper adjustment of the anomalous condition now obtaining in the Navy as to an oversupply of chief petty officers and enlisted men in other high grades will alone save millions of dollars, and no permanent legislation as to pay should be provided until this can be accomplished.

We have heretofore called attention to the large increase in the number of commissioned officers now in service, as compared with the number in the service in July, 1916; also to the fact that this Congress is on record as favoring a substantial reduction of the officer and enlisted personnel in the major services; also to the announcement of the President that he will soon recommend to Congress the coalition of some of the military branches; and we submit this suggestion, that in the next one or two years there will be separated from the service many now holding commissions. This makes it unwise to provide increased pay by permanent legislation, as proposed in H. R. 10972, for commissioned officers at this time, thereby increasing the retired pay of a large number that will unquestionably be separated from the service within probably the next year. Until Congress definitely determines on the permanent strength of the commissioned and enlisted personnel in the two major services, it would prove expensive to provide permanent legislation, such as is proposed in H. R. 10972. The hearings will disclose that Secretary Denby, Admiral Coontz, and others, appearing before the joint committee in November last, advised that temporary rather than permanent legislation be passed relative to the matters we are now considering.

Certain unusual conditions obtaining both in Army and Navy, largely incident to the war and to ill-considered officer legislation subsequent thereto, do not obtain to any large extent in the Marine Corps, Coast Guard, Coast and Geodetic Survey, and the Public Health Service. If we were now confronted with the question of writing a permanent pay bill alone for these four services, it could probably be done along lines fair to the services and to the American taxpayer as well.

A number of the commissioned officers in the Public Health Service hold temporary commissions only, their pay being dependent on annual appropriations. There have been practically no increases in the commissioned personnel of the Coast Guard or the Coast and Geodetic Survey, and in this connection may we be pardoned for suggesting that some permanent constructive legislation by the appropriate committee should be considered for the Coast Guard. It is a most worthy and useful service, and the fidelity of its officers to duty, though not enjoying the favored legislation of other services, deserves most favorable comment.

Many commendable economies have been shown by the Marine Corps since the war, and it may not be out of place to suggest that, organized as the Marine Corps always is, either for peace or war, this corps would not require nor ask for exceeding 8,000 officers, even though its enlisted personnel was increased to 150,000 men. This estimate of its commissioned personnel makes liberal allowance for certain Staff Corps for which no commissioned assignments are now made, whereas the Army has approximately 13,000 officers for an Army of 150,000 men.

It is a matter of great importance not only to the different military services but to the taxpayers that a permanent military policy, fixing the strength of our military forces, be finally and properly adjusted on a sane, satisfactory peace basis before any permanent pay bill, common to all the services, is enacted, even if then it should be thought wise to include all of the services in one bill.

Certainly a permanent pay bill can be drawn along much simpler lines than is found in H. R. 10972. We might here refer to the tentative bill at one time favored by Representative McKENZIE, and which, while undertaking to fix pay periods, did away with all longevity pay and allowed commissioned service only to advance officers from one pay period to another, and required much longer commissioned service for advancement to the different pay periods than that now proposed in H. R. 10972. The original McKenzie bill, though it may have had its imperfections, was not subject to the criticism of discriminating in favor of officers now in the service against those hereafter to be commissioned or against those commissioned from civil life.
